Agriculture emphasizes the need for abundant, low-cost power for efficient agricultural production and to encourage settlement, it takes exception to the stress placed upon the potentialities of irrigation and expresses the belief that certain generalizations made or implied are not warranted by available evidence either in Alaska or in countries of similar conditions elsewhere. In objecting to a statement of the Bureau of Land Management of the Department of the Interior which appears on page 7 of the appendix, the Department of Agriculture points out that investigations of the physical and economic feasibility of potential supplemental irrigation are a function of, and are being conducted by, that Department through the Alaska Agricultural Experiment Station.

In response to my request for comments on the report, the Secretary of Defense advises that he must support all projects, the cumulative effect of which will tend to develop the civilian economy in Alaska to a point of self-sufficiency. He informs me that if the Eklutna project is undertaken it will probably provide a satisfactory source of standby power for requirements of the National Military Establishment in the Anchorage area and thus will operate to reduce the ultimate construction of generating plant to carry future loads, but not the current program. He concurs with the Secretary of the Army in recommending authorization for construction by the Corps of Engineers, if the project is approved.

It would appear that the power features of the proposed Eklutna project can be justified and that there would be a market for the power produced. However, there is serious doubt at this time that an irrigation program of the type envisioned in the reclamation laws is adaptable to the Alaskan situation. While there might be a place for irrigation on some farms, it will probably not be extensive, and will be of the individual farm well and pump type. This will, of course, require the use of power for pumping. Since no physical water connection would exist between Eklutna Lake and the farms and since direct service to irrigation would be only through the supply of power, construction of the project need not be delayed pending completion of current investigations of irrigation potentialities as a basis for development of a policy for improvement of agriculture in Alaska. Inasmuch as the usefulness of the existing lake for recreational purposes is not increased by construction of the dam, the proposed development of recreation facilities at Eklutna Lake does not appear to be essential to authorization of construction of the power project. It seems desirable, therefore, to postpone consideration of the proposed recreational development at Eklutna Lake, pending a broader study which would determine the recreation needs of the entire Anchorage area and the order of their relative urgency.

In view of the foregoing, and of the present status of development of Alaska, I believe the proposed Eklutna project should be considered as a power project without regard to irrigation or recreation potentialities, and that authorization of construction of the project under Federal reclamation laws, and development of recreational facilities in connection with the project would not be justified at this time.

Therefore, in accordance with Executive Order 9384, approved October 4, 1943, and the President's letter to you, dated July 2, 1946, you are advised that, while there would be no objection to the submission of the Eklutna report to Congress, or to authorization of construction of the hydroelectric project by the Department of the Interior, its authorization as an extension of the Federal reclamation laws and authorization of the development of recreational facilities at the project, would not be in accord with the program of the President at this time. It is requested that a copy of this letter accompany your submission of the report to Congress.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK PACE, Jr.,
Director.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., July 1, 1949.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to Assistant Secretary Warne's letter dated January 14, 1949, submitting a draft of a bill to authorize the construction by the Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Reclamation, of the Eklutna project, Alaska. The proposed project near Anchorage would consist of a low dam at Eklutna Lake, a tunnel and penstock, a power plant with an installed capacity of 30,000 kilowatts, and transmission facilities. The proposed legislation would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct (through the Bureau of Reclamation) and to operate and maintain the Eklutna project and to develop recreational facilities in connection therewith.

The comments and views contained in my letter to you dated June 30, 1949 (copy attached), with respect to the Report on the Eklutna project, submitted by you on March 15, 1949, apply also to the proposed legislation. In addition, the Federal Power Commission and the National Military Establishment have made recommendations which seem to have particular merit and should be considered in connection with the proposed legislation. The Federal Power Commission recommends that the bill provide for rate review and cost allocation by the Federal Power Commission similar to the requirements under sections 5 (a), 6, and 7 of the Bonneville Project Act, sections 5 and 6 of the Fort Peck Act, and section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944. The National Military Establishment recommends that section 3 be amended specifically to include Federal agencies among those to receive preference in sale of power and that consideration be given to insertion of a provision requiring any purchaser of power for resale to agree to transmit energy to any Government installation in its transmission area for a reasonable transmission charge. It would not object to limiting such service to installations which have a maximum demand of 500 kilowatts or more.

Section 2 of the bill would reserve to the United States all minerals and veins or lodes thereof discovered in the course of investigating, constructing, and maintaining the the project, and would authorize the Secretary of Interior to sell or dispose of the same, the net proceeds to be credited to certain project costs. It is our understanding that under this provision any ores of commercial value would be mined by private operators under leases granted by the Government. We further understand that only to the extent made necessary by construction of the project, is it contemplated that such ores would be removed by the Department of Interior or its construction contractors, in which case the ore would be stockpiled for appropriate disposition. However, to apply the net proceeds from sale or disposition of the minerals to certain project costs, as proposed in the bill, would appear not only to present problems of administration but in the long run to add unnecessarily to the difficulties of developing a balanced economy in Alaska. The public interest would be better served if all such proceeds were credited to miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury of the United States rather than applying any part of them to project costs. Section 2 should be amended accordingly.

Under section 4 all receipts from transmission and sale of power and energy generated at the project would be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts except that the Treasury would be required to set up and maintain from such receipts a continuing fund of $250,000 to the credit of the Secretary of Interior. Such fund would be subject to expenditure by the Secretary to defray the operating expenses of generation and transmission of such power and energy, to defray emergency expenses, including expenses for such installations and connections as may be required to deliver power and energy from the transmission system, and to insure continuous operation. This provision is contrary to the existing Federal practice of defraying such operating expenses from funds appropriated by the Congress. Section 4 should be amended to limit the use of the continuing fund to emergency expenses required to insure continuous operation of the system generally as presently employed by the Bonneville Power Administration.

It is noted in the letter which it is proposed to use in transmitting the bill to the Congress, that the estimated cost of $20,365,400 for the power features of the project, with interest at 3 percent, is expected to be returned to the Government in 52 years. It is considered that the language in section 2 of the bill regarding the establishment of rate schedules should be so drawn as to require amortization of the capital investment, with interest, in a period not exceeding 50 years.

As explained in my letter of June 30, 1949, it appears desirable to postpone authorization for development of recreational facilities at Eklutna Lake. While there is no objection, in the preparation of reports on specific projects, to the consideration of recreational uses of reservoirs, and the facilities which would be appropriate for such uses, it would seem to me as a general policy that the provision of recreational facilities should be deferred until actual need is determined after a thorough study of recreational requirements in a given area. Such studies would reveal whether or not such facilities could be provided and managed by private enterprise under appropriate Federal supervision, or whether they should be provided at Federal expense and managed by the Government or through some other arrangement.

My attention has been directed to your letter of May 4, 1949, to the chairman of the Public Lands Committee, House of Representatives, published in the report of that committee dated June 20 (H. Rept. No. 956) on H. R. 940, to authorize public improvements in Alaska and for other purposes. The letter states that the proposed Eklutna project is strictly for the generation of power, is typical of projects to be covered by H. R. 940, and that H. R. 940 is entirely independent of the reclamation laws and would not extend the reclamation laws to Alaska. I agree with this view and believe that section 7 of the proposed legislation to authorize construction of the Eklutna project should be revised accordingly. Furthermore, the title and section 1 of the proposed bill should be amended to authorize construction by the Secretary without reference to the Bureau of Reclamation in accordance with the position taken in my letter of June 30 and since section 8 authorizes the Secretary to designate agencies of the Department to carry out the authority and functions under the bill.

You are accordingly advised that, if revised as outlined above, there would be no objection to the submission of the proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK PACE, Jr., Director.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1949.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 24, 1949, submitting your proposed report on H. R. 940, a bill to authorize public improvements in Alaska, and for other purposes. I note that your proposed report has already been made available to the House Committee on Public Lands and is reproduced in the committee's favorable report on the bill dated June 20, 1949 (H. Rept. No. 856).

There have been incorporated in H. R. 940, as it passed the House, all of the amendments proposed in your report. In addition, the bill now requires an affirmative authorization of projects by the Congress and an appropriation for construction of any project before expenditures for such construction may be made; gives preference in the sale of power and energy to all public bodies, including Federal agencies and cooperatives, on the same terms; requires resale power purchasers to transmit power and energy over their facilities to Federal agencies for a reasonable charge; and specifically authorizes construction of the proposed Eklutna project near Anchorage and an appropriation therefor. Subject to modifications which will be described later in this letter there would be no objection to enactment of H. R. 940 as it passed the House.

Because of the inclusion in the bill of the Eklutna project, the recommendations outlined in my letter of July 1 concerning your proposed Eklutna project bill should now be applied to the present form of H. R. 940. In this connection may I suggest that a copy of the July 1 letter be forwarded to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, together with this letter and the report which you transmit on H. R. 940.

There are a number of amendments to H. R. 940, in addition to those included by the House and those pertaining to Eklutna referred to in my July 1 letter, which should receive serious consideration by the Senate. They are as follows:

1. Section 2 of H. R. 940 should provide that, before reports and findings are submitted to the President and the Congress, a determination shall be made by the Secretary of Interior that construction or financing of the proposed project, by the Territory or by the public body or bodies which would be affected by the project, would not be feasible either with such Federal aid as at that time might be available for or in connection with a project of such nature, or in any other way. The Federal Works Administrator recommends this amendment to remove an area of possible conflict with H. R. 224, a bill to authorize a program of useful public works for the development of the Territory of Alaska.

2. Provision should be made for rate review and cost allocations by the Federal Power Commission as is now required by section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 and the statutes pertaining to the Bonneville and Fort Peck projects. This suggestion also was made with respect to the Eklutna project bill in my July 1 letter.

3. In section 3, page 3, line 2, after the words "over a period of", insert the words "not to exceed."

4. In section 3, page 3, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "compatible with the maintenance of adequate electric service" and substitute therefor the words "consistent with sound business principles." This change is necessary to make the bill conform directly with the language of the corresponding provision of section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944.

5. In section 3, page 4, lines 2 to 4, use of the proposed $200,000 continuing fund should be limited to emergency expenses required to insure continuous operation of the system generally, as presently employed by the Bonneville Power Administration.

6. Section 5, beginning at the top of page 5, should be reworded to make it clear that reports under section 2, as well as under section 5 shall be transmitted to all Federal departments or agencies interested in the development of the Territory of Alaska and that the Secretary, when transmitting reports under both sections 2 and 5, to the President and the Congress, shall include the views and recommendations of each interested Federal department or agency. Under such procedure there would be greater assurance of coordination of investigations and plans of Federal agencies for the development of Alaska, to meet both civil and military needs, and assistance would be rendered the President and the Congress in evaluation of each project proposal. The Secretary of Agriculture has suggested that the bill be further amended to provide for public hearings in the areas affected by the proposed project as an element of good procedure in connection with projects of the size and nature contemplated by the bill.

7. Section 6 should be amended to provide that all receipts from the sale of minerals discovered in connection with the project be credited to miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury, rather than applying any part of them to project costs as descibed in my July 1 letter relating to the Eklutna project bill.

In addition to the foregoing may I also ask you to call to the attention of the committee two other matters:

1. Enactment of H. R. 940, as noted in your letter of May 4, 1949, to the Chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands, is entirely independent of the reclamation laws and will not have the effect of extending those laws to Alaska. This conforms with the views expressed in my June 30 and July 1 letters on the Eklutna project.

2. The National Military Establishment recommends that consideration be given to the fact that establishment of the Department of the Interior as the agency to investigate and construct projects in Alaska for development of hydroelectric power and for development of related facilities would appear to be a duplication of the existing Corps of Engineers organization in Alaska engaged in investigation and construction of both military and civil projects.

Subject to your consideration of the points made in this letter and transmittal of a copy of it to the Senate committee, you are advised that there would be no objection to submission of such report to the committee as you deem appropriate.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK PACE, Jr.,
Director.

THE JOHNSTON INTERNATIONAL AND THE POINT 4 PROGRAM

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, there is a matter which I believe needs to be brought to the attention of the Senate, in the public interest. It was discussed in the Committee on Appropriations during the hearings on the foreign-aid appropriation bill. The discussion will be found on page 498 of the hearings, but I believe the case needs further documentation. This morning the committee allowed an amount for the point 4 program which was considerably reduced from what had been originally recommended. I believe this documentation may partly, at least, explain why that was done.

Mr. President, here is an example of an American enterprise, willing to do some practical point 4 work, which found all types of obstacles put in its way by various agencies of the Government. Perhaps the story should begin at the beginning, and I wish to read at this time a letter on the stationery of the Department of State, dated March 8, 1950, addressed to Mr. Harry Edell, vice president of Johnston International, which is a pipe and pump company of California. This is the letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 8, 1950.

Mr. HARRY EDELL,
Vice President of Johnston International, Los Angeles, Calif.

MY DEAR MR. EDELL: I have been asked to reply to your letter of February 8 addressed to the Secretary of State with enclosure covering the signing of a contract between Johnston International and the Taiwan Sugar Corp. to develop 125 water wells in Taiwan.

This is a gratifying example of private implementation of the President's plan to share American experience as a contribution to the economic development of other countries.

I am bringing your letter and enclosure to the attention of other officers in the Department of State who are directly concerned with the point 4 program, as well as to Mr. Thomas Hibben, Office of International Trade, Department of Commerce, and Mr. Arthur Goldschmidt, special assistant to the Secretary of the Interior. I can assure you that your courtesy and interest in making this information available are appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

S. P. DORSEY,
Technical Cooperation Projects Staff.

Mr. President, the next letter was written on June 15, addressed to me, by the Johnston Pump Co., which in the meantime had received considerable favorable discussion by the Department of State and other agencies. The letter reads as follows:

JOHNSTON PUMP CO.,
Los Angeles, Calif., June 15, 1950.

Mr. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
Senator of California,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: Early this month we approached the Bureau of Reclamation requesting that one of their geologists, Mr. William I. Gardner, be loaned to Johnston International for a period of 2 months, on leave without pay to assist us on a project which we have undertaken for the Chinese Nationalist Government on the island of Formosa.

Our purpose in requesting Mr. Gardner was because the Bureau of Reclamation had previously made available this same geologist to us for the months of October and November 1949. He made the original geological survey of this underground water development program and his assistance to us at this time would expedite our entire project.

Because of the existing situation in the Far East area, Bureau of Reclamation informed us that our request must be made to the Department of State. This was done through Messrs. Barnett and Magill, and later, after being turned down by them, we approached Mr. Livingston Merchant who likewise rejected our request.

Desiring to keep this matter within the channels at State, further discussed our request with Dean Rusk who commented that as far as State was concerned they would have no objections to Mr. Gardner being assigned to us, providing he was not considered a Government employee. State then advised Reclamation of their decision in the matter, and in a further conversation which I had with Mr. T. W. Mermel I was informed that Reclamation could not release Mr. Gardner unless State so requested.

You will be interested to know that the following telegram, which we quote, was sent to the Bureau of Reclamation in Washington, D. C., on May 19 by the Sacramento region of Bureau of Reclamation:

"Johnston International, a subsidiary of the Ralph M. Parsons Co. and Johnston Pump Co. desires services of Gardner as consultant on ground water development to irrigate rice and sugar in Formosa. He made the original geological survey in October and November of last year. Services required for about 2 months starting June 15. Leave without pay satisfactory here.

"ACTING REGIONAL DIRECTOR LINDLEY."

We have now en route by ship to Formosa over a million dollars worth of equipment. The first group of a 32-man team of engineers has already left, and the remainder will leave by air on June 19. It is our desire to have Gardner leave at this time.

This underground water-development program will do much to prevent the entire economy of the island from collapsing. If this irrigation project is not under way by July 1, the farmers will refuse to plant in October and a 60 percent or more curtailment in sugar production will follow. This would not only be disastrous to the economy of the island, but would also affect the source of supply which General MacArthur sorely needs.

We would greatly appreciate having this matter brought to the attention of the proper people, and have the Department of State requested to secure a leave of absence from the Bureau of Reclamation for Mr. William I Gardner. We believe that this project is in the best interest to not only the Chinese Nationalist government, but the United States Government as well.

Very truly yours,

JOHNSTON INTERNATIONAL,
HILTON C. SMITH.

I also ask at this time to have printed as part of my remarks, immediately following the prior letter, a letter addressed to the Honorable Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary of State, signed by Mr. Smith, which, generally, outlines the same story as that set forth in the letter to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 15, 1950.

Hon. DEAN RUSK,
Assistant Secretary of State, Department of State, New State Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RUSK: As you know, we have been discussing informally with members of your staff the leave of absence of a geologist from the Bureau of Reclamation, Mr. William I. Gardner.

As a result of these discussions, the only alternative thus far reached is a decision of the State Department that they propose no objection to Mr. Gardner going to Formosa at this time providing he does so as a private citizen. After this information was conveyed to the Bureau of Reclamation they arbitrarily placed a rule against our request that they will not release this individual without the request of State. I am certain you can appreciate we are now placed in a complete vacuum.

Since it is the policy of Bureau of Reclamation to make available to industry certain of their personnel, it is difficult for us to understand why our request has been denied, particularly since the individual under discussion was loaned to us in October and November of last year on the preliminary study for this project.

It is believed we have made sufficient investigations ourselves which would assure the safety of not only our own personnel, but that of Mr. Gardner. If Mr. Gardner is granted leave of absence, he would be our responsibility.

We, therefore, in the best interests of both the Chinese Nationalist Government and United States Government hereby request that you ask the Bureau of Reclamation to release William I. Gardner, on leave of absence, for a period of 2 months, without pay, to Johnston International.

As previously explained, this underground water development program can do much to prevent an economic collapse of Formosa. Should this happen, we are arbitrarily permitting the Communists to take the island.

Yours very truly,

JOHNSTON INTERNATIONAL,
HILTON C. SMITH.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, as a result of that correspondence, after having some telephone conversations with the Department of State, in which they indicated that the matter met with their approval, I addressed a letter to the Honorable Oscar L. Chapman, Secretary of the Interior, which letter was dated June 16, and reads as follows:

JUNE 16, 1950.

Hon. OSCAR L. CHAPMAN,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Attached is copy of a letter addressed to me by Mr. Hilton C. Smith, of Johnston International, with respect to a project they are constructing on the island of Formosa. In view of the present interest in the point 4 program, it seems that the request of Johnston International presents a means whereby this program could be immediately implemented without cost to the Government.

In view of the request by Johnston International for the loan of Mr. William I. Gardner, of the Bureau of Reclamation, I would appreciate your comment on the feasibility of granting Mr. Gardner a leave of absence of 2 months, without pay, so that he might be available to participate as an adviser to Johnston International.

Because of the shortness of time involved, I would appreciate your comments at the earliest practicable date.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

On June 19 a letter was addressed to Mr. Smith by Mr. Robert W. Barnett, the officer in charge, Economic Office of China Affairs, of the State Department, reading as follows:

JUNE 19, 1950.

Mr. HILTON C. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: We have informed the Bureau of Reclamation of the interest of the Department of State in the successful completion of your well-drilling operation on Formosa and have requested that they consider the release of Mr. William I. Gardner for private employment by you for the operation.

If Mr. Gardner desires to accept such employment, we assume that preliminary briefing and understanding of other arrangements, as worked out between the Department and Mr. Ralph M. Parsons, will be the same for him as for other members of your party.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT W. BARNETT,
Officer in Charge, Economic Office of China Affairs.

Then, Mr. President, Government red tape really begins to operate. On June 22, not having had any favorable response to that letter, or the conversations they had had in a preliminary way, the Johnston Pump Co. addressed a letter to Mr. Michael W. Straus, Commissioner of Bureau of Reclamation, outlining the general situation as I have previously indicated. The letter reads:

JOHNSTON PUMP CO.,
Los Angeles, Calif., June 22, 1950.

Mr. MICHAEL W. STRAUS,
Commissioner, Bureau of Reclamation, Department of Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STRAUS: The Taiwan Sugar Corp., a subsidiary of the National Resources Commission of China, have engaged us under a contract to perform an underground water development program on the island of Formosa. Last year, in October and November, a Bureau of Reclamation employee, William I. Gardner, assisted us for a period of 2 months on the preliminary work for this project.

The major program is now about to start and over a million dollars worth of equipment is now on route by ship. Thirty-two of our own engineers have already left this country and are expected to arrive in Formosa shortly.

As you probably already know, Formosa depends largely upon its production of sugar for survival. It has already been estimated that unless this irrigation project, which we are just beginning, is under way in early July, 60 percent or more curtailment in sugar production is expected next year. If such a curtailment would come about, Formosa would collapse economically.

In order to expedite this program, we now ask that you release Mr. William I. Gardner on leave of absence for a two month period beginning on or about July 15, so that he may further assist Johnston International on this important undertaking.

With Mr. Gardner's previous experience and knowledge of this work, it is felt that our entire program would be expedited and it is for this reason that we specifically request his services.

This matter has been discussed with the Department of State, and a letter was directed to the Honorable Dean Rusk on June 15. A reply was received from the Department of State on June 19, indicating their interest in the successful completion of this well-drilling operation and further stating that they would inform the Bureau of Reclamation of their interest.

Your cooperation on this matter will be very much appreciated.

Yours very truly,

HILTON C. SMITH.

Mr. President, that was followed by a letter to me under date of June 23, which tells of what happened as a result of that conversation. The letter reads as follows:

This morning I met by appointment with Commissioner Michael W. Straus, Bureau of Reclamation, and formally presented our letter requesting that the Bureau of Reclamation release the above-named employee on leave of absence to assist us.

The Commissioner immediately informed me that he could give us an answer without writing a letter, and their answer was a straight rejection. This somewhat surprised me, since having received the letter from the Department of State, copy attached, it appeared that State Department was anxious to cooperate.

It now looks as though State and Reclamation have created a very convenient situation between them whereby Reclamation will only release Gardner upon official request to do so from State. Commissioner Straus informed me that with information he now has, Department of State will not make such a request.

It is indeed unfortunate that these two agencies do not recognize the importance of the work ahead of us and are unwilling to cooperate in this request. It has always been a policy of Bureau of Reclamation to loan their engineers to industry upon request.

Any assistance which you may give us in this matter will be indeed appreciated.

Very truly yours,

JOHNSTON INTERNATIONAL,
By HILTON C. SMITH.

That was followed by a letter dated June 23, 1950, from the United States Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, signed by Commissioner Michael W. Straus, reading as follows:

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: This acknowledges your letter dated June 22 and your call at my office June 23 and our conversation regarding the availability of William I. Gardner for services to the Johnston Pump Co., and confirms that conversation.

With full recognition of the desires of the Johnston Pump Co. and with further recognition of the fact that the Department of State has made no request for the services as a Federal employee of Mr. Gardner for work in Formosa, although it interposes no objection to Mr. Gardner's employment by the Johnston international provided he accepts such employment as a private citizen and not as an official of Government, this letter informs you that Mr. Gardner's services as a Government employee of the United States Bureau of Reclamation either on active duty or on leave of absence are not now available.

On tl.e other hand, it is entirely up to Mr. Gardner, the Johnston Pump Co., and, I presume, the State Department as to whether Mr. Gardner desires to accept your employment as a private citizen.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL W. STRAUS,
Commissioner.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Permit me to complete my present statement, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. President, it seems to me that here is a clear indication of a lack of coordination and cooperation between several departments of the executive branch of the Government of the United States. Let us now review the situation.

The Republic of China is still recognized by the Government of the United States. The President of the United States on several occasions, even at the time he at first denied military aid to the Republic of China, said that it was the policy of the Government of the United States to continue economic aid. As a matter of fact, that economic aid has been continued under the ECA.

We now have a mission on the island of Formosa. Here is a request by an American firm which has been employed by the Government of China to go to Formosa and increase the water supply. For what purpose? So that the Formosans may increase the production of sugar and rice, thereby improve the economy of Formosa and make it possible for the island at least to reach an approximation of self-sufficiency. The surplus rice and the surplus food is not only needed to feed the people on the island, but their export surplus goes to Japan, where it is vitally needed in the economy of Japan to support the work General MacArthur is doing.

Despite the fact that the Department of State has said that in their judgment they believe that Mr. Gardner should be released, despite the fact that it is clearly within the practical confines of the point 4 program, despite all those conditions, the effort to have Mr. Gardner go to Formosa is meeting with all kinds of Government red tape and road blocks.

The story was so amazing when it was first presented to me that I could not believe it. I took the matter up before the Committee on Appropriations when Mr. Dean Rusk appeared. He promised to look into the matter, which he did. The record shows that the Department of State apparently has tried to cooperate in this matter.

Not having had an answer to the letter I wrote to Secretary Chapman I called him on the telephone. Apparently in the very busy office which he operates in the Department of the Interior the letter had not come to his personal attention, though it had been addressed to him by a Member of the Senate of the United States. As a matter of routine I suppose it had been sent to the Bureau of Reclamation. Mr. Secretary Chapman assured me that he would look into the matter. While in the normal pursuits of business they do not like to release their employees, he felt that there were undoubtedly extenuating circumstances in this case, and that he would take the matter up with Mr. Straus at an early date. In the meantime Mr. Straus not only once verbally, but in writing, has turned this matter down again.

This morning I again checked up on the situation, this now being the 5th of July, and time is passing. If Mr. Gardner's presence in Formosa is to be of any value he ought to go there now. With the utmost charity, Mr. President, I may say that there is not a business organization, large or small, in the United States that could not have solved this problem by two 5-cent telephone calls in 10 minutes time on a matter of this urgency and this importance and of this practical advantage. Yet we find that Government red tape, and lack of cooperation, and lack of coordination between two executive branches of the Government is jeopardizing the economy of Formosa, is jeopardizing the job ECA is trying to do on Formosa and is undermining the general development in that area of the world. I say, Mr. President, it is a shocking example of the lack of coordination that exists.

This country is facing serious times. I only hope and pray that if the chips get down we can operate the Federal Government in its executive branch more efficiently than we are operating it in this particular case.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish to make an observation and ask a question. It is clear from what happened in this case that the project in question would be one normally considered to be part of the point 4 program; at least as to the survey and the advice with respect to the installation of the water system or wells in Formosa.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Nationalist Government or the Formosan Government has started, as a private project, using the Johnston Pump Co. to furnish personnel and the pumps for these particular wells.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct. The Government of the Republic of Formosa, which is temporarily on the island, has asked that this be done.

Mr. FERGUSON. The United States Government now has in its employ an expert who could go to Formosa and give aid and advice for only a few months?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Two months is all the request covers.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not this case indicate to the Senator from California that the idea behind the point 4 program is to build up bureaucracy so the Government may do this job alone? Here is one of the first cases we have had under the point 4 program where private enterprise has gone into Formosa and has undertaken to do a job. They find themselves in a position where they could use a Government expert, who could be taken off the Government payroll and employed at the company's own private expense, and used in what would be called a point 4 program project. Now the private company is unable to operate in this way because the Government seems to indicate, at least, that it is not interested in having private enterprise do this job, but is interested in having the Government do it with Government employees.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say that the facts, which have been fully documented in this case, would tend to bear out the Senator's theory about what was behind this matter, at least so far as some persons are concerned.

Mr. FERGUSON. This effort started in the early part of June, did it not?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. The United States placed a police force in Korea on the 27th day of June, and it was announced that we would at least see that there would be no attack on Formosa. Since the 27th of June, up until today, July 5, no change has occurred in regard to sending this man Gardner to Formosa under this private employment. Is that correct?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from Michigan really has brought out the point I wished to make. The Senator from California twice used the phrase "lack of coordination." It seems to me that it is a question of lack of coordination between the Government and private industry. The Senator from California voted for point 4, and so did I. I know that I did so with the idea that the bulk of point 4 would be accomplished by private industry, and that the idea was to stimulate private industry. However, in this instance, although there was an opportunity to do so for a very short period of time, the Government has fallen down.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator is absolutely correct in his statement that it not only demonstrates, as I previously pointed out, a lack of coordination and cooperation between two departments of the Federal Government, but it shows a woeful lack of cooperation and coordination with American private enterprise, which has a great deal to offer in connection with doing the practical work of the point 4 program.

Mr. President, although probably I shall wish to discuss this matter further and shall wish to keep the Senate fully advised in regard to developments, at this time I am not complaining of the action of the Department of State, because this morning I was informed by the Department of State that on Monday it had written another letter to the Department of the Interior, giving its approval of the release of Mr. Gardner.

Today my office has been trying to ascertain from the Department of the Interior what, if anything, it is going to do about this matter.

When I talked with the Secretary of the Interior, I was hopeful that at least at that level in the Department there was an understanding of the problem and its practical applications, and that he would do everything he could to cut the red tape. However, apparently in the Bureau of Reclamation, and particularly with Mr. Michael Straus, the Commissioner, there is not that willingness to cooperate on this program. I do not know for what reason Mr. Straus is turning down this matter; but I can say that certainly its effect is to sabotage a very useful, constructive program which may mean a great deal in the stabilization on the island of Formosa from an economic point of view, and which directly affects the national defense of the United States, because the President himself now has declared that it is not in our national interest to permit the island of Formosa to fall into unfriendly hands.

I hope that as a result of what has been done in the Appropriations Committee and as a result of what has been done in conversations we have had with the responsible persons, they will now cut the red tape and will demonstrate both to the Senate and to the country that the Federal Government is not so inefficient that it cannot funcion when the need arises.

THE RAILROAD STRIKE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an editorial entitled "Not a 'War' Issue," appearing in yesterday's New York Times. I wish to read excerpts from the editorial, and then I shall comment thereon and shall ask to have the entire editorial printed as a part of my remarks.

I now read from the editorial:

NOT A "WAR" ISSUE

Senator MORSE, of Oregon, called upon the President yesterday to take whatever steps may be necessary to end the railway switchmen's strike, because, said he, "We are at war." The union and the railroads, he declared "owe it to the American people to get together and negotiate a settlement."

We agree with Senator MORSE that the President should step into the picture without further delay.

Mr. President, I cannot resist saying that I am both complimented and surprised that the New York Times would ever print in an editorial a statement that it agrees on anything with the junior Senator from Oregon. However, I would not have anyone be misled by that sentence in the editorial in the New York Times, because the editorial goes on to add so many qualifications that its agreement with me soon vanishes into thin air.

I read further from the editorial:

But to invoke the argument that the Nation is at war is, in our opinion, to divert attention from the real issue. And it is merely confusing that issue needlessly to refer to this week-old tie-up of a large segment of the Nation's transportation system as if it were the joint and equal responsibility of the union and the carriers.

Of course, Mr. President, the record will speak for itself. Nowhere in my comments did I so much as imply that in the case of the present tie-up there was equal responsibility between the union and the carriers. I shall have more to say on that point in the course of my remarks.

What I wish to do by way of friendly service to the New York Times is to inform them a little about the Railway Labor Act of 1926, which is mentioned in the editorial, although apparently the editorial writer has never read that act, because had he read it he could not—being an honest journalist, as I am sure he is—have written an editorial quite so misleading as this particular editorial is.

I read further from the editorial:

There is only one issue here, and it does not in any way involve the question of whether the Nation is or is not legally, technically or substantively at war. It is the issue of whether the railroad unions are to be permitted to continue with impunity ignoring the clear-cut intent of the Railway Labor Act. More specifically, it is whether they are to continue to abide by the recommendations of Presidential fact-finding boards only when such recommendations meet with their approval, reserving to themselves the unilateral privilege of resorting to the strike on those occasions when they disapprove.

Let me say to the writer of this editorial in the New York Times that he is quite mistaken in the implications of the paragraph I have just read. There is nothing in the Railway Labor Act which supports the conclusion of this editorial writer that it was the intent of the framers of the act that the recommendations of an emergency board should automatically be accepted by the parties. I simply do not understand why the point of view seems to be so prevalent in the American press, that the Railway Labor Act in effect created a board of compulsory arbitration. It did just the opposite, Mr. President. I do not know why great, powerful newspapers, such as the New York Times, cannot be accurate about such things as these. They owe it to the public to be accurate.

The Railway Labor Act specifically provides that after an emergency board has handed down its recommendations, 30 days shall be allowed, known as a 30-day cooling-off period, for the parties to decide whether they want to accept the recommendations of the emergency board or resort to economic action. The language of the Railway Labor Act of 1926 makes as clear as the English language can make it, the fact that the recommendations of an emergency board are not binding upon the parties to a railway labor dispute, but that, following the recommendations of an emergency board, and after 30 days have elapsed, the parties shall be free, if they so desire, to resort to economic action.

Newspapermen should read the Railway Labor Act of 1926 before they undertake to advise the American public as to what it is all about. The attempt in recent years by a large segment of the American press to give the impression that every time the railway brotherhoods do not automatically accept the recommendations of an emergency board, they are then violating the spirit and intent of the Railway Labor Act, is giving the American people misinformation in regard to that act.

I know a little bit about this matter, Mr. President, because in 1941 I was chairman of an emergency board. It has been said—I do not say it, but it has been said in print by many—that probably at that time there occurred the most serious railway case that has confronted the country in a great many years. The brotherhoods did not accept the recommendations of my board. I said then I thought they were mistaken in not accepting the board's recommendations. But not once during that period of controversy with the brotherhoods—and I had a serious controversy with the brotherhoods—did the junior Senator from Oregon, then chairman of the emergency board, ever so much as intimate that the brotherhoods did not have the legal right to refuse to accept the board's recommendations if they wanted to, because the act clearly gives them that right.

It is not fair to give the American people the impression that in some way, somehow, railroad brotherhoods are acting illegally and wrongfully when they refuse to accept the recommendations of an emergency board. I happen to be a lawyer who believes that the law ought to be applied as it is written, and so long as the Railway Labor Act is phrased as it presently is, brotherhoods have a perfect right, if they desire, to refuse to accept a decision or recommendation of the emergency board.

I shall have something to say in a moment about the question of their wisdom in following the course of action they have been following in respect to emergency board reports, but I first want the record straight, as a matter of accuracy, and to correct what I think is the clear misinformation that is being spread by such editorials as that which appeared in the New York Times of yesterday. Let us go to another paragraph of this editorial:

There is no question here of the union and the railroads "getting together" on a settlement.

Incidentally, Mr. President, it is the only question. It is the only question that now confronts the railways and the brotherhoods, as I shall expand upon in a moment. But let me answer the point stated in the editorial. The question is one of the brotherhood's and the carriers getting together for a settlement. They both have a serious duty which they owe the American people to get together, and to get together quickly, for the reasons I shall shortly set forth.

But to return to the editorial:

This dispute went through the negotiation stage many months ago. It was ultimately carried to the court of last resort under the Railway Labor Act, a Presidential fact-finding body, and that body, after careful study of the issues, made specific recommendations for a settlement. The railroads accepted these recommendations. The unions, resorting to a pattern that has become all too familiar in recent years, denounced them, and resorted to the weapon of the strike.

I think I have made my point already in regard to the language of this editorial, which talks about the court of last resort, under the mistaken notion that an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act of 1926 is a court. It is no such thing at all. It merely happens to be an advisory board. That is all it is. It is merely an advisory board set up by the President to advise—interestingly enough—the President of the United States, the parties, and the public, as to how the board, after it has studied the case by way of fact finding, thinks a dispute should be settled. One cannot read into the Railway Labor Act any intention of compulsion on the part of the framers of the act when they wrote it. To the contrary, the act was so phrased as to eliminate any compulsion. The act was so written as to retain the freedom on the part of the parties to the disputes to resort to economic action if they so decided.

I wish my good friend from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] were here on the floor. He is not here, because he is where, in a real sense, the junior Senator from Oregon probably should be. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is meeting just outside the Senate floor, and I am going there as quickly as I finish the speech I am now making. But I told the chairman that I wanted to make these remarks before I went to the committee meeting. The Senator from Missouri, a member of the committee, is there, and I am sure he will read my remarks and make such comments as he desires. I refer to this bill now because it is pertinent to what I want to say by way of concluding my own remarks. If we wanted the type of bill which apparently the writer of the New York Times editorial yesterday seems to think the 1926 Railway Labor Act is—which it is not—then we would pass the bill which has been introduced by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, which provides for compulsory arbitration and which would make the emergency boards, which are in fact advisory boards, courts of last resort.

I do not intend this afternoon to comment further on the Donnell bill, other than to say that the junior Senator from Oregon will oppose it as vigorously as he has ever opposed a piece of legislation in the Senate of the United States. I refuse to surrender the notion that American employers and American workers can sit down in keeping with the American principle of voluntaryism and settle major disputes around a collective bargaining table, assisted by good-faith mediation and voluntary arbitration. I am not going to support a bill that is going to establish a precedent whereby the Government of the United States, through a compulsory tribunal, may step in and start to take over, on a compulsory basis, the relationships between American employers and American workers. If we ever break down the sort of voluntaryism which should characterize those relationships, then we shall move directly toward an economic state controlled by the Government.

Although I know my good friend from Missouri completely disagrees with my conclusion in that respect, I shall oppose his bill, Mr. President, because I think it establishes a bad precedent of government control of a segment of the national economy, if we should start with the railroads we would move into the electric utilities, into the mines, into the merchant marine, and the junior Senator from Oregon fears that in too short a time the Government of the United States would be exercising compulsory control over those human and economic relationships between employers and workers which I do not want to have my Government exercise, because I cannot see the end of that road, and I fear that around the turn of that road is a state economy.

No Member of the Senate is more strongly opposed to a state economy than is the Senator from Missouri, the author of the Donnell bill; but I refuse to take second place to him in opposition to a state economy. I insist that I am equally opposed to it. I am so opposed to it, Mr. President, that I shall not go along with him on the basis of a compulsory-arbitration bill for the settlement of labor disputes in the railway industry, because, in my opinion, it will be only a precedent for the adoption of the same kind of Government compulsion in the case of a great many principal industries.

Feeling as I do about it, Mr. President, no one should be surprised that last week, before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, again on Monday, before the same committee, and twice on the floor of the Senate, the junior Senator from Oregon has tried to focus administration attention on the seriousness of the pending and existing railway strike. We are now confronted with a strike which really has brought to a standstill four railroad systems and has greatly hampered a fifth. We read each day in the newspapers of a threat of a much larger strike on July 15. This is July 5, and time is precious. Once again, as happens so many times in matters of this kind, time is of the essence.

I have read the report of the emergency board on the pending case. As I have said before, I do not agree with the conclusions of the brotherhoods in respect to the merits of that report. I think it is a good report, as reports go. When we take into account the pros and cons of the various demands made by the brotherhoods in that case, I think the emergency board did a good job. It is one thing, Mr. President, to be a party litigant at a counsel table before a Presidential emergency board, but it is quite a different thing to sit on the bench, so-called, as a member of such a board, charged, after all, with one overpowering obligation, namely, to make recommendations fair to the parties, but in the public interest. It is natural that the parties litigant to these great railway cases, because after all, they are moving from the standpoint of a party bias, cannot always see as clearly the public interest as can three or five men sitting upon a Presidential fact-finding board. I think the emergency board which handed down its decision in the pending case demonstrated very clearly, as I read the decision, that it carried out a devotion to high public duty and public interest. I think the Board did a good job in its report, and I regret that the brotherhoods did not accept its recommendations. If conditions were normal, I would not be heard to raise my voice as I am now raising it today and as I raised it last week, saying to the brotherhoods—and I repeat it today—"I do not think you have any right or any justification, in view of new conditions created by the international crisis, to resort to economic action now."

I mean that, Mr. President. I have worked a great many years in the field of labor relations. I know how difficult it is, after the die has been cast and certain action has been taken, to get either employers or unions to reverse that action, unless procedures are established—and I am using the words advisedly—which will make it possible to lead the parties into a reversal or at least a modification of a previously taken position. That is the job which confronts us in this railway emergency.

I, too, sometimes wish that I could press some magical button that would change human nature for at least a few hours, so that we could accomplish certain results which we consider to be desirable. But we cannot change human nature.

So, at this time, Mr. President, as he did last week, the junior Senator from Oregon, in view of the fact that the brotherhoods in the railway case, so far as their legal right is concerned, contrary to the implication of the New York Times editorial of yesterday, are acting within their prerogatives under the Railway Labor Act, suggests that the administration, at the White House level—and I think the situation is sufficiently serious so that the President himself should call upon the parties to sit down and work out a settlement in mediation—take such action as I have suggested. I believe the result could be accomplished within 5 hours.

Yes, Mr. President, I think we are at war. I said that last Monday. I have been subjected to some criticism because I dared to say it; but if we were with the American troops in Korea this afternoon we would know we were at war. It does not mean much to an American boy who is fighting in Korea this afternoon to be told that it is only a police action or a minor dispute. As I said on Monday, when the American flag goes forward in combat let us be realists and face the fact that we are at war. How serious that war may become, only God himself knows. But I shall continue, Mr. President, to take the position that now is the time for quick action on the part of those of us who are on the home front, far away from where the bullets are flying, to get our economy into shape just as rapidly as we can in order to meet any greater emergency that may develop in the hours, to say nothing of the days, immediately ahead.

Because I know something about the railroad industry, Mr. President, I shall continue to say to the brotherhoods and the carriers: "Neither one of you, neither side to this dispute, can justify sitting on your haunches refusing to get together on a mediation settlement quickly, in a matter of hours, so that the four railroads may resume operations, the fifth railroad, which is practically paralyzed, may resume full operations, and it may be made clear to the farmers and the manufacturers of America that freight is going to move fast and freely from coast to coast in the light of the great emergency which confronts us."

Mr. President, I may say also that neither side is justified in taking the position that they will not even discuss changes in the report of the emergency board. To take such a position is to be anything but realistic with regard to this case. Therefore, once again I say to the President of the United States, as I said last Monday, "I believe a word from you, Mr. President, to the parties to the effect that it is your wish as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States that there be removed at once from the American domestic scene this economic disruption, which threatens to do great damage to our efforts in the emergency which confronts us, would cause both parties to meet in a hotel behind closed doors, and to come forth with an agreement settling the issues." Such a course of action would not be in violation of the spirit and intent of the Railway Labor Act of 1926. It would be in complete harmony with the framework of the act of 1926, because not one word in the act is compulsory in nature, so far as the acceptance of a recommendation of an emergency board is concerned.

I have made these statements today in the hope that some word to that effect cause leaders within the carriers and leaders within the brotherhoods to come to their senses and perform what I think is their high patriotic duty to the American people. I have made these remarks because I thought they could be called to the attention of the President of the United States, that the President would agree that at least they contain some horse sense, and that he would call the parties on the telephone, if he did not want to send them a written message, and say to them, "As Commander in Chief, the time has come for you men to reach a settlement, and reach it now." Mr. President, I think it would work.

In closing, I want to say to my good friend from Missouri, who has now come on the floor, that I made some comments during his absence, in which I set forth some of my reasons for being opposed to his bill. I am sure that when he reads those comments he will find that I have not said anything which I had not said previously both in committee and on the floor of the Senate. Of course, I shall always be glad to hear his rebuttal to my comments. I know the Senator from Missouri never lacks for rebuttal. I am sure the record will speak for itself as to the spirit and intent which motivated the junior Senator from Oregon in making the suggestions he has made this afternoon. I have but one motivating desire, and that is to be helpful in seeing that the railway strike comes to an immediate end.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Not a 'War' Issue," published in the New York Times on July 4, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT A "WAR" ISSUE

Senator MORSE, of Oregon, called upon the President yesterday to take whatever steps may be necessary to end the railway switchmen's strike, because, said he, "we are at war." The union and the railroads, he declared, "owe it to the American people to get together and negotiate a settlement."

We agree with Senator MORSE that the President should step into the picture without further delay. But to invoke the argument that the Nation is at war is, in our opinion, to divert attention from the real issue. And it is merely confusing that issue needlessly to refer to this week-old tie-up of a large segment of the Nation's transportation system as if it were the joint and equal responsibility of the union and the carriers.

There is only one issue here, and it does not in any way involve the question of whether the Nation is or is not legally, technically, or substantively "at war." It is the issue of whether the railroad unions are to be permitted to continue with impunity ignoring the clear-cut intent of the Railway Labor Act. More specifically, it is whether they are to continue to abide by the recommendations of Presidential fact-finding boards only when such recommendations meet with their approval, reserving to themselves the unilateral privilege of resorting to the strike on those occasions when they disapprove.

There is no question here of the union and the railroads "getting together" on a settlement. This dispute went through the negotiation stage many months ago. It was ultimately carried to the court of last resort under the Railway Labor Act, a Presidential fact-finding body, and that body, after careful study of the issues, made specific recommendations for a settlement. The railroads accepted these recommendations. The unions, resorting to a pattern that has become all too familiar in recent years, denounced them, and resorted to the weapon of the strike.

That this strike should be halted by Presidential action is, needless to say, the more urgent in view of the present international emergency. But such action should not take the form of an appeal to union patriotism, which has nothing to do with the case. The President should act out of a decent respect for his own fact-finding board, and because such action is imperative if we are to preserve the integrity of the Railway Labor Act itself. That law was enacted by Congress for the express purpose of avoiding the very kind of interruption with the Nation's economic life represented by the present strike of the railway switchmen.

Mr. McFARLAND and Mr. DONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the Senator from Missouri wish me to yield for some purpose?

Mr. DONNELL. I desire to secure the floor in my own right in order to make certain remarks.

Mr. McFARLAND. I was going to suggest the absence of a quorum. If the Senator wishes me to yield for a few minutes, I am willing to do so.

Mr. DONNELL. It would be quite agreeable for me to proceed at this time if the Senator is willing that that be done.

Mr. McFARLAND. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the portion of the remarks which I heard the Senator from Oregon make, which was the concluding portion, and I shall with much interest, I am sure, read the complete remarks which he has made today. I think it is of very great importance that the attention of the American people should be focused upon the present industrial situation of the railroads. I believe that to be particularly true because of the fact that there is now pending before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate a bill, S. 3463, which, if enacted into law, would make unlawful any strike or any lock-out by a carrier arising out of or in connection with a dispute falling within the purview of the Railway Labor Act.

Mr. President, I placed in the RECORD at an earlier hour today certain observations and items from newspapers of current date. I have subsequently noted other items, which I think should be placed in the RECORD at this time. One of them is an article appearing in the Topeka (Kans.) Capital, which is entitled "Rail Strike, Car Shortage Hurts Harvest—Western Farmers Pile Grain on Ground as Elevators Close."

The first three paragraphs read as follows:

A railroad strike and boxcar shortage, coupled with a diminishing supply of fuel, threatens to make the 1950 Kansas wheat harvest a hard one. Some elevators are already closed down because of lack of transportation to move wheat.

In western Kansas there probably will be a large quantity of wheat piled on the ground. Eastern Kansas farmers may have to leave it in the fields for want of storage space.

The switchmen's strike against the Rock Island Railroad has left some areas critically short of fuel to operate trucks and combines. An emergency office was set up in Hutchinson Monday with headquarters at the C. W. Kelly trucking firm. Kelly was appointed by Gov. Frank Carlson as coordinator to see that wheat harvest machinery fuel is supplied in areas affected by the strike.

I read further:

The Governor said the State corporation commission, Kansas highway patrol, and State commission of revenue and taxation would cooperate in moving fuel as fast as possible.

The article continues:

No hope for cars.

Boxcars are still in demand everywhere where wheat cutting is in progress. Elevator men say that railroad officials have given them no hope of any relief. One elevator man at Russell said about 50 cars a day are needed but "we are lucky if we get 5."

I should like to recall to the attention of the Senate the fact that a few days ago mention was made on the floor of the fact that in the current railway strike against the five railroads referred to in the concluding remarks of the Senator from Oregon there are idle a number of freight cars estimated by Mr. Loomis, of the Western Railroad Association, at a conservative figure in his judgment to be 60,000 cars, and in his opinion approaching more nearly 80,000 cars. That number of cars is idle because of the pendency of the railway strike against the five midwestern and western railroads.

Mr. President, I read a further headline from the Minneapolis Tribune of July 4, 1950. It illustrates the permeations of this strike, the fact that it has all kinds of effects upon the public welfare. It also emphasizes the fact, which needs so much emphasis, that in railway disputes there are not merely two parties at issue, not merely the employees on the one hand and the employers on the other, but that the great mass of the people of the country, somewhere between one hundred and forty and one hundred and fifty million people, are involved in railway strikes, perhaps not all of them in any one immediate strike of a local nature, or even of a sectional nature, but nevertheless the public is the third party in interest, and to my mind is the party whose interest is paramount and predominant.

The article in the Minneapolis Tribune of July 4, 1950, is entitled "Rail Strike Delays Mail Deliveries." I read the article, as follows:

A railroad switchmen's strike is causing inconvenience and in some cases 24-hour delays in mail deliveries, but all mail is moving. Axel F. Palmquist, upper Midwest director of postal transportation for the United States Postal Department, said Monday.

The strike is against five lines, three of which operate in this area, the Rock Island, Great Western, and Great Northern railroads. It began June 25. The Rock Island and Great Western have discontinued all service. The Great Northern has withdrawn some runs.

In Minneapolis mail handlers at the Great Northern depot are employed by the railroads. They are respecting picket lines of striking switchmen and not going to work.

"Consequently," said Palmquist, "the Postal Department is unable to clear any mail through the Great Northern depot, either outgoing or incoming."

As a result any mail for Minneapolis from trains from the West is sent on through the Great Northern depot to St. Paul and then carried back to Minneapolis by a fleet of mail trucks.

Mail from Minneapolis into Great Northern and Northern Pacific trains (Northern Pacific is not being struck but is affected because it uses the Great Northern depot) is trucked to the St. Paul Union Depot.

Mail handlers at the St. Paul Union Depot and the Milwaukee depot in Minneapolis are not railroad employees but are employed by the depot companies.

John R. Coan, Minneapolis postmaster, said the strike seriously interferes with the movement of parcel post. So far, first-class mail is going through O. K.

Palmquist said that in no case did the strike cause a delay of more than 24 hours. The 24-hour delay, he said, was caused in a few cases on lines such as the Northern Pacific from the Twin Cities to International Falls, Minn., where there is only one train a day.

Mr. President, I call attention again to the fact that the Northern Pacific is not on strike, yet the communities along the line of the Northern Pacific are thus directly affected.

I observe also in this newspaper, the Minneapolis Tribune of yesterday, another item, from Bismarck, N. Dak., as follows:

RAIL STRIKE HALTS NORTH DAKOTA HIGHWAY WORK

BISMARCK, N. DAK.—The Great Northern Railway switchmen's strike Monday halted highway construction projects in the northern half of North Dakota.

N. O. Jones, State highway commissioner, said one concrete surfacing job and several black-topping projects already have been or soon will be stopped by the lack of materials. A concrete surfacing job north of Grand Forks was halted last week by lack of cement and gravel.

Stoppage of oil shipments on the railroad has halted, or soon will, black-topping work near Dunseith, Grenora, Alamo, and north of Devils Lake.

Again, Mr. President, we see the ramifications of this strike. We are told it is a strike on merely a few railroads, just 5, and by only a few thousand switchmen, I believe 4,000. Yet the repercussions of the strike are widespread and varied in their content and effect.

The Minneapolis Tribune of July 2 contains a front-page story under the headline "Strike Enters Second Week—Losses Mount." I read from the article:

The strike of AFL switchmen against five western railroads enters its second week today with railroad-revenue and wage losses mounting.

The Switchmen's Union of North America called the strike last Sunday to enforce demands for 48 hours' pay for a 40-hour week.

Pickets continue to march in front of the Minneapolis and St. Paul depots served by the Great Northern, one of the struck lines. But the Switchmen's Union said they had found it not "unnecessary" to continue to picket the Twin Cities ticket offices.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire article from the Minneapolis Tribune, from which I have just been reading, be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURRAY in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRIKE ENTERS SECOND WEEK; LOSSES MOUNT

The strike of AFL switchmen against five western railroads enters its second week today with railroad-revenue and wage losses mounting.

The Switchmen's Union of North America called the strike last Sunday to enforce demands for 48 hours' pay for a 40-hour week.

Pickets continued to march in front of the Minneapolis and St. Paul depots served by the Great Northern, one of the struck lines. But the Switchmen's Union said they had found it "unnecessary" to continue to picket the Twin Cities ticket offices.

Other struck lines include the Chicago Great Western; Rock Island; Denver & Rio Grande; and Western Pacific. All except Great Northern have ceased operations.

A Rock Island official estimated his road has lost more than $3,000,000 in gross operating revenues. A Great Western official said his line has lost more than half a million.

Great Northern and the two remaining lines made no estimates.

The Great Northern has discontinued nearly 100 freight and passenger-freight trains on main and secondary lines, but none in the last 48 hours.

Friday night the company closed operations in its locomotive and repair shops at St. Paul, Superior, Wis., St. Cloud, Minn., Great Falls, Mont., and Spokane, Wash.

The company released about 850 employees in St. Paul, 450 in Superior, 425 in St. Cloud, 200 in Great Falls, and 350 in Spokane.

Of its 28,000 employees all but about 3,500 now have been idled by the strike.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, away out in Nevada, the Winnemucca Humboldt Star contains an interesting article published June 26 showing the widespread effect of the strike. The headline is, "Three Hundred Men Out of Work in Walk-Out Here."

I do not know how large a town Winnemucca is. The circulation of the newspaper is 2,386, yet we find in that community 300 men are out of work. I read from the article:

At least 300 men in road and yard crews have been thrown out of work in Winnemucca by the switchmen's strike which has crippled four of the West's railroads, it was reported here today.

All jobs were canceled on the Western Pacific when the strike began, and will remain canceled as long as the strike goes on.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be set forth in full at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THREE HUNDRED MEN OUT OF WORK IN WALK-OUT HERE

At least 300 men in road and yard crews have been thrown out of work in Winnemucca by the switchmen's strike which has crippled four of the West's railroads, it was reported here today.

All jobs were canceled on the Western Pacific when the strike began, and will remain canceled as long as the strike goes on.

A. W. Taylor, of Portola, trainmaster of the Portola to Elko section of the Western Pacific, said that a 24-hour shift of clerks and the yardmaster here will work until all employees have been laid off, then they themselves will stop work for the duration of the strike.

ALL WORK TO STOP

Nobody will be working here, including all section crews, after today, Taylor said.

The last train to go through Winnemucca was a fruit perishable freight at 1:15 a. m. Sunday.

COMPANIES WELL STOCKED

Most of those Winnemucca companies which receive shipments over Western Pacific normally have switched to truck transport. For example, the Associated, Shell, and Standard Oil Co.'s said that they either already have or are about to begin receiving shipments by truck. The Winnemucca Propane Co., with plenty of gas on hand, will get a truck shipment of gas sometime next week if the strike lasts.

Most of the city's and county's food is shipped in by truck under normal conditions, so little hardship is expected in that respect.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article from the Davenport, Iowa, Times of June 28. Davenport of course is a sizable city. The circulation of this newspaper is 29,835. The article says:

AUSTIN CRABBS TO SUSPEND, DUE TO RAILROAD STRIKE—BUILDING MATERIALS COMPANY HIT BY SWITCHMEN'S TIE-UP

Closing of Austin Crabbs, Inc., manufacturers of concrete blocks, to take effect tonight, was announced today as the most serious local effect of the switchmen's strike.

The company announced that it did not have enough finished blocks on hand to complete projects already under way, and that inability to get materials forced the shutdown. About 30 employees will be affected. The plant is located at the foot of Farragut Street.

The W. G. Block Co., whose ready-mixed concrete figures in many building operations in this vicinity, reported they had enough supplies on hand to be able to operate on a normal basis for probably 3 weeks.

Meanwhile other industries in the quad-cities were continuing to feel the pinch caused by suspension of operations by Rock Island Lines, especially where firms do not have track access to the Milwaukee or Burlington lines.

Diversion of freight over the latter two roads can be effective only to a limited degree, it is pointed out, with the time when shipments will become increasingly delayed and congested approaching steadily nearer.

Mail service was continuing to operate under handicaps imposed by the strike, with consequent delays, and passenger service was dependent on busses and diversionary routes to points east and west of here.

Mr. President, I have in my hand an article from the Ottumwa (Iowa) Courier of June 28 entitled "Switchmen's Strike Creates Problem Here." I read from the article:

The railway switchmen's strike has created a major merchandise handling problem for a substantial section of Ottumwa's business and industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be set forth in full at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SWITCHMEN'S STRIKE CREATES PROBLEM HERE

The railway switchmen's strike has created a major merchandise, handling problem for a substantial section of Ottumwa's business and industry.

Due to the location of the Rock Island rail tracks here, that road, which was idled by the strike, normally handles approximately half the rail freight deliveries made in Ottumwa. And, because of the strike, other railroads in Ottumwa are not permitted to make deliveries on the Rock Island switching facilities.

For that reason double handling and trucking of merchandise to and from freight cars on other roads is necessary. The total amount of that extra trucking and double handling has not been exactly determined, but it will probably average a dozen freight cars a day.

The Iowa Southern Utilities Co., which burns between six and seven cars of coal a day, is one notable example. A part of the ISU coal is purchased from the Haines mines at Eldon and is normally shipped to Ottumwa by Rock Island freight. It is now being brought to Ottumwa by truck.

A number of wholesale and industrial firms are also located along the Rock Island tracks from the Haw Hardware Co. on the east to the Ottumwa Shipping Container Co. on the west.

Jack Raney, manager of the shipping container firm, said his company must haul its output five blocks to a Burlington loading track and truck incoming materials to the plant from the same point. This means double handling and cartage for eight carloads a week.

The Lagomarcino-Grupe Co. receives from one to five carloads of merchandise a day, according to Spencer Smith, who said this merchandice must now be trucked in from the Burlington or Milwaukee railroad tracks, a costly and tedious operation.

Both the Witwer and Western grocery companies and the J. W. Edgerly Co. have the same shipping and receiving problem, as do other merchandise firms and industrial concerns located on the Rock Island switch tracks.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, away out on the West Coast the Tacoma News Tribune, of Tacoma, Wash., under date of June 28, contained an article with the headline "Rail strike delays mail." The article reads:

Uncle Sam is delivering his mail as rapidly as possible in view of the railway labor dispute, Tacoma's Acting Postmaster John P. McMonagle said Wednesday.

Mail from the east is being moved to the Seattle-Tacoma airport by Seattle postoffice truck and relayed from the airport to Tacoma by truck on Tacoma-to-airport runs. This causes some disruption of routine but no inconvenience to postal patrons in this city, McMonagle said.

Mail from the South, however, is a day late as far as home delivery is concerned. Prior to the rail dispute, the mail train arrived here at 5:30 a. m., which enabled the post office to sort the mail for home delivery the same day. At present, however, the train arrival time is 11 a. m., which makes home delivery the same day impossible.

Mr. President, I have an article from the Salt Lake City Telegram dated June 29, under the headline "Railroad strike idles 1,100 at Utah smelter."

Utah Smelter is not being struck so far as I know. The trouble is the result of the A. F. L. Switchmen's Union strike. The opening sentence of the article is as follows:

The A. F. L. switchmen's union strike, now in its fifth day, was being felt more in Utah as 1,100 men in the American Smelting & Refining Plant at Garfield were idled Thursday after the A. F. L. union posted a picket line.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article may be set forth at length at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAILROAD STRIKE IDLES 1,100 AT UTAH SMELTER—PICKETING SWITCHMEN HALT OPERATION OF GARFIELD PLANT

The AFL switchmen's union strike, now in its fifth day, was being felt more in Utah as 1,100 men in the American Smelting & Refining Plant at Garfield were idled Thursday after the AFL union posted a picket line.

As the strike gets older it continues to have a damaging effect on Utah's economy. Trucks have had to be put into use by the Chicago Bridge & Iron Co., 550 West Seventeenth South, and the Eastern Iron & Metal Co., 634 South Fourth West, to keep materials moving in and out. The switching at these plants is done by the Denver & Rio Grande, one of the railroads in the country affected by the strike.

The two Salt Lake City firms, however, have not had to reduce working forces.

AFFECTS 13,000 RAILMEN

The strike, which also hit the Western Pacific Railroad Co., has idled 4,500 on that line in California, Nevada, and Utah. The Rio Grande has been forced to lay off employees until upward of 8,500 in Utah and Colorado have been idled.

F. K. Macaulay, secretary-treasurer of the AFL switchmen's local, said Thursday that picketing will continue at the Garfield plant as long as the strike continues. The Garfield workers are members of a CIO union and are respecting the picket lines.

"Our men will not picket any places served by the Rio Grande unless the firms attempt to do their own switching," said Mr. Macaulay.

The strike so far has not affected operations at the Kennecott Copper Corp., Utah division. Company officials said ore concentrates are being stockpiled at the Arthur and Magna mills. The company's new refinery has not been affected, either.

COULD TOUCH PLANT

A prolonged strike would eventually affect the Kennecott Copper operations.

Coal mines in Carbon and Emery Counties served by the D. & R. G. W. have closed, throwing more than 3,300 miners out of work. Another 1,000 men have been idled by the closing of the Horse Canyon mine and the Columbia Coal Co., both operated by the Geneva Steel Co.

The steel company's operations, which have not yet been materially affected by the strike, will have to curtail production if the walk-out continues another 2 weeks, officials said.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Spokane Spokesman-Review of June 29, 1950, has this very graphic and interesting article:

SWITCHMEN'S STRIKE INJURES COMMUNITY

Step by step, the switchmen's strike against the Great Northern Railroad—

Remember, that is the railroad whose operations have been only partially affected. The other four railroads are closed down completely and have been for days. But the article refers to the railroad which is only partially affected. I continue to read.

Step by step, the switchmen's strike against the Great Northern Railroad is restricting the freight and passenger operations of the line. At present there is no suggestion of an agreement which would allow the resumption of a normal schedule.

This strike is resulting in unnecessary hardship, business losses, and inconvenience in this city. Nonstriking employees are being forced out of work—

I emphasize the words "nonstriking employees." Not men who are striking, but those who are not striking are being forced out of work, this newspaper article says, "by lay-offs." I continue to read.

Nonstriking employees are being forced out of work by lay-offs, freight shipments may be delayed. Business and pleasure travelers are confronted with unpredictable schedules.

Mr. President, anyone going to a depot to take a train, standing and waiting an indeterminate period, can well understand something of the inconvenience of those faced with the situation this sentence brings out.

Fortunately—

Says the article—

Spokane is not a one-railroad town.

I pause to say that many towns are, and those which are one-railroad towns are undoubtedly feeling the effect of the strike much more acutely than those which are served by more than one railroad.

As a result—

Says the article—

her travel and economy will not be brought to a standstill. However, the Great Northern's share of the city's operations is a healthy one. The interests of the local residents deprived of work—

"Deprived of work," Mr. President. We talk about liberty and freedom in Fourth of July speeches. We are all entitled to freedom to work, it seems to me, but people are being deprived of work because of the great strike which is in progress. I continue to read:

The interests of the local residents deprived of work and of the public at large demand that every effort be made to return the city's railroad operations to normal.

I call particular attention to this concluding paragraph of the article:

The entire Northwest is suffering from the deadlock. The gains sought through this strike policy would, if achieved, hardly compensate for the loss of good will and income which will certainly result if the present situation is allowed to continue.

Mr. President, I have in my hand also an editorial from the Troy (N. Y.) Record, of June 27, 1950, entitled "Another Rail Strike." I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be set forth at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER RAIL STRIKE

The strike of 4,000 switchmen on fire railroads is not calculated to arouse Nation-wide alarm. That is not because of the greater concern over foreign developments nor yet because the number of workers involved is small. Rather, the small-scale work stoppage is a careful maneuver to apply pressure on the public without arousing a widespread reaction. Nevertheless there is good reason for worry.

The switchmen's strike runs contrary to the prevailing trend in labor relations. The general unrest of a few months back has been replaced by a healthier condition. The General Motors 5-year contract that ended the auto workers' strike is only one sign of settled management-labor relations. In steel, in coal, and in other industries the tendency is to work out agreements to assure peace on the production front. The latest railroad strike, even though it is confined deliberately to five western and midwestern lines, runs against the current.

There is a reason, of course. Evidently the very machinery that has been held up in the past as a model and an example to the rest of American industry is today proving a hindrance rather than a help. Under the Railway Labor Act overnight stoppages are ruled out. The law provides for hearings and reviews in disputed cases. And there are stipulations that require emergency board hearings and reports by fact-finding boards. Even then a 30-day cooling-off period must elapse before a strike can be called.

At one time the legal machinery was credited with insuring the public against strikes of the type that paralyze the country, such as the John L. Lewis coal strikes. But the system was not foolproof; there were occasional breakdowns even in wartime. Now, however, it would seem that the Railway Labor Act is serving no useful purpose. For the country has experienced two railroad strikes in as many months.

On May 10 railroad traffic in 27 States was disrupted by a strike of firemen and enginemen against four lines. It is useless to argue that this or the current strike do not represent a national emergency. The last strike snarled traffic on roads carrying a third of the Nation's passenger traffic and a quarter of its freight. The switchmen's walkout is a blow to the agriculutural States struck at their busiest season. In both instances a national emergency threatens in the course of time. The important thing about these strikes, however, is the failure of once highly regarded adjustment processes to afford an escape valve to prevent the strike blowoff.

Last month's strike of the firemen sought to put a second fireman on Diesels. This month's strike of the switchmen seeks to win a 40-hour workweek with pay for 48 hours. In both cases the determinations of emergency boards and impartial fact finders is ignored. The impatience of railroad workers with the belated shift to 40 hours, a standard widely adopted long before the railroads last fall got around to the shorter week, is understandable. But the refusal of the switchmen to accept emergency board pay rates, which would give a wage increase of 18 cents an hour, fails to take into account the financial solvency of the lines. The workers cannot profit by pushing railroads into bankruptcy. In the two strikes this year the railroad unions are defying Government regulations and are taking the law into their own hands.

By forcing the issue the strikers are demonstrating that the Railway Labor Act is outmoded. They are proving that the carriers, regulated at every turn, are bound hand and foot by Government controls while the unions are free to follow an irresponsible course. The unions are building a case for revision of the law. The strikers are inviting legislation to outlaw work stoppages halting transportation.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I have an editorial from the Portland, Oreg., Journal, of the State from which my distinguished and close friend upon my left, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] hails. It is dated June 23, 1950, and is entitled "Threats of Another Railroad Strike."

There is the threat—

This editorial was published 2 days before the present strike began.

There is the threat of a switchmen's strike on five railroads on June 25. There is the further threat—

Mr. President, this is the most ominous one—

There is the further threat of a strike of conductors and trainmen on July 15.

These are all threats. But the threats are significant.

Yes, Mr. President, they are significant. We had threats of the firemen's strike. It eventuated in a 6-day strike only a month or so ago. We had threats of the strike of the switchmen, and it eventuated in a strike which has already been under way since the 25th of last month; a week and some 3 days I believe it is, today. And, Mr. President, we have before us now the threat of strikes by three great labor organizations in the railway industry, and it is said that a strike will begin on the 15th day of July this year.

The article continues:

These are all threats. But the threats are significant. For years the railway act, with its provisions for fact-finding boards, cooling-off periods, and arbitration, has worked successfully. But during the last year or so, various railroad unions have challenged the act by rejecting the decisions of the fact-finding boards.

Mr. President, I pause to say that I agree with the junior Senator from Oregon in the remarks which I heard him make to the effect that under the Railway Labor Act the employees have the right to refuse to abide by the findings of the fact-finding boards. That is the defect in the act. The bill which I introduced on June 21, S. 3463, is designed to remedy that situation, namely to make it obligatory upon both parties to railway disputes to accept the findings of the Government's fact-finding boards, just as you and I as litigants are obliged to abide by decisions of the courts.

I continue to read from the editorial:

No decisions of any court are worth a tinker's damn unless they are binding and enforceable.

That is what my bill, S. 3463 proposes to do; to provide a decision that is binding and enforceable.

I continue to read the editorial:

If the court or the system is wrong, that can be changed, but there must be a system of settling disputes with justice to all, including—including the public. If the railway unions or the railroad management are dissatisfied with the present system, it is their duty to suggest changes in the system—but it is wrong to sabotage it without suggestions for change.

I call attention to this statement—

One thing is certain—the Nation cannot stand cuts in vital railway service any more than an individual can stand a cut in vital arteries. There must be—

And I read this with emphasis—

There must be a workable system for settling disputes, and all involved must accept the decisions of boards or courts under that system.

That is what my bill proposes to provide—a workable system for settling the disputes, and all involved must accept the decision of the boards under that system.

Finally, Mr. President, I have in my hand an editorial from the Dallas News, of Dallas, Tex., of yesterday, July 4, 1950. The heading is "This question needs decision." It starts off by saying:

The striking AFL switchmen on five major railroads lend emphasis to a point. It happens to be the most important point in management-labor relations. It goes to the very heart of industrial and business solvency. It is simply this: Management cannot function if labor has the unrestricted power to dictate terms of employment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be set forth at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS QUESTION NEEDS DECISION

The striking AFL switchmen on five major railroads lend emphasis to a point. It happens to be the most important point in management-labor relations. It goes to the very heart of industrial and business solvency. It is simply this: Management cannot function if labor has the unrestricted power to dictate terms of employment.

It is wearisome repetition to say that the ills of tyrannical management justified the rise of the labor union movement. It is equally wearisome repetition to say that, given similar tyrannical power, the ills of whip-hand unionism justify the imposition of sufficient restraint, now obviously lacking.

The striking switchmen can force a disastrous stoppage in five major rail lines. This is possible because there is no adequate replacement force to take over their jobs and carry on.

In this instance the switchmen reject the findings of a nonpartisan fact-finding board. There is no evidence that the board has been governed by any consideration except the economic facts at issue. The switchmen rest their case on the individual's economy, not on that of the enterprise in which he works. It is submitted that no business or industrial organization can survive unless it can operate economically and at a profit.

Organized labor's contention since, under the political direction of Mr. Roosevelt, our laws were perverted to build up the organized unions by force (not excluding physical violence) has been that the worker has a vested right in his job. But even if you accept that common sense must note that it is not a right paramount to the economic requirements of his employers. Not unless the business has been socialized.

In the case of the striking switchmen, their chief desire is to socialize rail transport under Government ownership, which would mean that union demands would be met at the expense of the taxpayer and economic management abandoned as a requisite.

In the railroad industry, management has long been whipsawed by the provisions of the Transportation Act. It is denied the right to fix the price for the commodity it sells and the rates of its hire for labor. And it might be added that for many years, except under the unusual conditions of war provided capacity business, railroading has been in one heck of an economic predicament.

But it is not railroading alone that is involved in the serious question of how business can be conducted efficiently and economically under our recognized system without being subjected to the crippling effect of periodic strikes. Granted that there must be a check against return to the tyranny of management, there must be an equally effective bar against the tyranny of labor. Sooner or later we are going to have to come to the obvious solution of making nonpartisan decisions binding.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I close with a reemphasis upon the fact that I am not here as counsel for the railroads, as an advocate for the railroads, or as an opponent of labor. I think we must have a fine, highly developed railway labor; we must have fine railway systems. But we must not forget that the railway systems, which derive their existence from the fact that the public has granted to the railroads the right to operate, and the employees, who subordinate to the right which the public has granted, find their employment in this line of business which is charged with the public interest, are not the sole parties in interest nor those whose interests are paramount and outstanding.

Mr. President, the bill to which I refer and which I trust will be early considered by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, namely, Senate bill 3463, would, if enacted, remedy this situation, would continue the peaceful methods and voluntary methods which are prescribed in the Railway Labor Act, but would provide finally for a decision by a board, appointed by duly constituted authority, which would be obligatory and binding. The public, too, would find that its interests would not be overlooked, and that the litigants themselves, the employers and the employees, could not disrupt, as railway strikes are now doing, the vital industries and interests which today are so important to the national economy and welfare.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to announce to the Senate that, after consultation with members of the Democratic policy committee, we have made the following decision with respect to the program of the Senate.

Mr. President, as all Members of the Senate know, today we entered into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 4 o'clock next Monday on the nomination of Mr. Pike as a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Heretofore I have given notice that on Monday we shall also move to have the Senate take up the FEPC bill, which has heretofore been debated and voted upon. In view of the fact that the debate upon that subject was rather extensive at the time when the motion to take up that bill was before us earlier in the session, I propose to file a petition of cloture on the same day the motion is made to take up the bill. Consequently, under the rule, we shall vote on Wednesday at 1 o'clock on the petition for cloture.

Mr. President, the Democratic Policy Committee also believes, after talking with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and other members of the Appropriations Committee, that it would be in the interest of expediting the business of the Senate if on Friday of this week the Appropriations Committee were given the full time to consider the various measures before it, without interruption upon the part of the Senate.

As everyone knows, tomorrow we shall take up the motion entered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 24, dealing with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The vote on that motion is to be at 4 o'clock, with the time between 12 and 4 to be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents.

Mr. President, that is about the program.

If the Appropriations Committee can finish the appropriation bill this week, as the committee believes it can, we shall proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill on Monday next. Mr. President, I urge the Appropriations Committee to work at night, if necessary, in order to report the appropriation bill to the Senate, because, as everyone knows, the entire governmental structure of the Nation is based upon appropriations, including the appropriations for the military forces, the appropriations for the personnel who conduct the affairs of the Government, and the appropriations for various other activities of the Nation. It is absolutely indispensable that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the appropriations bill as soon as possible, because there may be some differences between the House position and the Senate position, and consequently the conferees may have some trouble and may take some time before they can reach agreement.

However, barring unforeseen conditions in respect to the Korean situation, in the Far East, I am still working to the end that we may leave here around July 31. That is my hope, and I believe we can do it.

Following the appropriations bill, the Finance Committee, which is now considering the tax bill, probably will be in a position to report a bill on that subject within a week's time. So I hope that following the disposition of the appropriations bill, we can consider the tax bill. That will bring us fairly close to the end of the month.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator's intent is clear in the record, but perhaps I can be helpful to him by asking this question: Did not the Senator specifically state that it is his intention that the Appropriations Committee can meet on Friday, without a floor session; and is it the Senator's intention to move that the Senate take a recess from tomorrow until Monday?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

THE KOREAN CRISIS AND AMERICAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on Saturday, July 1, Mr. Bert Andrews, chief of the Washington bureau of the New York Herald Tribune, interviewed me, in a broadcast over the American Broadcasting Co. network, concerning the Korean crisis and American policy in the Far East.

In that interview Mr. Andrews asked me, as a Republican who has taken a keen interest in our foreign policies, especially in the Far East, for my views on what had happened, and particularly on the relation between recent events and the recommendations which some of us in the Republican Party have been urging for some time.

I indicated my complete support for the bold action taken by the President, and mentioned the names of a few of the Republicans with whom I had joined in urging similar steps as long ago as last December.

Mr. President, I think we Republicans have a right to be proud of the positive contributions we have been able to make to American foreign policy since the war. Sometimes these contributions have been made within the framework of bipartisanship, which I have always supported as the proper pattern for an all-American foreign policy. This was the case especially with the United Nations, the ECA, the Atlantic Treaty, and the military-assistance program. At other times, unfortunately, the Republican Party has not been accepted in bipartisan councils; but even in these difficult circumstances we have been able to contribute ideas which finally bore fruit and helped our country maintain its place of leadership in the world.

I should like to pay tribute to those Republicans in Congress who have exercised their leadership over the years for a foreign policy which would represent and defend the interests of the whole American people in this troubled world. Our eminent colleague, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], is of course preeminent in this field, and has rendered services of historic importance. Former Senator John Foster Dulles, of New York, must be named for his joint contribution with the Senator from Michigan to the establishment of the United Nations and for his valuable services since that time.

I pay tribute also to my other Republican colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Let me add the names of the Republican Senators on the Armed Services Committee: The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN].

On the House Foreign Affairs Committee, under the distinguished leadership of my good friend from New Jersey, Dr. CHARLES A. EATON, the able Republican Members have likewise made great contributions.

All these are Republicans, Mr. President, but first of all they are Americans. It is as Americans that they have exerted themselves to the end that we may have policies abroad worthy of our people and of our heritage of freedom.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my interview with Mr. Andrews be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening. This is Bert Andrews, reporting by transcription from Washington.

With me tonight is a man who called the turn just 7 months ago today on many of the things that have happened in relation to the Korean situation in the past week. He is Senator H. ALEXANDER SMITH, Republican, of New Jersey, and he thinks it only fair that the Republicans should get their proper share of credit for the positive actions that have been taken in the far eastern situation by a Democratic administration.

I handled many of the stories concerning the views Senator SMITH voiced 7 months ago—and concerning the current situation. And so I'd like to give a little history before I ask Senator SMITH some questions. Last fall Senator SMITH made a trip to the Orient. He talked to General MacArthur among others. When Senator SMITH came back—on December 1, 1949—he held a press conference. He said it was unthinkable that Formosa should be lost to the Chinese Communists. He said the Nationalist Government should be supported to see that Formosa was not lost to the Communists. He said that if Formosa was taken by the Communists, it would give the Communists—Chinese and probably Russians, eventually—a base which could make things tough for the United States. He pointed out that from such a base the Communists might eventually push America's defense line back to the Marianas and the Hawaiian Islands—and that if the Marianas and the Hawaiian Islands were ever lost, we'd find that our defense line was the Pacific coast.

Well, it didn't take newspapermen long to figure out that Senator SMITH's views were shared by General MacArthur—as other Senators were to share them later. But those views ran counter at that time to the views of the State Department.

The State Department belittled all the fears expressed by Senator SMITH and some other Republican Senators who talked to General MacArthur at the same time. They also belittled the suggestion of former President Hoover and Senator TAFT, of Ohio, that the Navy be sent to protect Formosa from the Communists. The State Department said that Formosa was of no strategic importance to the United States and that the Department was prepared to see Formosa fall to the Communists. But now—with the Communist-backed invasion of South Korea—the picture has changed. The Truman administration has decided not only that South Korea must be saved but also that the American Navy will protect Formosa to see that the Chinese Communists don't get their hands on Formosa.

Suppose we begin with this, Senator SMITH. I'd like to know how you feel about the action President Truman has taken regarding Korea.

Senator SMITH. Of course, Mr. Andrews, in light of the views I expressed in my report to the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate after my trip to the Far East last fall, I am entirely in accord with the position taken by the President. I think his statement was a memorable one—one that will go down in history.

Mr. ANDREWS. Why do you place that appraisal on it, Senator SMITH?

Senator SMITH. It has been my feeling, ever since I made my own study of the situation, that we needed to take a determined stand in the Far East and say to the Communists: "So far—and no farther." In the difficulties that we are facing as to where we should call a halt to the insidious movement that was covering all of Asia, the Korean incident came as a God-given opportunity to make our stand clear. We did that first by taking the episode to the United Nations and challenging the Security Council to take notice of, and act upon, this obvious aggression.

Mr. ANDREWS. I take it that you are entirely in sympathy with what the United Nations did, and that you believe it was done in complete accord with the Charter.

Senator SMITH. I certainly am in sympathy with their action. You will remember, Mr. Andrews, that from the close of the Japanese war the independence of Korea has been one of the big issues. We have been continuously embarrassed by the division between North Korea and South Korea, and by Russia's unwillingness to take any steps with us or within the United Nations to bring about the unification of the entire country. This was the reason for the setting up of the South Korean Republic and the appointment of a special United Nations Commission.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, on that point, Senator SMITH, some critics of President Truman's action suggest that the United States is really acting unilaterally. Do you agree with that?

Senator SMITH. I do not agree with that because it seems very clear to me that after the United Nations had acted so promptly it was incumbent on us and the other members of the United Nations to see to it that the orders of the United Nations were carried out. I will remind you that the orders briefly stated were: One, that hostilities should cease immediately; two, that the North Koreans should withdraw to the north of the thirty-eighth parallel; and three, that all members of the UN should give every assistance in carrying out these orders. After this resolution was passed by the Security Council on Sunday, June 25, the United Nations Commission—on the ground in Korea—reported that the North Koreans had paid no attention to it. This presented a clear-cut issue as to whether the members of the United Nations would support with force, if necessary, what amounted to an order from the United Nations in the matter.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then you concur, Senator SMITH, with President Truman's statement that this is a police action under the United Nations—and not war waged by the United States.

Senator SMITH. I do. I think it was our clear duty to take this action promptly with the hope and expectation that other members of the United Nations would join us—if the United Nations itself was to survive. The survival of the United Nations as an effective force for world peace is definitely involved in this crisis. I am gratified to note, from the latest reports, that Great Britain and the Netherlands have indicated their support of our move. So have Australia, New Zealand, and India. I was especially gratified to note that India has joined with us, because at first there seemed to be some hesitation. India, as you know, has tremendous influence in the Far East.

Mr. ANDREWS. As I said in my introduction, Senator SMITH, you were in on the beginning of much of this after your trip to the Far East. You made specific recommendations then. They weren't followed by the Truman administration. But now the administration is doing just about what you recommended. I think some people must be surprised that you haven't come out with some ringing I told you so's.

Senator SMITH. Well, Mr. Andrews, I think I can say that I am not an I-told-you-so person. I went to the Far East last fall from a deep conviction of urgency. I came back with a few clear-cut convictions, which I reported. I have been working earnestly on those convictions ever since with the hope that the developing circumstances and the continuing study by the State Department of all these issues would bring them to see that a change of policy was necessary. Now that that change of policy has been brought about—and I feel that we are headed in the right direction—my feeling is one of eagerness to cooperate and do all that I can to unite the American people behind this brave stand so that together we can see the matter through.

Mr. ANDREWS. But I would like to press on this point. Do you regard this as a decision made entirely by the Democratic administration? Or do you think Republicans deserve some of the credit?

Senator SMITH. Of course, Mr. Andrews, in light of the fact that over 6 months ago many of my Republican colleagues were urging the very kind of action we are now taking, I feel that the Republican Party is certainly entitled to be recognized as having had an active part in this whole development.

Mr. ANDREWS. Whom would you single out for special mention?

Senator SMITH. To begin with, former President Hoover expressed himself very strongly on the far eastern situation. He urged then that the Navy be sent to protect Formosa from possible invasion. Now the Navy has been sent by President Truman.

Mr. ANDREWS. What others would you name?

Senator SMITH. Senator TAFT made the same recommendation that former President Hoover did.

Mr. ANDREWS. And I seem to remember that President Truman brushed Senator TAFT's suggestion aside with the statement that he didn't know the Senator was a military expert. Well, Senator TAFT looks like something of an expert now.

Senator SMITH. And besides Mr. Hoover and Mr. Taft, I think I should mention Congressman Judd of Minnesota in the House and Senator Knowland of California. Congressman JUDD had been a medical missionary in China and all the way through the controversy he has seemed to have a clear conception of the Chinese psychology and the mistakes that we were making. Senator KNOWLAND took the same trip that I did, following me, last fall, and he came back with virtually the same report and the same recommendations with regard to our taking a definite stand against the Communist movement in the Far East. In addition to them, Senator Ferguson also stopped in the Far East on his trip around the world, and he came to the same conclusion. In addition to those who were in the Far East, I'd like to mention Senator BRIDGES of New Hampshire and Senator BREWSTER of Maine. In the House there is Congressman JOHN LODGE, who has just been nominated for Governor of Connecticut.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, are these Republicans—or the Republican Party—doing anything to make it clear in the public mind that they had such ideas? You know the public mind is a forgetful one, and it may not be remembered what was done or advocated 6 months ago.

Senator SMITH. I think you will find, Mr. Andrews, that the Republican Party will study the record carefully and will present it to the people of the United States. I think the record is one that the Republicans can be proud of.

Mr. ANDREWS. I assume from that, Senator SMITH, that that record will be spread before the voters this November.

Senator SMITH. Of course it will, Mr. Andrews, but I want to emphasize this point. We Republicans to a man—while we have been critical of the Far Eastern policy in the past—are united now with the administration. All of us as loyal Americans want to see the matter through to a successful conclusion. The peace of the world is at stake. And American leadership—I am happy to say—is once more asserting itself to bring that peace about through international action.

Mr. ANDREWS. Going back to your trip to the Far East—and the trip the other Senators took—I take it that you believe this desire for firmness has long been held by General MacArthur, whom you saw.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Andrews, I am very glad you asked me that question. There is no doubt about General MacArthur's convictions on these issues. And I am happy to take this occasion to express my great gratification over the fact that General MacArthur has been put in charge of our operations, including the movement of the seventh fleet to protect Formosa.

Mr. ANDREWS. Thank you very much, Senator SMITH.

NORWAY SUPPORTS UNITED NATIONS ACTION IN KOREA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement by Norway's permanent delegate to the United Nations, Ambassador Arne Sunde, in support of UN action in Korea. This statement was made at the meeting of the Security Council of the United Nation on June 22. It demonstrates the basic loyalty of the people of Norway to the United Nations and the concern which Norway has for freedom for all peoples all over the world.

This statement appeared in the July 1, 1950, issue of "News of Norway," published by the Norway Information Service.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORWAY SUPPORTS UN ACTION IN KOREA

At the meeting of the Security Council of the United Nations on Tuesday, June 27, debating the question of action in Korea, the policy of the Norwegian Government was declared by Norway's permanent delegate to the United Nations, Ambassador Arne Sunde, in the following statement:

"Since the last meeting of the Security Council the Norwegian Delegation has carefully studied all the available reports about the hostilities which have now been in progress in Korea for more than 2 days. We have scrutinized the reports from the United Nations on Korea, and we have conferred with the Norwegian Government in order to get all additional information available to it.

"We have also listened with keen attention to the statements which have been made in this council by the representative of the Republic of Korea and our fellow delegates. In our opinion there can no longer be an iota of doubt in regard to the nature of the hostilities now in progress.

"We are faced at this critical juncture in the life of the United Nations organization with an unprovoked attack by the North Korean forces against the Government of the Republic of Korea, which was brought into being through the action of the United Nations General Assembly. The invasion staged with tanks, artillery and planes is clearly a carefully planned all-out effort aiming at the destruction of the Government of the Republic of Korea and the subjugation of its people.

"It is now also perfectly clear that the perpetrators of this brutal attack are unwilling to pay the slightest heed to the resolution which was passed by this Council 2 days ago. The attack is being pressed with relentless fury and the loss of human lives is mounting by the hour. Under these circumstances it seems to me that we would fail in our most sacred duty under the United Nations Charter if we were to hestitate in authorizing every effort by those members of the United Nations who are in a position to support and succor the brave but materially inferior forces of the Korean Republic.

"At noon today the President of the United States of America made a momentous statement telling us that he had already ordered air and sea forces of the United States to rush to the assistance of the Korean forces. For my part I would like to congratulate and thank the President of the United States and its Government for their prompt action. It shows that there is no doubt and no vacillation in this great repuiblic when the peace and security and justice of the world are put in jeopardy by reckless aggression.

"I would also like to thank the distinguished representative of the United States for his clear and concise résumé of the situation in Korea as his government views it at this moment. In my opinion the American draft resolution is eminently adapted to meet the requirements of the situation which has arisen, and I am instructed by my Government to give it unqualified support."

INDIA SUPPORTS UNITED NATIONS' ACTION IN KOREA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to have the privilege of making a brief statement in reference to another representative of the United Nations and another nation represented on the Security Council of the United Nations, namely, India. This morning it was my privilege to have an extended conference with Bishop Pickett, of the Methodist Church at Delhi, India, representing approximately 375,000 members of the Methodist Church in that great nation in Asia.

On a previous occasion I have stated here on the floor of the Senate what I consider to be the strategic importance of this great new republic, the Republic of India. For example, I have said that the constitution of that nation follows in clear outline the principles enunciated in our own Constitution. I have mentioned the caliber of leadership, as manifested in the Prime Minister, Mr. Nehru, and his associates. I have mentioned the industrial possibilities and realities of India, citing, for example, that this great Nation possesses the second largest steel-producing plant in the British Empire. I have mentioned the population of the country, some 350,000,000 people; the fact that it possesses an integrated administrative establishment; it has a government which is elected by the people and responsive to the people. I have also mentioned, Mr. President, that this great country, on two occasions, in World War I and World War II, has been an ally of ours, and has demonstrated its ability to protect its own freedom—in fact, to fight for freedom when India itself, did not even possess her freedom.

Mr. President, there is now an issue before the State Department pertaining to India. This great country, in the Security Council, voted to stand with the United States in our action in Korea. The Prime Minister of India has supported the hand of our President. I believe that is about the most significant development in international affairs in the past year. Here is a nation which up until this time has preserved a semblance of neutrality, but which now, at this stage of international crisis, has joined forces with the freedom-loving people of the world against the aggressors of North Korea.

This nation is being besieged by a Communist infiltration as other nations in Asia are being besieged. I have evidence leading me to believe, after some prolonged study of the problems of India, that on the one hand the Communist forces are going to the producers of wheat and rice, telling those producers to withhold their stocks from the market, and to gouge the government through a high price. It is alleged that the price of wheat and rice in India today is double what it is in the United States. On the other hand, the Communist forces in India, working in the metropolitan and industrial areas are telling the workers that in the United States of America, with millions upon millions of bushels of grain, particularly wheat, this great United States of America sees fit to give arms to Turkey, to Greece—yes, and even to send arms to Korea—which all of us support—but on the other hand does not see fit even to venture an agreement with the Indian Government for the shipment of quantities of food, which is needed.

Mr. President, it is my considered judgment that the policy of this Nation should not be based simply upon armed force, but upon trying to gain allies through the arsenals that we have and the weapons that we have in the way of food. Our Government has been negotiating for 8 months with the Indian Government in an effort to transfer certain surplus stocks of wheat to that country. That wheat is desperately needed.

I say, not with the vision of a prophet but of one who has at least read a few pages of history, that our hope of success in Asia depends upon being able to bind ourselves to a great nation such as India, and that if we "miss the boat" on this one we shall have no one to blame but ourselves. It is a government which is friendly, determined, democratic, and which wants to be a partner. The people of India are suffering from a food shortage. They are literally suffering from famine in many areas. It appears to me it would be good foreign policy, it would be a good neighbor policy, it would be sound and prudent policy on the part of this Government to quit higgling and jiggling about a few technicalities, and to make available to this great country some of the foodstuffs which we have in our storehouses at the present moment. I have directed a message to the Secretary of State along these lines. On previous occasions I have talked to the Assistant Secretary, Mr. McGhee, and I know now that it is the feeling in high places of this Government that we have wasted long and, let me say, precious hours in working toward this agreement. I hope we will not delay any longer, and that every Member of this body who has concerned himself with China, Indochina, Malaya, Siam, and Burma, will recognize that in India we have one of the most powerful forces for freedom that the world has ever known, and that if we pass this opportunity by we shall rue the day. Here is our chance in the subcontinent, in the central part of Asia, to build for ourselves a great group of friends who will stand with us as true and trusted friends in our hour of need and our hour of crisis.

Mr. President, I desire to refer briefly to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

AMBASSADOR EUGENIE ANDERSON

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I desire also to ask to have inserted in the RECORD a statement pertaining to a diplomat of this Nation who has made a great reputation for herself.

The people of Minnesota are very proud of their fellow citizen, Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, the American Ambassador to Denmark. Members of the Senate will recall that at the time of her confirmation those of us who knew of her abilities and her dedication to democratic principles testified to the fact that she would be a most valuable and trusted emissary of the American people. We who know her in Minnesota were grateful to the President for giving her talents international recognition and were confident that events would prove correct our judgment of her character and energies. It is therefore with much personal satisfaction and pride that I noticed a recent column by our beloved first lady of the world, Eleanor Roosevelt, written from Denmark, which appeared in the Minneapolis Star for June 21, taking note of the fact that the people of Denmark have been captivated by our lady Ambassador and paying tribute to her tact and fine performance.

This was followed by an article which appeared in the Washington Post for June 26 written from Copenhagen for the New York Herald Tribune by Mr. Stephen White, which pays tribute to Mrs. Anderson as "the west's best hope in Denmark." Mr. White says:

Mrs. Anderson, representing the United States, is rapidly becoming one of the best loved persons in Denmark.

The international importance of this recognition can be seen from Mr. White's further observation that the growing friendship between Denmark and the United States has international implications most helpful to the preservation of world peace.

If the Danish people, in spite of their predilections, come out squarely on the side of the west, Mrs. Anderson must be given much of the credit—

Says Mr. White.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be placed in the RECORD, to be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GLOBAL VIEW COMES HARD TO DENMARK

(By Stephen White)

COPENHAGEN.—It is a little more than a year since Denmark braced itself for the shock and plunged into the North Atlantic Pact. In western Europe and the United States, it made only a ripple. Denmark is a small country, with nothing significant to offer in the way of striking power. But to Denmark, the decision was a major one and was taken only after much soul searching.

Denmark's tradition, like that of all the Scandinavian countries, is one of neutrality a l'outrance. For nearly a century and a half the Danes, the Norwegians, and the Swedes have chosen to stand aloof from power politics. Invasions have altered their program but not their purposes.

Even faced by a Europe rapidly putting itself in a posture for war, Denmark would have preferred to reconstitute the Scandinavian unity rather than to associate itself with the Atlantic Pact. Through diplomatic channels, the Danes did all they could to gain that end. But the firm determination of Norway, after the events of the last war, to associate itself with a larger and more potent alliance, made the Scandinavian union an impossibility. In the end, each country went its own way: Norway into the pact enthusiastically, Denmark reluctantly, and Sweden alone outside it.

BLAME THE UNITED STATES

Today the Danes still look wistfully at an opportunity they think was lost. They have played their part in the Atlantic Pact wholeheartedly, for they are a people who live up to their commitments. But it would be useless to deny that the government feels a little resentment toward the United States.

It was the United States, the government feels, which forced Norway ino the pact, failing to consider that such action meant the loss of Sweden. Had the United States permitted the Scandinavian countries to make their own arrangement, the Danes believe, the entire bloc—whose sympathies beyond a doubt are with the West—might have been able to form a powerful coherent force in northern Europe. Instead, the Swedes have been permitted to go their way in isolation.

The existence of the pact is a major annoyance, politically, to Prime Minister Hans Hedtoft and his Social Democratic Party. Hedtoft administers a minority government, since his party holds only 57 of the 150 seats in Parliament. To control domestic affairs, he needs the 10 votes of the Radical Party, since the other major parties—Conservatives and Liberals—are essentially parties of the right. But the Radicals are violently opposed to the North Atlantic Pact—the only sizable party in Denmark to take so determined a stand.

Hence, the Government finds the rightist parties voting with it on foreign affairs and the Radicals with it on domestic policy. To date, this awkward arrangement has worked, primarily because no one can think of a better one. But it obviously carries within it the raw matter of trouble.

HAS POPULAR SUPPORT

As for the voter himself, the average Dane seems to be reconciled to the fact that Denmark cannot stand alone in this troubled world, and that events have made it impossible for it to stand exclusively with its Scandinavian friends. Estimates of popular support of the pact range as high as 90 percent, and it is certainly substantially over 65 percent.

But Danish observers do not believe that the full meaning of the pact is appreciated by the Danes. To date, it has been largely a matter of conferences. Should more specific requests be made of the Danes—the granting of an air base to the western group, for example (and a glance at the map shows how likely such a request might some day be)—it is probable that a storm of protest would be aroused.

Making the Danes like the pact is likely to be a step-by-step process, in which first the concept is sold to them, as it has been, and then the itemized requirements that follow naturally from adherence are sold one by one.

A BELOVED ENVOY

In this respect, there is almost unanimous agreement that Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, American Ambassador in Copenhagen, will do the job if it can be done. The Danes have cast off their tendency to look to the Swedes and must now look to the United States, Mrs. Anderson, representing the United States, is rapidly becoming one of the best-loved persons in Denmark—something which could not have been said of many of her predecessors.

If the Danish people, in spite of their predilections, come out squarely on the side of the west, Mrs. Anderson must be given much of the credit. But it will not be an easy thing for the Danes to do.

The memory of the German invasion is fresh, and the Danes are determined it shall never happen again. But the memory of years of peace is a deep one, and it is only reluctantly that the Danes are becoming embroiled in the larger matters of the planet rather than the smaller matters of their islands and their neighbors to the north.

PROTECTION AGAINST UN-AMERICAN AND SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. When I came in, the majority leader was discussing the schedule for the remainder of this week, and, I think, suggesting the schedule for the remainder of the session. I was wondering whether he had included in the information he gave the Senate any statement as to whether he intends to have considered the bill (S. 2311) to protect the United States against certain un-American and subversive activities, and for other purposes.

Mr. LUCAS. I may say in reply to the Senator from South Dakota that the Democratic Policy Committee did not discuss at any great length the bill to which the Senator has just referred. We were busy discussing the omnibus appropriation bill, the tax bill, and other matters, trying to determine in how short a time we could get the appropriation bill to the floor, and how long it would take the Senate to debate it; also how long it would be before the tax bill reached the floor, and how long it would take to debate it.

In other words, what the committee was trying to do was to continue to work for an adjournment of the Congress by the 31st of this month. There are other bills on the calendar which are very important, such as the bill providing statehood for Alaska, a similar bill for Hawaii, and the bill to which the Senator has just referred. All these bills, however, are going to require a considerable amount of time for debate. If we are to adjourn on scheduled time, there are certain bills which we are not going to be able to consider at this session. That is my answer to the Senator, at the present time.

In the event developments in the Far East are such that the Congress will be compelled to stand by, we might then have an opportunity to take up a number of measures which are on the calendar at the present time, but which we shall be unable to consider in the event we try to conclude our session by the first of August.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator abandoned the idea of obtaining a vote on FEPC?

Mr. LUCAS. No, no. I made a statement regarding that a moment ago in connection with the program we had outlined. Let me put it this way: I may say to the Senator from Michigan that on Monday when the Senate convenes, the petition for cloture on FEPC will be presented. That will automatically bring about a vote on the following Wednesday, July 12. I have made that announcement heretofore. I have advised Members on the Democratic side of the aisle to be here, especially for the vote on July 12. I presume there will be very little debate, because it is a motion to consider the bill, on which we have had about a week or 10 days of debate heretofore. Consequently I anticipate very little talk, if any, on the motion to take up the bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator realize that we might be able to complete the consideration of Senate bill 2311 in about 2 or 3 days?

Mr. LUCAS. That is the Senator's opinion, which I am unable to share with him. I think a bill to which he has referred will be debated at considerable length and that is the judgment of Members on this side of the aisle with whom I have talked about the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram from George N. Craig which I desire to read. George N. Craig is not only the national commander of the American Legion, but he is also a very able and outstanding American. As the head of the American Legion, which is probably one of the most powerful organizations in the world, he has gone up and down America, into every State, preaching patriotism and the ideals of our country, and condemning those things which are subversive and which might destroy our Nation.

The telegram is addressed to me personally, and it reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 4, 1950.

HON. EDWARD MARTIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Was glad to have had an opportunity to visit with you in Washington the other evening. Had I known at the time that there was a probability of an early vote in the United States Senate on S. 2311, the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill, to identify and control the Communist conspiracy in this country, I would have told you that the American Legion, by unanimous action, has repeatedly gone on record favoring national legislation of this type and has especially endorsed this particular bill. Our 4,000,000 members of the American Legion and auxiliary firmly believe that with our men fighting and dying in Korea, and billions of our dollars being used to stop communism all over the world, common sense and sound national security demands prompt and favorable action on this measure now. Identification and location of fifth columnists now will enable authorities and civil-defense forces to safeguard the home front against dangers of sabotage, propaganda, and treachery. We will be grateful for your vigorous and public support in getting early and favorable action on this urgent legislation.

GEORGE N. CRAIG,
National Commander, the American Legion.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to associate myself with the able Senator from Pennsylvania as one who received a telegram similar to the one which he has read from the commander of the American Legion. I attended the American Legion convention in the State of Minnesota on the 25th of June, and I know, from speaking with members of the Legion at that convention, that a great number of men and women expressed themselves as greatly interested in the bill known as the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill.

I most certainly urge the majority leader that sufficient time be given in the general schedule, before adjournment, to give full consideration to the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I presume that every Senator received a telegram similar to the ones received by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Minnesota. There is a good deal of excitement about this particular bill, all of a sudden. It was not very long ago that I submitted a list of bills which the Members on the Democratic side of the aisle thought might be considered before the adjournment of Congress on or about the first of August. After the Republican policy committee went over those bills it was reported to the majority leader, through the minority leader [Mr. WHERRY], that there were only two additional bills in which the Republican side of the aisle was interested and which it desired to have considered. One was a bill dealing with the peril-point provision, and the other was a bill dealing with a reduction in excise taxes.

Mr. President, suddenly we find this great hue and cry to call up this particular bill. It is easy to understand why these telegrams are coming to various Senators with respect to the measure. How it happened is perfectly understandable. I suppose it will be said that it is because of the Korean crisis. But this bill has been on the calendar since March 21, and last Friday evening was the first occasion when any Senator on the floor has discussed the bill at any great length. At least, no Senator has ever spoken to the Senator from Illinois about it. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] never said a word to the Senator from Illinois about taking up the bill. I was greatly surprised and, I may say, rather shocked, last Friday evening when only three Members were on the floor of the Senate that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] had the temerity to move to consider the bill at that time. That was not "cricket," Mr. President; it is not done in the United States Senate. At least, it has not been done since I have been a Member of the Senate.

I think we on this side of the aisle are capable of handling the situation, and we are going to handle it as we deem best.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, one of the most compelling reasons which I have seen for consideration of the bill is the fact that on July 3, this year, the Daily Worker published a statement by the national committee of the Communist Party, signed by William Z. Foster, national chairman; Gus Hall, national secretary; Henry Winston, organizational secretary; and John Williamson, labor secretary: reading as follows:

Telegraph majority leader, Senator SCOTT LUCAS, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., immediately urging that he reject the Republican policy committee's demand to schedule the Mundt bill for the floor. Wire your own Senators to the same effect.

I suppose the majority leader has received the telegram referred to. I am positive that it has not influenced the majority leader, but I cite it as an impelling reason why we should consider very seriously taking sufficient time with reference to this important measure, because it is so strongly condemned and opposed by the Daily Worker.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall yield in a moment.

Mr. President, this is the first I have heard of the telegram which the Senator read into the RECORD——

Mr. FERGUSON. It is not a telegram. I said it was a statement issued on the 3d, telling members of the Communist Party to telegraph the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I thought the Senator from Michigan referred to a telegram. I know something about Mr. Foster. I knew him when I was department commander of the American Legion in Illinois and when I was national judge advocate of the American Legion for 4 years, serving under four different national commanders. No one has denounced Foster and all he stands for throughout the country more than has the Senator from Illinois. I pay no attention to that kind of a statement; it does not influence me one iota. The strange thing is that the Senator from Michigan apparently has had this statement all this time, because it was issued away back in July of last year——

Mr. FERGUSON. No; it was issued last Monday.

Mr. LUCAS. I thought the Senator said it was issued last July. At all events, I know nothing about it, and care nothing about it, and it will have no influence with me. I shall have an opportunity to study the bill carefully one of these days, and I shall make up my mind what to do about it if and when it comes up on the floor of the Senate. It is an important measure, of course, but I shall not be stampeded into having the bill considered hastily, and I shall not permit the playing of politics in connection with it to influence me.

I say it is very strange, it is very unusual, that now, almost at the very close of this session, action is sought on this bill, although it was reported last March, and not one Senator who is interested in the bill has seen fit since then to ask the Republican policy committee or the Democratic policy committee to bring the measure on the floor of the Senate. I say it is strange. I say it is unusual. I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Since the majority leader has indicated that I had considerable temerity to make a motion on the floor of the Senate, let me say that so long as the junior Senator from South Dakota serves in this body he will consider it perfectly within his right to move at any time to consider a bill in which he is interested. Neither does he agree that only the majority leader may make motions, and that a Senator who is exercising his prerogative on the floor of the Senate is demonstrating temerity.

The majority leader well knows, as does the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] and the Senator from South Dakota, that the unhappy Korean crisis has changed many plans of many men all over the world. When American boys are dying on the sands of Korea in a war against communism, understandably the American Legion and many other patriotic organizations are concerned about the fact that Communists in America are still permitted to creep around under cover, with no disclosure, and with the Senate failing to act on the one bill before it which would require them to register and identify themselves and permit the American people to know who they are.

Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that he may be sure that the very junior Senator from South Dakota will not try to disrupt unnecessarily the plans of the majority leader, and he will not try to engineer the schedule of the Senate. He had no such plan last Friday night. As he said in his speech last Friday, he had no intention of forcing a vote on the bill. He had been trying to get the floor since 4:30 in the afternoon. He simply wanted to bring the situation into focus so that the majority leader would do what he now admits has not been done since the 21st of March with reference to a bill which the Committee on the Judiciary has approved by a vote of 12 to 1—study it carefully—with the hope that support could be gained for this kind of legislation at this crucial time while the war is going on, not simply if we may have a favorable opportunity sometime after the 1st of August. This is an urgent matter of national security.

Mr. LUCAS. I am certain that the Senator from South Dakota will not disrupt the program of the majority in the Senate. I am equally certain that the Senator from South Dakota tried to disrupt the program of the Democratic majority when at 7 o'clock last Friday evening, when only three or four Senators were on the floor, he moved to consider a bill which he had not even discussed theretofore on the Senate floor. It is his pet measure. It is one in which he has been interested all these years. He claims to know more about communism than any other Senator. Now because we have a war on——

Mr. MUNDT. Will the Senator yield? It is a war against communism.

Mr. LUCAS. Because we have a war on he says we must take up this bill at the present time. Where has the Senator been since March 21, when the bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. MUNDT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. Where has he been since March 21? Where has he been with reference to this measure? I ask again where have those who are now so fervently pleading for action against Communists, and using the war in Korea as a part of their argument, where have they been all this time, if they know of this Communist activity, and know more about it than anyone else, particularly the Senator from South Dakota because of the experience he has had in tracking down subversive elements? Oh, Mr. President, at the ninth hour, when they see an opportunity to make some politics out of this particular question, having failed in every other move they have made this year on the Republican side to make political capital, they see their last opportunity here on the so-called Mundt-Ferguson bill to attempt to make political gain out of such legislation. I repeat, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois and the other members of the Democratic majority will not be stampeded by any move of that kind, regardless of what the Senator from South Dakota has said.

Mr. President, I resent, and I shall always resent the fact that when there were only three or four Members on the floor of the Senate a Member on the other side of the aisle attempted to take advantage of the situation, as the Senator from South Dakota did last Friday night. Again I repeat that it was not fair, it was not right, and it was not in keeping with the integrity and dignity of the United States Senate for anyone to do that. I do not say a Member of the minority party cannot make a motion to consider a bill. It is the way in which the Senator did it that I resent. He waited until the very last minute of the day, when nearly every Member of the Senate had gone home, after I had told every Senator on this side of the aisle that no motions would be made to take up any measure and that no votes would be taken on any measure, and after the same thing had been said on the other side of the aisle by the minority leader. It was then that the Senator from South Dakota moved to take up one of the most controversial bills on the calendar, hoping to slip it by when nobody was around.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. MUNDT. In the first place, if the Senator will read the speech which I made at the time I moved the consideration of the bill, he will read that I specifically said I did not expect to get a vote at that time. I said I did not plan to get a vote, and that I would not call for a vote. The Senator will notice further that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] asked unanimous consent to rescind the order for the quorum call. I was on the floor at the time, and I permitted him to do so, knowing full well that the bill would thereby be forced from immediate consideration——

Mr. LUCAS. I do not intend to yield for a speech.

Mr. MUNDT. May I answer the Senator's question as to where I have been since March 21 It is a rather long and circuitous answer.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can take his own time to go into that, because I am afraid it will take him a long time to tell us where he has been since March 21.

Mr. MUNDT. Insofar as my relation to Senate bill 2311 is concerned, I have been on the radio, I have been before audiences all over the country, I have been before Senatorial committees, I have conversed with Members on both sides of the aisle, urging that the bill be considered, and I have discussed it on radio forums with Republican Members and with Democratic Members. As the Senator knows, one of his distinguished colleagues, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], is a coauthor of the proposed legislation. One of the Senator's distinguished colleagues, the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary which reported the bill favorably. All the Senator's Democratic colleagues on the Committee on the Judiciary voted in favor of the bill.

There is no partisanship involved, unless someone is trying to court some left-wing votes. We are not trying by this bill to lure left-wing votes, and I assume that the Senator from Illinois is not trying to lure such votes. It is a matter of trying to tighten the home defenses against communism while American boys are dying overseas fighting communism. It is not because of any impetuosity on the part of the junior Senator from South Dakota that the bill is before us.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not talking about the merits or demerits of the bill. I am discussing the parliamentary processes of the United States Senate. In the 16 years I have served in Congress I do not remember a single instance, certainly not during the 2 years during which the Republicans were in control, when a Member of the minority party sought to move out of order to have a bill considered. That is not done, Mr. President. That is exactly what the Senator from South Dakota did the other night. That is what I am discussing. That is what I am complaining about. If we are to have orderly procedure from a parliamentary standpoint the majority must take control and keep control of measures which are brought up. That has been the policy throughout the history of the Republic.

I do not say that the minority do not have rights. I do not say that they should not present their case at a proper time or when the situation is serious enough that they do not have some rights with respect to bringing up a bill. However, as I have said many times, whenever the minority can move to bring up a bill at any time they want to bring it up, and succeed, we the majority lose control, handing it over to the minority party. That is not done. It cannot be done if orderly procedure is to continue.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I am sure that the able majority leader did not intend to cast a reflection upon the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] or upon myself by intimating that we were playing politics when we referred to the telegram received from the national commander of the American Legion. The Senator from Pennsylvania was not playing politics, and I know I was not playing politics when I referred to that telegram. When we hear from the national commander of the American Legion, so important an individual as that, we are not playing politics when we make mention of his telegram on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I did not mean the Senator from Minnesota was playing politics merely because he received a telegram from the national commander of the American Legion. I am sure the Senator knows what I was talking about, and he is a little excited about nothing. After all, I received the same kind of a telegram, and it could not be said I was playing politics on that account. I know Mr. Craig, and I know the Legion fairly well. I know what it stands for. It is one of our outstanding patriotic organizations. I am not talking about Mr. Craig's telegram, or about the merits or demerits of the proposition. I am merely talking about what happened.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may I say a word in my own right?

Mr. LUCAS. I am not going to yield the floor. I will yield to the Senator for an interruption.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I desire to make the position of the minority side indelibly clear, so far as concerns cooperating with the majority in the legislative program, for which they themselves are responsible. They are the ones who bring the program to the floor of the Senate for consideration.

Some time back the distinguished majority leader submitted to me a list, consisting, as I recall, of about three typewritten pages showing the measures he asked us to consider indicating they would be part of the program submitted for consideration by the Senate.

I took the matter up with the Republican steering committee; we looked the list over, and I was instructed by the steering committee to report to the majority leader that it was our opinion that if all the proposals which were submitted on the three pages were to be considered, it probably would keep the Senate in session until November. I believe the majority leader recalls that.

Mr. LUCAS. I remember the statement, but I certainly did not agree with it.

Mr. WHERRY. With all due respect to the judgment of the Senator, I think that if he published the statement, all would agree that we would be in session a long time before we got it through.

I told the Senator from Illinois then that if the majority wanted from that list to suggest a program which would take at least until August 5 to consider—and I think I mentioned seven or eight measures—I would be glad to talk to the majority leader whenever he was ready and try to work out a program of legislation which could be considered by August 5, but that the Republican side of the aisle was not making the program. Up to this time I have not had such a talk with the majority leader.

I recall very vividly what I said on the floor of the Senate last Friday, namely, that it seemed to me that the best we could do by August 5 was to consider the measures I outlined. But it was not our proposal; it came from the majority side. I not only spoke to the majority leader, I spoke to the Secretary of the Senate, and said I would be glad to sit down with them and try to expedite a program.

Last week the Republican steering committee very affirmatively and forcefully asked me to inform the majority leader that it was the wish of the steering committee that the Senate take up the so-called Mundt-Ferguson bill. I told the majority leader that in a private conversation I had with him.

I said the other day on the floor of the Senate that, if we were going to take up such bills as the statehood bills and the like, I wanted the majority leader to know that on this side of the aisle we were very much interested in taking up the Mundt-Ferguson bill.

Mr. President, I was not here the other evening when the distinguished Senator from South Dakota moved to consider the bill, but I wish to say that the Republican side has cooperated and will continue to cooperate to carry out a program so that the Senate can adjourn any time the majority deems it advisable. I think the Korean situation has changed the situation somewhat.

I believe that until more information is gathered and we know what is going to happen it is impossible, probably, to fix a dead line. But I desire to say in all earnestness that, regardless of the fact that we have not yet entered into a program, and while the matter is still open, certainly the action of the steering committee is to the effect that if any legislation is to be considered between now and August 1, or after August 1, in addition to the measures which were mentioned previously by the steering committee, it is the idea of the minority that the Mundt-Ferguson bill should be given priority.

Mr. President, I say that in all sincerity. I know that the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Michigan are very anxious to have this bill considered, and while it might not have been included in the program, certainly the Senator from Illinois will agree with me that those Senators have a perfect right to make a motion to consider the bill at any time, as has any other Senator if he feels an emergency exists.

I want the majority leader to know now that if he will confide in the minority leader what his program is, what he wants to do, and what time he wants the Congress to adjourn, the minority will do their level best to cooperate with the majority leader in agreeing on a program.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Nebraska, of course I know that any Senator on the minority side can move to consider a bill at any time. But I look back to the time when the Senator from Nebraska was the acting majority leader, when the Republicans were in power, during the Eightieth Congress, and knowing how cool and calm my good friend from Nebraska is, it is fascinating to contemplate what would have happened if the Senator from Illinois, along about 7 o'clock some evening, when the acting majority leader was in his office working, and when there were about three Senators on the floor, had moved to take up one of the most controversial bills on the calendar. I can imagine the explosion that would have taken place the following day, in fact, that very night. I am satisfied the Senator from Nebraska would have had a few sharp things to say, and I would not have blamed him for any rejoinder he might have produced.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am very jovial when I say to the Senator that I do not believe I would have left the Senate without having had some unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I doubt that the Senator was always around during the time he was acting majority leader, when the session of the Senate closed.

Mr. President, I desire to say something about the list I submitted to the Senator from Nebraska some time ago. I submitted a list to him, and he replied that the only two bills in which the Republican policy committee was interested were the peril-point measure, as I explained before the Senator arrived on the floor, and the measure for the elimination of certain excise taxes. Nothing was said at that time about the so-called Mundt-Ferguson bill, and I presume the Republican policy committee had no particular interest in the bill at that time, because it has been on the calendar since March 21 last.

It may be that the Senator and I did not understand one another with respect to the measures on the list I gave him. I had refused to give the list to the press. They wanted it, but I said, "I cannot give it to you. I am giving the list to the Republican policy committee, and I am going to get back a report, and perhaps if we can agree on something, you might get some information then."

Lo and behold, the newspapers came out with the entire list. I do not say that the Senator from Nebraska gave it to the press. I suppose it was perfectly all right if he did. But I am afraid that if I now gave him another list and we tried to get together on something, the newspapers would settle it for us before we could get around to it.

The only thing I am trying to do now is to get the appropriation bill out of the way and the tax bill out of the way, along with a few other measures which are necessary, and then, we are going to adjourn, if the Korean situation is such that we can possibly do so.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished majority leader recalls, does he not, that I told him that we were ready to sit down and work out a program and make an agreement with him whenever he was ready?

Mr. LUCAS. That is true.

Mr. WHERRY. The majority leader has never contacted me since.

Mr. LUCAS. No. That is right. I do not know what kind of a program I can work out with the minority leader that everyone will not know about before we agree to it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to say in defense of the minority leader that the majority leader has never given me anything in confidence that I have ever violated. The junior Senator from Nebraska has never violated any confidence the majority leader has reposed in him. I wish to say that if the majority leader will now submit a program to the Senator from Nebraska, then, so far as the Senator from Nebraska is concerned the confidence he will repose in him will not be violated. I shall be glad to consult with the Republican steering committee, and cooperate with the majority leader and do the best I can to carry out the program.

Mr. LUCAS. I submitted one program to the minority leader, and he came back with two bills he proposed to add to it. I doubt that there is any point in submitting a further program.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I wish to ask the majority leader a question in the interest of having the parliamentary record as clear as possible. I understood the Senator from Illinois a few minutes ago to refer to the presentation of the motion to take up the Mundt-Ferguson bill as having been made out of order.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not believe I made such a statement.

Mr. DONNELL. I think the Senator will find on reading the RECORD tomorrow that he said that. I assume what he said was merely an inadvertence, because I am sure the Senator from Illinois will agree with me that when there is no business pending, any Senator has the right to make a motion for the consideration of a bill on the calendar.

Mr. LUCAS. Precisely so. A Senator can make a motion at any time to displace the pending business.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, July 6, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

THE SPEAKER'S ROOMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 5, 1950.

I hereby designate the Honorable WILLIAM M. WHITTINGTON to act as Speaker pro tempore today.

SAM RAYBURN.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, source of life and light, of wisdom and power, whose greatness and goodness are ever round about us, grant that nothing may eclipse our faith in Thee, disturb our confidence in Thy love, or cause our ideals to lose their splendor.

We pray that the chosen representatives of our beloved may be men whose manhood can match the mountains of difficulty. May they face the future without fear, seek the more abundant life for all mankind, and walk humbly with the Lord, our God.

May we never be cowardly when we ought be courageous, never confused when we ought to be calm, never faithless when we ought to go forth with fortitude in the high adventure of building a new world of righteousness and peace.

Hasten the coming of the day when men shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and nations shall learn war no more.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JULY 6, 1950

(Legislative day of Saturday, July 1, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God who art the hope of all the ends of the earth, amid the tragedy of a broken world, in deep humility of spirit, at noonday we ascend the altar stairs of this hallowed temple of our faith and hope. As for this dedicated moment we blot out all but Thee in a world of rising and falling empires, we crave the strengthening vista of Thine eternal kingdom whose sun never sets.

Grant unto us that greatness of spirit which shall match the vast patterns of this creative day. In these testing times, establish Thou our hearts, as in unity with other freedom-loving nations we battle not in enmity against men, but against the evil which degrades and enslaves them. Beyond the strategy of armed strife may we see clearly the depth and scope of this historic drama of the centuries, and may that vision turn its blood and sweat and tears into final glory for all mankind. We ask it in the ever blessed Name. Amen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to introduce bills and joint resolutions, present petitions and memorials, and place routine matters in the RECORD and in the Appendix, without speeches or long debate, and that the time be equally divided between the proponents and opponents of Senate Resolution 290.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that we have had a quorum call, I wonder if the distinguished acting majority leader would not take up at this time the question of the unanimous-consent agreement as to Senate Resolution 299, relating to Reorganization Plan No. 22.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I withhold for the moment the unanimous-consent request as to routine matters, and I present another unanimous-consent request, that following the disposition of Senate Resolution 290, a resolution to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 24, the Senate proceed immediately to the consideration of Senate Resolution 299, a resolution to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 22; that 1 hour of debate be provided, the time to be equally divided between the proponents and opponents of Senate Resolution 299.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a brief remark or two with respect to the procedure in handling the calendar of the Senate.

I was very much disturbed yesterday to hear——

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of an agreement, no Senator can speak unless he is yielded to either by the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Pennsylvania is presenting another unanimous-consent request, which presumably will be taken out of his time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his remarks until we dispose of the unanimous-consent agreement to make the resolution affecting Reorganization Plan 22 the order of business immediately after the disposition of the resolution respecting Reorganization Plan 24?

Mr. MORSE. That is exactly what I want to reserve my objection to.

CONSIDERATIONS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE CALL FOR CONGRESS TO REMAIN IN SESSION

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall be very brief because the general subject matter of my remarks in connection with the reservation of objection is pertinent to working out what I consider to be an appropriate calendar of legislation for the Senate.

Mr. President, I was very much disturbed yesterday to hear the majority leader announce his plans for a calendar for the Senate contemplating adjournment on August 1. I think it is a great mistake for the Senate of the United States to make plans for adjournment on August 1 because, in my opinion, the crisis which confronts America is so serious that the American people should be given assurance that the Senate fully appreciates the gravity of the situation and that the Senate will remain in session continuously until the crisis is over. The Senate should take out whatever few days may be necessary for the campaign in the latter part of October before the election, depending even then upon the condition of international affairs.

I do not think the Senate of the United States should adjourn for the purpose of Members of the Senate playing politics in the oncoming campaign. Although some of the domestic bills mentioned by the majority leader yesterday are important in normal times, I believe that some of them lose their importance in the face of the Korean crisis. At least I think we should advance ahead of such bills the consideration of some very important issues, action upon which will place the country in a much stronger defense position than it seems to be demonstrated we are in today.

For example, I raised in the Armed Services Committee this morning the question of the state of our defenses in Europe, because certainly nothing reassuring has resulted from the London conference at least as to the present status of our defenses in Europe. Nothing reassuring came out of that conference that the money appropriated by the Congress of the United States last year for military aid to Europe has brought forth any substantial shipment of military equipment to Europe. I believe I am reliably informed when I say to the Senate on this occasion that the leaders of governments in Europe are very much concerned about the slow pace America has kept in regard to actually shipping any equipment to Europe. In my opinion it is also perfectly clear that we do not have very much heavy military equipment in Asia, in view at least of the results to date in the Korean crisis.

Mr. President, I will go along with the majority leader and the majority party in advancing as rapidly as we can a calendar dealing with domestic issues, but I shall insist so far as my one vote in the Senate is concerned that we advance ahead of some of the bills as were mentioned by the majority leader yesterday, consideration of the defenses of the country, because I think they are in a very serious condition.

The nature of the Russian propaganda on the Korean matter shows very clearly, I believe, the need for quick action on the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] which is now being given some consideration in committee. In my judgment it ought to be reported by the committee to the Senate at once, and the Senate of the United States should appropriate this week the funds necessary to give to America's Voice the funds it needs to meet the Russian propaganda. I believe it is just as important that we meet Russia in this crisis on the informational front as it is that we meet her satellite armies in Korea. We are now doing that in Korea and I fear we will have to meet her satellite armies in Europe also if we do not show very quickly that we are strong enough to handle the Korean situation and handle it very speedily with a minimum loss of American lives.

I repeat, Mr. President, what I said yesterday. I think the American people must be awakened to the fact that we are at war. Call it a police action, call it a minor war, or apply any other descriptive term to it that one may desire; the fact is that the American flag is flying in combat at this very hour, and American boys are dying in Korea.

I think the Senate of the United States would perform a reassuring service to the American people if, instead of announcing that it is planning to adjourn on August 1, it would announce that it is planning to stay in session, ready to back up the hands of the President, by giving him whatever aid he needs as Commander in Chief to bring to the earliest possible end the crisis in Asia, and serve clear notice to Russia that business as usual in America does not happen to be the slogan of the day.

Mr. President, it needs to be pointed out to the American people that they must dispel from their minds the notion that we can continue with a "business as usual" economic program in this crisis. There is a discussion pending in the Senate over a tax bill. I want to see that tax bill, however, discussed in the Congress from the standpoint of strengthening America's defenses, and not from the standpoint of trying to save somebody some dollars in lower taxes. I want to see discussed the tax issue from the standpoint of revising the tax structure so taxes will be fair. That is all the American taxpayer is entitled to in this crisis. He is entitled to have the inequities eliminated from the tax structure and a fair tax program adopted.

Mr. President, I think the time has also come to tell the American taxpayer that if we are to keep America as strong as it must be kept in order to meet the emergency which confronts the Nation, he will have to pay substantial taxes, and probably some people will have to pay higher taxes, because we are not going to meet this Russian threat on a "business as usual" basis.

So, Mr. President, I say what we ought to be devoting our attention to now is a civilian defense program which seeks to mobilize the civilian economy of the country so as to back up the boys who will be called upon to sacrifice their lives before this crisis is over. I think the time has come for the Congress to close ranks itself on the whole question of national defense. We ought to proceed quickly with an effective civilian defense program.

I ask the question: What is that program? Can anyone in the administration tell the American people today what the civilian defense program is? Let me tell the Senate that as an essential part of that program should be an assurance to the people of America that this time we are going to mobilize not only the manpower of America but the economy of America too. We must make clear by whatever legislation is necessary that this time for a certainty we are going to take all unreasonable profits out of any war effort, even though it may be a minor war. We must check inflation before it starts. We must mobilize industry as well as manpower. We must show a united people and a united economy.

I submit we as a Congress have a job to do on this question of mobilizing the civilian economy of the United States. In my judgment we cannot justify any adjournment or recess on August 1. I think for purposes of emphasis as to the seriousness of the crisis, we would do well as a Congress if we made clear to the American people today that there will be no adjournment on August 1st, but that the Congress will remain at its post, as we expect those in the armed services to remain at their posts until we make perfectly clear to the peoples of the world that we are going to protect freedom from the type of aggressive attack upon it of which Russia and her satellities are presently guilty.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 22 OF 1950—UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand the time which the Senator from Oregon has just used is to be taken out of my time, which is devoted to those who are opposed to Senate Resolution 290. However, be that as it may, I again submit the unanimous-consent request that after the vote is taken at 4 o'clock on Senate Resolution 290 the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 299, which deals with Reorganization Plan No. 22; that 1 hour of debate be allotted, to be divided evenly between the proponents and the opponents of Senate Resolution 299.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Does the Senator from Pennsylvania desire at this time to designate who shall control the hour's time?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] will control the time on behalf of the proponents of Senate Resolution 299, and that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania will control the time of the opponents of the resolution. I include that provision in my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators now be permitted to introduce bills and joint resolutions, to present petitions and memorials, and to place routine matters in the RECORD, without speeches and without debate, the time for the transaction of such routine business to be evenly divided between the proponents and the opponents of Senate Resolution 290.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR McCARRAN, OF NEVADA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have prepared entitled "Why Do Outside Pressure Groups Seek To 'Get' Nevada's Distinguished Senator, PAT MCCARRAN?"

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY DO OUTSIDE PRESSURE GROUPS SEEK TO "GET" NEVADA'S DISTINGUISHED SENATOR, PAT MCCARRAN?

(Statement by Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND)

In recent months the press has reported the formation in New York City of a committee which is conducting a Nation-wide solicitation compaign to raise money to defeat PAT MCCARRAN in his bid for reelection as Senator from Nevada.

Why does this committee propose to dump vast sums of money into Nevada to "get" Senator MCCARRAN?

Senator MCCARRAN is chairman of a special Senate subcommittee which has just completed an extensive 2-year investigation of our immigration and naturalization systems. An exhaustive report of the subcommittee (Senate Rept. 1515) exposes the many loopholes in our immigration and naturalization systems through which Communist agents and other subversives have been gaining admission into the United States and thereafter procuring American citizenship in order to more effectively carry on their nefarious work of boring from within.

A study of the voluminous hearings of the McCarran subcommittee compels the conclusion that the Communist conspiracy in the United States is not a home-grown product but is a weed which has been transplanted by Communist agitators who are sent into this country for the purpose of organizing Communist cells, forming Communist-front organizations and engaging in other nefarious activities designed to undermine our democratic institutions.

The Attorney General of the United States testified before the subcommittee that an analysis of figures of 4,984 of the more militant members of the Communist Party in the United States showed that 91.4 percent of the total were of foreign stock or were married to persons of foreign stock.

Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, recently testified with respect to aliens who have been proven to be deportable on the grounds that they advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence but who cannot under our present laws be deported.

As a result of the study and investigation Senator MCCARRAN introduced in the Senate an omnibus bill (S. 3455) which provides for a complete rewrite of the immigration and naturalization laws and is designed to plug all the loopholes in the present laws and to sever the pipeline of subversive penetration. Already the Communist press and Communist-front organizations have let loose a barrage of propaganda against the bill and its sponsor, Senator MCCARRAN. It is expected that the bill will be scheduled for Senate action early in the next session of the Congress in January and therefore these groups are determined to "get" MCCARRAN and thus defeat the passage of this legislation which is urgently needed to protect the security of our country.

Senator MCCARRAN led the fight in the Senate to embody in the displaced-persons legislation amendments designed to screen out subversives and other undesirables who have been gaining admission into the United States under the guise of displaced persons. In this fight Senator MCCARRAN was supported by numerous patriotic organizations, including the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, but he was opposed by various pressure groups which over the years have had as their ultimate objective the destruction of our protective immigration system. Just one pressure group on displaced-persons legislation registered with the Clerk of the House of Representatives lobbying expenditures of over $1,000,000.

The facts which were disclosed by a special subcommittee of the Senate, of which Senator McCARRAN was chairman, revealed that there had been a complete break-down in the administration of the displaced persons law. Typical of the evidence before the subcommittee was the testimony that vast numbers of persons had gained admission into the United States as displaced persons who were of doubtful eligibility. It was also revealed that the Displaced Persons Commission had a calculated-risk policy whereby displaced persons were being brought into the United States without security checks being first obtained. With reference to this situation the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization testified that there were under investigation in the United States a number of aliens who had gained admission into the United States as displaced persons on whom adverse security information was available in Europe at the time the aliens embarked for the United States.

Because Senator McCARRAN insisted on amendments to strengthen the administration of the law and to protect the security interests of the United States, these pressure groups are likewise determined to "get" McCARRAN.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary, of which Senator McCARRAN is chairman, has recently reported favorably to the Senate a bill (S. 595) to strengthen the espionage laws and a bill (S. 2311) which requires Communists and members of Communist-front organizations to register with the Department of Justice. The Communist and Communist-front groups that are opposing these bills are likewise determined to "get" McCARRAN.

The issue presented by the intervention in an election in the State of Nevada by outside pressure groups is more than the question of the reelection or defeat of one of Nevada's representatives in the United States Senate. The issue is a challenge to every patriotic American who is concerned with the security of our country and the protection of our democratic institutions.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF MILK—STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of resolutions adopted by food and drug officials of the United States at their fifty-fourth annual convention, June 11 to June 15, 1950. I ask unanimous consent that this statement and two appended resolutions be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

COMMENTS ON INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF MILK

Last week I commented on the urgent necessity of breaking down phony so-called health regulations which prevent the free movement of interstate milk. Thirty-two States, including Wisconsin, are now under the regulations of the United States Public Health Service with regard to milk certification. But this is not enough, because in the remainder of the States, there are more and more little Chinese walls—phony barriers—being set up against our pure milk.

Let me point out that of the whole milk produced in Wisconsin, only 15 percent is consumed within the borders in my State, and 85 percent is consumed outside the State. Thus we in Wisconsin have a tremendous dependence on out-of-State markets. When it comes to butter, 30 percent of the product is consumed in our State and 70 percent must find a market outside Wisconsin. Finally, when we come to cheese, 96 percent has an out-of-State destination, while only 4 percent is consumed in Wisconsin. We are great cheese eaters; but because of the mammoth totals we produce, we depend on out-of-State consumption.

The fluid milk situation is, however, the most critical. That is why I was glad to receive from Mr. Bernhard C. Swenson, deputy commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Agriculture, Dairy, and Food, two resolutions which were adopted by food and drug officials of the United States in convention assembled. The first of the resolutions pertains to this very matter of United States Public Health Service milk certification. The second pertains to the substitution of foreign fat for milk fat in ice cream.

Now that the new oleomargarine law has gone into effect, as of July 1, we are aware that there will be an increasing effort to perpetrate fraud and misrepresentation on the American consuming public. We know that the Food and Drug Administration has an almost impossible task before it in trying to police the 525,000 eating places in our country and in trying to make sure that they comply with the identification provisions of the oleo statute. That is why we are determined that there must be adequate funds for pure food and drug enforcement. That is why, too, we must stop the trend toward synthetic substitution in its tracks right now, lest the entire American dairy industry which so crucially is tied up with American health and American soil conservation is ruined.

I congratulate the food and drug officials for the fine action which they took at their fifty-fourth annual convention in Galveston with reference to these two dairy resolutions.

EXCERPTS FROM RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE FOOD AND DRUG OFFICIALS OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FIFTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE IN GALVESTON, JUNE 11–15, 1950

INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS OF MARKET MILK

To promote increased consumption of fluid milk, insure confidence in the supervision, rating and certification of market milk from surplus-producing areas, we recommend that certification be performed by a Federal agency in accordance with provisions of the 1939 issue of the United States Public Health Service Milk Ordinance and Code.

We urge and recommend that the Congress of the United States provide by statute that the Federal agency charged with the responsibility of certifying market milk for interstate shipments shall cooperate with the State agency designated by law in each State as having the responsibility of supervising the production, processing and marketing of milk and other dairy products.

SUBSTITUTION OF FOREIGN FAT FOR MILK FAT IN ICE CREAM

Whereas the Federal Food and Drug Administration has declared that the substitution in whole or in part of fats other than milk fat in ice cream, is an adulterated product, and

Whereas many of the States have specific prohibitory provisions in their rules and regulations for regulatory guidance which make it illegal to substitute foreign fats for milk fat: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Food and Drug Officials in this fifty-fourth convention assembled, go on record as favoring the enactment or incorporation in all standards of specific provision to exclude the abstraction of milk fat and the substitution in its stead of foreign fats as a measure to prevent consumer fraud and deceit.

THE CAVALRY CHARGES ON—ARTICLE BY HANSON W. BALDWIN

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the New York Times for Sunday, July 2, the distinguished military writer, Hanson W. Baldwin, published an article entitled "The Cavalry Charges On." What Mr. Baldwin says typifies eloquently the qualities which have made fine armies in the past and without which there cannot be fine armies in the future. In a very real sense, it is this spirit which has saved our country in its hour of danger.

For this reason, I ask unanimous consent that the article be published in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CAVALRY CHARGES ON—IT'S DEAD IN FACT AND ACT OF CONGRESS, BUT IT WILL RIDE FOREVER IN FREE HEARTS

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Reserve the stirrups, turn out the mounts to pasture; the Cavalry has gone. The crepe is on the pommel, the mourning bow upon the sword hilt; the Cavalry has gone.

No more of the glint of sunlight on the saber, the sweet music of the creak of saddle harness, the champ of bits. The sound of Boots and Saddles sings no more across the Great Plains; the horse has retired from the field of battle. The yellow legs, who won the West with carbine and with Colt; the Garry Owens of the famous Seventh, who died with Custer at the Little Big Horn, ride no longer; for the Cavalry has gone forever.

Even the gallant name. * * *

Today for the first time in a century and a half of progress there is no Cavalry in the United States Army. A signature last week—that of Harry S. Truman—was its requiem. But the President's endorsement of a bill reorganizing the Army, abolishing the Cavalry as an arm, and substituting armor for it represented merely legal recognition of historical fact.

THE MAN-MADE HORSE

Nostalgia for the past, melancholy pride in great achievements, and all the panoply of jingling harness and troopers at the charge could not hide the doom of the horse on the field of battle. Inanimate mechanisms made by men were his undoing; the machine gun, the tank, and the plane were the robots which inherited his world.

Not since the Twenty-sixth Cavalry, harried and bloody, tired but gallant, covered the rear guard of the Army from Damortis to Bataan had the yellow legs straddled their mounts. The First Cavalry Division, a fighting outfit, was in the van of combat from Australia to Japan, but it fought dismounted, and improvised horsed commands and mule-pack trains toiled in small units over the bitter mountains of Italy. In World War II the horse in the United States Army had but a small role.

And so the Cavalry, like all things mortal, has died.

But its soul goes marching on.

For the soul of the Cavalry is élan, aggressiveness, the will-to-fight, dash, the debonair, reckless but ordered discipline that took the Four Hundred into the Valley of Death at Balaklava, that rode with Stuart and with Sheridan, with Custer and with Lee. The spirit of the Cavalry is the spirit basic to any army, a spirit not exclusive to this arm alone, but one of which it was peculiarly possessed.

A SENSE OF TRADITION

For the Cavalry had a sense of tradition, an awareness of its responsibility to history, to the men who have gone, to the standards of the past, to those who died that the way of life we want, the things for which we fight, might live.

It has been popular in these times of fatalism and doubt to impugn tradition, to cast aside as worthless the bright heritage of valor and hope the past has given us. No more fatal mistake to Army or Nation is possible, for tradition, sound tradition, both civic and martial, is the inspiration from the past which must light the future.

The history of the Cavalry, gone in name but never in spirit, provides some of the finest of our Army's traditions. The lilt of von Borcke's songs, he who rode with Jeb Stuart, long has been stilled; Pelham's guns thunder no more; Light Horse Harry Lee, and Marion, the swamp fox, are long dead; the dragoon with brass helmets and horsehair plumes who fought with Wayne at Fallen Timbers live only in old prints.

FORGOTTEN, FAR-OFF THINGS

Resaca de la Palma and the wild charge with sabers are but an incident in the history books now, and the Indian Wars, when the yellow legs fought from Red River and the Rio Grande to Montana and the Rockies are but dates and figures. The Cheyenne, the Sioux, and the Apache are mere ghosts from a dim, forgotten past.

The men are dead, the graves grass-covered, the horses gone, even the monuments weather-stained and strange, a bronze or marble charger oddly out of place in this mechanized age.

But the tattered battle streamers and the silver battle rings bear the great names of the past into the future: Bull Run, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Comanches, Oklahoma, the Admiralties, Leyte, Luzon, Tokyo. And the great names will not die. From Henry Dodge, the first colonel of the American Cavalry Service, to George Patton, the roll-call of the Cavalry will live on.

The Cavalry is not dead; its spirit, its traditions, its immortal intangibles endure. Its tactics, its esprit are the heritage of armor and of the Army; the yellow legs are gone, but they have left behind them the things that soldiers live by.

TREES ON THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed to make a statement for not to exceed 2½ minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, some weeks ago I wrote to the Architect of the Capitol and pointed out to him that I thought it would be extremely interesting if he could have appropriate markers placed upon historical trees that are not now identified on the Capitol Grounds, and also identification markers placed on other trees, so that the many people from all over the country who visit the Capitol each year will know where the tree came from and will have some information about it. I have recently received a reply from Mr. Lynn, the Architect of the Capitol. He writes as follows:

In compliance with your request, I have had prepared and am transmitting herewith (1) a list of the trees in the United States Capitol Grounds, showing their botanical name, common name, and habitat; (2) a list of shrubs in the United States Capitol Grounds, showing their botanical name and common name; (3) a list of memorial and historic trees now in the United States Capitol Grounds; (4) a list of memorial and historic trees formerly in the United States Capitol Grounds which died prior to May 22, 1950, and have been removed.

In response to your suggestion, plaques are being prepared for all memorial and historic trees not now identified by markers, and identification markers are also being prepared and will be placed upon other trees in the Capitol Grounds in the near future. No additional appropriation is required for this purpose. In view of the fact that there are over 2,000 trees in the Capital Grounds and that many of the trees are of identical varieties, it is proposed only to put one or two markers on identical trees, when located in the same immediate area.

Mr. President, I had no idea there were as many as 2,000 trees on the Capitol Grounds. That fact of itself, I think, is extremely interesting. At the close of my remarks, I am going to ask to have inserted in the RECORD a list of the trees on the United States Capitol Grounds, giving their botanical names, their common names, and where they are native. In addition to this, I shall ask to have inserted another list of the memorial and historic trees, by whom they were planted or whom they memorialize, the State represented, the common name of each tree, and its botanical name.

We still have an American elm planted prior to 1800 by George Washington. There is a red oak planted by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., of Massachusetts, on May 4, 1912. There is another red oak planted by the late Senator Charles L. McNary, of Oregon, on April 20, 1923. In 1913, Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, also planted a red oak. Vice President Thomas R. Marshall in 1912 planted a hickory tree. Representative Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, on April 15, 1920, planted an American birch. There is a tree to honor the mothers of America, a Boy Scout tree, an Arbor Day tree planted on April 10, 1947, by our minority leader, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. There is a war memorial tree, and so it goes.

Twenty-two States are represented by twenty-one varieties of trees. It might interest Senators to know that nearly all parts of the world are represented: Europe, Asia, Japan, Canada, Persia, China, for example. There are 9 kinds of maple, 5 kinds of birch, 3 kinds of ash, 10 representatives of the magnolia family, 13 kinds of oak trees, 9 kinds of elms.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the body of the RECORD, following my remarks, the list of trees to which I have referred. I feel confident that the Members of Congress will find it of interest. I hope the markers will shortly be placed, so that the Members, as well as the public, in walking around the Capitol Grounds will have an opportunity to learn the names of the trees which they see and which add such beauty to the surroundings of our Capitol.

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—FEPC CLOTURE PETITION

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may address two questions to the acting majority leader, relative to the program for Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to ask the distinguished acting majority leader if he knows whether there will be a calendar call on Monday or perhaps on Tuesday of next week.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand there is unanimous consent to have the Senate vote on the Sumner Pike nomination at 4 o'clock on Monday, and that the time between 12 noon and 4 p. m. is to be evenly divided between the proponents and the opponents of confirmation of that nomination. So there will be no opportunity on Monday to have a call of the calendar.

Of course, if the Senate were to meet tomorrow, there might be a call of the calendar then. However, there is to be no session tomorrow, in order to give the Appropriations Committee an opportunity to report the appropriations bill as soon as possible.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the information that there will not be a call of the calendar on Monday.

Mr. MYERS. I shall confer with the majority leader as soon as he returns, and shall see if it is possible to have a call of the calendar following Monday, as soon as practicable.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask another question of the distinguished acting majority leader, if he will yield.

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Yesterday I asked the majority leader whether he would prepare the cloture petition on the motion to consider the FEPC bill which he expects to file on Monday, and on which the vote would be taken on the following Wednesday. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania know whether the cloture petition has been prepared?

Mr. MYERS. It has been prepared, and has just been delivered to my desk.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish the Senator would announce that, so all Senators who wish to sign the cloture petition may have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the cloture petition has been prepared, and is now on my desk. All Senators who desire to sign the cloture petition may do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 24 OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 290) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950, providing for the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 10 minutes to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I regret very much that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is absent today because of the illness of his wife.

Today I shall take the liberty of speaking for both Senators from Virginia, because both of us are of the opinion that it will be wise for the Senate to adopt Senate Resolution 290, the Fulbright resolution, to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 24. Before giving my reasons for that position, I wish to take occasion to express my very high regard for the ability, the integrity, and the unselfish devotion to duty of the distinguished Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Sawyer. If my decision were to be based solely on a question of personality, I frankly could not name anyone whom I should prefer over Mr. Sawyer to administer the affairs of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to control its general policies. But the junior Senator from Virginia feels that it would be the part of wisdom if we were to delay action on the RFC proposal until the Senate Banking and Currency Committee can conclude its present study of the RFC and can have an opportunity, which we shall embrace at the earliest possible date next year, to submit to the Senate a definite plan.

It is known that the RFC subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, headed by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], has spent a good many weeks studying this whole problem. He feels—and I think properly so—that action today in transferring or authorizing the transfer of RFC to the Department of Commerce would nullify the work which has been done by that subcommittee, and would place the Senate and the Congress in such a position next year that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to work out a plan which many think would be better than the pending proposal to transfer RFC to the Department of Commerce.

There are six bills pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, all purportedly designed to aid small business. One of those bills would direct the RFC to make loans to small business on easier credit terms than are now authorized by law. In stating that I have great confidence in Secretary Sawyer, I had in mind his testimony on those bills before our committee, in which he emphatically said that he did not think the Government should make a loan to anyone on inadequate security. He also said he was a firm believer in the American system of competitive enterprise. I know that both his private life and his official action fully confirm that expression on his part.

It will be a physical impossibility for the Senate Banking and Currency Committee to complete action during the present session, on the six bills to which I have referred. One of the bills, as I say, deals directly with RFC. All the others deal more or less with the general credit policies of the Nation. It would be logical, therefore, if we were to defer action at this time on transferring the RFC to the Department of Commerce until we can see what the Senate Banking and Currency Committee ultimately does on the pending credit proposals, and what further facts may be developed by the Fulbright committee, which has not completed its study.

The testimony before the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments concerning the Fulbright resolution shows that the resolution of disapproval was strongly endorsed by the American Bankers Association, the testimony to that effect being given by my good friend, Mr. Francis Cocke, of Roanoke, who is chairman of the Committee on Federal legislation of that great bankers association. Speaking for that national association, Mr. Cocke said they were definitely opposed to the transfer of RFC to the Department of Commerce. I am not sure whether he said that the bankers preferred it to remain an independent agency, but I think he did. As I recall he also said that if it were to be transferred anywhere, they would prefer to see it go to the Treasury Department.

The legal representative of the Association of Reserve City Bankers testified before the committee against the transfer of RFC to the Department of Commerce. The chairman of the citizens committee for the Hoover report testified against the transfer to the Department of Commerce. He wanted the recommendations of the Hoover Commission to transfer RFC to the Treasury Department carried out. A few days ago I read a newspaper story—I assume it was correct—in which it was stated that personally Mr. Hoover favored the transfer of RFC to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

The hearings before the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments showed that the task force of the Hoover Commission thought the RFC should be abolished. There are a good many Members of Congress who share that viewpoint. The RFC was created in a great emergency in 1932 to furnish working capital, when the banks were unable to do so and when such capital was not available elsewhere. I may add, Mr. President, the RFC did a great job. It met a known emergency, and met it well. No agency which handles billions of dollars can be perfect, and I think even the most biased friends of RFC will now admit that the RFC has made some rather serious errors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. ROBERTSON. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 10 minutes more to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As I say, the RFC has made some rather serious errors. I may mention Lustron, for example. That certainly was not a very well conceived loan. I read in the newspapers that RFC made a loan to a hotel in the great State of Nevada whose earning power was largely, if not solely, dependent upon the successful operation of a gambling concession.

But the over-all operations of the RFC have been well handled. We have within recent years greatly expanded its privilege of loaning money. It now has a lending capacity up to $3,750,000,000. That is a tremendous economic power. Certain witnesses—I do not associate myself with them—testified before the committee that if the lending power of $3,750,000,000 were taken from an independent agency, subject to congressional control and reporting directly to the Congress, and whose files are always open to Congress, and that agency were made a part of a department, there would be a great temptation to use that tremendous lending power for political purposes. I say I do not make that charge. It was made and is contained in the hearings which have been placed on our desks.

There were several other witnesses who, for various reasons, opposed the transfer.

So, Mr. President, because the Fulbright committee investigating the RFC has not completed its work, because the Banking and Currency Committee has not finished work on six bills relating to credit, and because there was no unity in the Hoover Commission as to what should be done, Mr. Hoover favoring the Federal Reserve Board, the task force favoring abolishing the RFC, a majority of the committee favoring transfer to the Treasury Department, and only two or three members of the Hoover Commission favoring transfer to the Department of Commerce, I think it would be the part of wisdom for the Senate to take no action at this time, but to let the matter go over.

Certainly there is no burning issue with regard to easy credit at the present time. The banks are overflowing with money. Three times as much money is now in circulation as was the case before the war. The month of May was reported by the Federal Reserve Board as the month of the greatest production in our history. June has been reported as the month of almost complete employment. All economists are of the opinion that this situation will undoubtedly continue for the remainder of the year. Certainly the war in Korea will not bring on a depression. It may bring on a great deal of new expenses, which I wish to mention before I conclude. But war does not bring on depressions.

So, Mr. President, I do not see how anything will be imperiled by letting this proposed transfer go over until next year and giving the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate an opportunity to present a bill which will be open to all germane amendments. We can recommend that the RFC be abolished as an independent agency, or we can transfer it wherever the majority says it should be transferred. We are not binding the hands of Congress in any way by letting the matter go over until the whole subject can be more fully explored.

Mr. President, the measures which are coming before us next week and the following week pale into insignificance what we are debating today. On yesterday our distinguished Majority Leader called on the Senate Appropriations Committee to have its bill ready for floor action by next Monday and requested us to work at night if necessary to do so. If the full committee does not undertake to make an item-by-item review of the work of its subcommittees we can have the bill ready for floor action by next Monday. But the total of that bill will surprise some who have not kept in close touch with the new demands for money presented to us since the House passed the bill and who do not understand how impractical it would be to apply arbitrary percentage cuts to such agencies as the defense agencies, the Post Office Department and the FBI. Our committee has been forced to restore a substantial part of the cuts which would have been made by the Taber amendment to add some $300,000,000 on the basis of new supplemental estimates and over $1,000,000 for the military aid bill which the Senate passed by unanimous vote. As the result, the appropriation bill on which the Senate will act will be much in excess of the bill passed by the House.

On yesterday, the Secretary of the Treasury, John Snyder, testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, warned Congress that the Nation might as well grit its teeth and get used to the idea of higher taxes and not lower taxes, because of Korea.

The distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has notified us this morning that when that bill comes before the Senate he wants to see it debated on the basis of the national security and general welfare, and not on the basis of what candidates may be helped by the passage of certain provisions of the bill.

Public sentiment has backed the action of President Truman in carrying out the mandate of the Security Council of the United Nations to make a firm stand against the unjustified communistic aggression in South Korea. Public sentiment backs the action of the Congress in continuing ECA aid for western Europe and military aid under the provisions of the Atlantic Pact. But public sentiment expects all of this international program, involving the expenditure of vast sums and the possible loss of life in the Korean conflict to be a definite contribution to world peace.

The results to be accomplished will be a sad and bitter disappointment to the people of America if it should turn out that the nations whom we are endeavoring to help preserve their personal freedom do not love that freedom enough to fight for it. A pertinent discussion of what is involved in the present Korean conflict is carried in an article by Joseph C. Harsch, published on yesterday in the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the article to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF THE NATION
THE IMPORTANT THING
(By Joseph C. Harsch)

WASHINGTON.—During these anxious and swift-moving days we should keep in mind that the important thing is not whether the forces of the West hold Korea, but that a common effort has been mobilized to try to prevent the fall of one country—it could be any country—to naked force.

Korea itself may well be lost. The Korean Army has proved disappointing in the first phase of military operations. There is no evidence yet that the Korean people as a mass are taking an effectively active interest in behalf of their own independence. The burden falls increasingly on the military forces coming in from outside under the aegis of the United Nations.

If the Korean people themselves rally to their own defense, then Korea can in all probability be rescued and revived. But if they fail to rally then eventually the forces now giving them their chance must retire. The United States is not putting its military forces into Korea to gain military bases. American military opinion long since judged Korea to be military untenable. United States Army, Navy, and Air Force thinking is equally opposed to establishing any permanent United States positions on Korea.

From the strictly military point of view, they want nothing to do with Korea, and will get out at the first possible moment. In the long run, Korea can be sustained only by the will of its own people to retain their independence. If they fail to demonstrate that will, then Korea will be lost. It could be lost very soon.

Certainly it would be far better to try in Korea, and succeed, than to try, and fail. Failure would give the Comintern propagandists a useful weapon. They could argue that events in Korea prove a preference among Asiatic peoples for Russian communism over western freedom. The argument would be specious, but it undoubtedly would impress many persons.

But that is not the important thing. The important thing is that the effort was made; that the United States proved that it learned the lessons of nonintervention and appeasement in the thirties; proved that the United States is sincere about all the things it has done of recent years to save the West.

If this effort had not been made, it is almost certain that the great coalition would have fallen apart. What has not been sufficiently realized or admitted publicly over here is that the winter of 1949–50 was a period of declining faith in the cause of the West. Europe particularly began to doubt the sincerity of the Marshall plan and the Atlantic Pact and the United Nations and everything else involved in the common security of the western world. There was a frightening degeneration in the atmosphere which showed itself in Europe in a rising urge to neutralism, in the startling numbers of persons in all European countries who would sign the Stockholm petition, in an atmosphere of defeatism.

This degeneration of western morale, this creeping lack of faith, was checked for the first time by the Schuman plan and talk of new weapons. But it was not exorcised for all time. The fear that the will of Moscow was a stronger mental quantity than the will of the west was there to be revived in full anguish at the news of the march of an invading army across a frontier.

If the military effort to rescue Korea fails, then Korea is lost, and there is propaganda discomfort to us, and it will be in order to examine the methods which failed so signally to set up an effective government in South Korea. But that is the sum of it.

If the military effort to rescue Korea had not been made, all the labors of five years probably would have come to naught and we would have seen a cringing Europe plodding off one by one to make its peace with Moscow.

We may hope that the Korean cause is not a lost cause. But we should also remember that the bigger cause has been won no matter what the outcome in Korea. The faith of the West has been confirmed and renewed. We and our friends now have the proof we all needed of each other's sincerity.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. Is it not almost certain that because of the investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the Senate Banking and Currency Committee will offer a bill dealing with the operation of that corporation?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I so understand. That is one of the main reasons I ask my colleagues in the Senate not to preclude us from making a report in which we think they will be much interested.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington would like to say that that reason justifies his opposition to Reorganization Plan No. 24, because if we agree at this time to the proposal, we are likely within a few short months of this time to be required to undo, or we may wish to undo what we have done.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think so. I think we should have another look at it. If we take a look at it, and our look does not agree with the look at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, our look will probably be vetoed.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 2:15 p. m. It appears that there are not many Senators who desire to speak in opposition to this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate now take a recess until 2:15 p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. MYERS. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 2:15 o'clock p. m.

On the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled and was called to order by the Vice President.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 24 OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 290) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950, providing for the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, when the Hoover Commission made its report on the reorganization of the Treasury Department, the majority of the Commission recommended that the RFC be placed in the Treasury Department. With Commissioners Pollock and Rowe, I dissented from this recommendation, and recommended instead that the RFC be placed in the Commerce Department.

The reason for this minority recommendation was our belief that if the functions of government were to be grouped according to their major purposes, the RFC should be incorporated in the Department of Commerce, because its major purpose is, of course, the stabilization and improvement of industry and commerce, and the lending of money is merely a means of achieving that major purpose of the RFC.

However, at that time conditions with respect to the RFC were considerably different from what they are now. In view of the fact that the subcommittee headed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has been holding hearings, which I understand are not completed, and that some rather unsavory revelations have been made at the hearings, it seems to me best at this time not to place the RFC in any department of government, which might give it a greater air of permanency.

It is apparent already that after the subcommittee has completed its hearings the RFC must be purified in some way, or abolished. In view of the fact that the future of the RFC is so uncertain at this time, I feel that I am on sound ground in voting to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 24 as submitted by the President.

Mr. President, I take this position without prejudice to incorporating the RFC in one of the departments of government at a later date if it is found advisable to continue its existence. I still believe, as I did as a member of the Hoover Commission, that if the RFC is put in any department the Department of Commerce is more nearly the proper department than the Treasury Department. But under the circumstances I think it best not to put it in any of the departments of government at this time, but to vote to approve the resolution which disapproves Reorganization Plan No. 24.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOUGLAS in the chair). The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

THE BOY SCOUT JAMBOREE AT VALLEY FORGE, PA.—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, last Friday afternoon the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania had the honor of accompanying the President of the United States to Valley Forge, where we visited the International Jamboree of the Boy Scouts. We were met at Valley Forge by the Governor of Pennsylvania and some members of his cabinet. We drove over the great field, where more than 47,000 Boy Scouts were encamped. The boys gathered there represented more than four times the number of soldiers Washington had on that celebrated field during the winter of 1776–77.

Mr. President, that was one of the most inspiring sights I have ever witnessed. Each one of those boys did his own cooking. They were carefully supervised by their scoutmasters, and by others who had volunteered for the work. Each State of the Union, each Territory and the District of Columbia, and, in addition 18 foreign countries, were represented. I think probably this gathering has done more to promote peace in the world than anything that has been attempted in a long time.

The President of the United States made a most inspiring address to the young Americans gathered there. In addition to the Boy Scouts and those training them, there were thousands who assembled for that important occasion. They were all sitting on the ground in front of the President. It was probably the largest gathering ever addressed by a President of the United States. The President delivered a prepared address, but he deviated from it on several occasions. He gave to those boys, the future leaders of this country, kind and fatherly advice. I feel that his address is of such importance that I now ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As honorary president of the Boy Scouts of America, I am proud to open this Scout jamboree. I understand that there are nearly 50,000 Scouts in this encampment. I am glad to see such evidence of the strength of the Scout movement. And I think it most appropriate in times likes these that you have chosen to hold your jamboree at this historic shrine of Valley Forge.

When George Washington brought his army to this spot in December 1777, the cause of independence appeared to be lost. His army at that time numbered only 11,000 men—less than one-fourth the number of Scouts attending this jamboree. Washington's men were without adequate food. They were in rags. Some had no shoes. They had to build their own shelter against the bitter weather. The enemy occupied the capital city of Philadelphia. Few men believed that George Washington's tiny force could survive. Victory seemed out of the question.

But the men of that army stuck it out. They stuck it out because they had a fierce belief in the cause of freedom for which they were fighting. And because of that belief, they won.

I know that we still have, in this country, the same unconquerable belief in freedom.

Many of you know, I am sure, that men from other countries came over here, during our Revolutionary War, to fight with us for freedom. Lafayette, a Frenchman; Von Steuben, a German; Pulaski, a Pole, and many others were here with our army at Valley Forge.

Today, even more than in Washington's time, men in other countries share our belief in freedom and our willingness to make sacrifices for it. These men are just as eager as we are to achieve peace in the world based on freedom and justice. If we are to succeed in our common struggle for peace, we must know and work with these freedom-loving people of other countries. We need to understand their problems and they need to understand ours, so that all of us can work together effectively.

I am very glad that the Boy Scouts are doing so much to further this understanding among people from different countries. You are to be congratulated on sending so many food and clothing packages overseas and on your support of the United Nations appeal for children and the World Friendship Fund.

At this encampment, there are Scouts from every State in the Union, from Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and from the Philippines and many other foreign countries. This is a practical demonstration of how to achieve world understanding. When you work and live together, and exchange ideas around the campfire, you get to know what the other fellow is like. That is the first step toward settling world problems in a spirit of give and take, instead of fighting about them.

I wish that more people from foreign countries would visit here and learn about our way of life. When visitors come over here and spend some time with us, they carry back to their home countries a truer picture of what American democracy is really like.

And the same thing is true in the other direction. The more of us from the United States who go abroad, and live for awhile with people in other countries, the better prepared we will be to work with other nations for peace in the world.

I hope that many of you Scouts will have a chance to attend jamborees like this one in other countries. I hope that in the future you will have opportunities to travel and live abroad. Some of you may decide to choose your life work abroad—in business, in religious or educational activities, or in Government.

For those of you who are so inclined, I don't believe you could find more satisfying careers. There is a tremendous amount of pioneering work to be done. In many lands, the people are eager to learn modern methods of making their lives healthier and more secure. Our young citizens can help to teach modern techniques to the people of those areas, and assist them to improve their health and education, increase their production, and raise their standards of living. Bringing better conditions to the people of these countries will be a great contribution to the cause of peace.

The Scout movement is good training for this kind of international work. Scouting is based on the ideal of human brotherhood. Scouts know that the men of other lands are very like ourselves. They have the same desire to work for human advancement.

The great tragedy of our times is that there are movements in the world that deny this fundamental ideal of human brotherhood. These movements have devoted themselves to preaching distrust between the nations. They have made a religion of hate. They have tried to turn the peoples of the earth against one another—to create a gulf between different peoples that fellowship cannot bridge. As part of this effort, they have tried to poison the minds of young people.

Back in the days of Hitler and Mussolini, the young people of Germany and Italy were regimented in organizations dedicated to the ideas of racial hatred and war. They were shut off from the influence of their families and their churches, and sacrificed to the ambition of the tyrants who led them.

Today, the young people of Communist-dominated countries are being mobilized and marched, in the same fashion, under the hammer and sickle. These boys and girls are being given a completely distorted picture of the world and prevented from learning the truth about other countries. They are being taught to place the state above the obligations of family life. They are being brought up to despise religion and to believe that God does not exist. They are being made into tools of power politics, and their masters will not hesitate to sacrifice their lives if that will advance the cause of Communist imperialism.

This is a sad and terrible thing. You Scouts can understand only in part how sad it is. But your parents can understand the sorrow that afflicts the parents of other lands when they see their children taken from them in this way, turned against the ideals they hold dear, and used to serve the purposes of a godless power.

How can we meet this situation? There is only one way. We must not return hate for the hate which these young people are being taught to feel toward us. We must realize that they are the victims of a cynical group of leaders. We must make it clear to them that we believe in the fellowship of human beings, in the possibility of cooperative human action, and in peace based on mutual understanding. We must show them, over and over again, that fellowship is possible between men of different nations, different colors, and different creeds.

We must continue to hold out to them the invitation to work with us for the common good.

We are deeply and sincerely interested in the well-being of the youth of the world—not only American youth, but young people of all countries. We are working, and will continue to work, for a world in which young people are not regimented and exploited, but instead are given the opportunity to develop their capacities and contribute to a better future.

The United States, together with the other free nations, is striving to build a world in which men will live as good neighbors and work for the good of all. Our program for peace is not directed against the people of any land. It is designed to bring to all people the benefits of justice and freedom.

I hope that you young men in the Boy Scout movement, in this country and other countries, will take home from this jamboree a clearer understanding of the meaning of human brotherhood. I hope that you will work for freedom and peace with the same burning faith that inspired the men of George Washington's army here at Valley Forge.

We cannot succeed in building a peaceful world unless we all work as hard as we know how. I am confident that you will all do your best.

PROSPECTIVE ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, before I start my remarks about the pending question, I desire to make an observation in regard to the remarks made earlier in the session today by the distinguished, eminent, and successful Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. Since he is one of several other Senators, including myself, who have been successful in our primaries, I thought perhaps I might be a proper person to observe that I do not think it is quite fitting for those of us whose primaries are over to be too critical of those who still have to face a very difficult race. I congratulate the Senator from Oregon on his success in the Oregon primaries. If I recall correctly, however, he has been absent from the floor 6 or 8 weeks pursuing the matter of renomination in his own State. For him now, after that very successful effort, to say that anyone else from now on who might be interested in doing the same thing would be neglectful of his duty to the country and the Senate I think is being a little hard on our colleagues.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will my good friend from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. MORSE. I shall put the question in the form of a statement, in the absence of objection. It will take only 3 or 4 seconds. I wish to point out to the Senate that when I was engaged in my primary race there was no Korean crisis. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I expect another tough fight against the Democrats in November as I had against my Republican opposition in the primary. However, I do not think that the Congress should adjourn so that any of us who are up for election can take time to campaign.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think the race the Senator had against the Republicans was a very difficult one. If I recall correctly, it was a walk-away. I am very happy it was. Nevertheless, I think we have to have some consideration for those who are still looking forward to their primaries and to very difficult election contests.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will yield for a very brief comment.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas is speaking facetiously, because I know the Senator would not want the Senate to be out of session 1 hour if its presence in session would strengthen the security of the Nation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No; I would not. Sometimes, however, I wonder whether our presence here in session makes a tremendous contribution to the security of the country in every instance.

I now wish to address myself to the pending resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 24 OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 290) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950, providing for the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I particularly want to call to the attention of the Senate the statement made a moment ago by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and to emphasize the fact that he was a member of the Hoover Commission, and that he was a member of the minority of the Hoover Commission which recommended as a minority group that the RFC be transferred to the Department of Commerce. Now, after he has duly considered the matter and has heard some of the evidence and discussion about the RFC, his statement on the floor of the Senate that he is in favor of the pending resolution I think is extremely persuasive, and ought to be considered by anyone who is now thinking of voting against the resolution.

Mr. President, the question before the Senate is the adoption of Senate Resolution 290, resolving that the Senate does not favor Reorganization Plan No. 24, transmitted to the Congress on May 9, 1950. Unless this resolution is approved, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be transferred to the Department of Commerce, where, under the terms of Reorganization Plan No. 24, the RFC shall be "subject to the supervision, coordination and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce."

The reorganization plan, having been transmitted to the Congress on May 9, under the terms of the Reorganization Act of 1949, must be acted upon on or before July 8.

In order to put this proposal in what I consider to be its proper perspective, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate certain matters of record.

On February 8, 1950, by the adoption of Senate Resolution 219, the Senate authorized the Banking and Currency Committee "to conduct a thorough study of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with special attention given to the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to such corporations."

It will be noted that the resolution made particular reference to the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, directing that they be given special attention. Since the President's message referred to the Hoover Commission, and that point has been raised, I think it is quite proper to give some attention to exactly what the Commission did report.

The Hoover Commission, in its Report on Federal Business Enterprises, Recommendation No. 8, states:

> We recommend (a) that the Congress review the power to make direct loans * * * taking into account the problems of economy, efficiency, and integrity; (b) that in nonemergency periods, the Congress place restrictions on direct loans in order to insure that the normal channels of credit are utilized to the maximum extent possible or, alternatively, provide for the guaranty of loans made by private or other established agencies.

Recommendation No. 18 of this report is as follows:

> We recommend that the Congress review the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in accord with our recommendation No. 8.

In amplification of this recommendation, the Commission expressed itself strongly against direct lending by the Government, as follows:

> Direct lending by the Government to persons or enterprises opens up dangerous possibilities of waste and favoritism to individuals or enterprises. It invites political and private pressure, or even corruption. Emergencies may arise in depression, war, national defense, or disaster which must be met in this way. But direct lending should be absolutely avoided except for emergencies.

Pursuant to the resolution, the standing Subcommittee on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the Banking and Currency Committee was authorized and directed to make the study of the operations of the RFC. This subcommittee, composed of myself as chairman, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has been engaged in extensive hearings since shortly after the adoption of the resolution.

On checking the matter this morning, I found that the subcommittee has taken approximately 3,000 pages of testimony in executive and in open sessions. Approximately 2,000 pages of testimony were taken in open sessions, and 1,000 pages of testimony in executive sessions.

We have examined specific loans made by the RFC as examples of the policies and problems involved in that Corporation's activities, and we have also examined into the question of its cost to the taxpayers. We have scheduled hearings on every possible occasion since our authorization.

I may also say that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] made a trip to the West and personally inspected and conferred with the RFC officials in Denver and Salt Lake City, and made a very informative report to the subcommittee upon the activities of the RFC in those localities. The subcommittee has not yet had an opportunity to consider the cases and principles involved in this report.

Under the resolution authorizing this study, the committee is to report to the Senate on July 15. Although we are progressing very rapidly, it is certain that we shall not complete our study and report by that date, and it seems probable that we shall have to ask for an extension of time within which to make our report.

As I have already noted, Reorganization Plan No. 24, unless disapproved on or before July 8, will become effective on the following day, July 9. Thus, it is clear that the above-quoted recommendations of the Hoover Commission with respect to a congressional review of the RFC cannot be effectuated prior to the effective date of the reorganization plan.

As pointed out by the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, in its testimony presented to the Expenditures Committee, hearings, page 47:

> The Hoover Commission in its recommendations upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation placed major emphasis upon a full-dress review of the RFC's operations by the Congress.

Parenthetically, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate the recommendation of the Douglas Subcommittee on Monetary, Credit, and Fiscal Policies of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, Senate Document 129, that Congress review the programs and policies of the various Federal credit agencies.

That committee, at page 47 of its report, very concisely stated the problems involved, in the following words:

> By lending and guaranteeing loans on liberal terms during depressed periods and by following more restrictive policies in periods of high employment they—> can be an influence toward general economic stability and can assist flexible monetary and fiscal policies. But by following quite liberal policies at all times they may actually contribute to instability and at least partially defeat appropriate monetary and fiscal policies.

Mr. President, the review which the Hoover Commission recommended goes to the basic question of the future of the RFC and to the coordination of its policies with the economic situation. This is a far more important question to me than whether or not the RFC should be transferred. It should be decided first, and it is properly to be decided by the Congress. It has a direct bearing on the proper location of the organization within the governmental structure. Obviously, it would be foolish to decide upon the location of an organization before it is decided what that organization should do.

In addition to the recommendations I have mentioned, the Hoover Commission in recommendation No. 3 of its report on the Treasury Department said:

> We recommend * * * that the supervision of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation * * * be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury.

As pointed out by the Citizens Committee on the Hoover Report, in its testimony before the House Expenditures Committee—

> The placing of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the Treasury Department fits into a definite pattern of the Hoover Commission for supervision and coordination of lending and guaranteeing agencies of the Government. This program would be under a National Monetary and Credit Council, headed by the Secretary of the Treasury and including representatives of the Federal Reserve Board, the Housing and Home Finance Agency, the Farm Credit Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and other related agencies.
> In recommending the creation of such a Council in its report on the Treasury Department, the Hoover Commission called attention to inconsistencies and overlapping in credit policies. It proposed that lending agencies other than in the farm-credit and housing-credit fields be placed in the Treasury Department as the department entrusted with the maintenance of the financial integrity of the Government. Thus, under this program, the Treasury Department would be in a position to assure a coordination of credit policies as to domestic business under the RFC and as to foreign business under the Export-Import Bank; also proposed to be shifted to its jurisdiction, and to bring farm and housing credit policies into accord through the National Monetary and Credit Council.

Mr. President, with further reference to the Hoover Commission, I have before me a letter which was addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Government Departments by the former chairman of the RFC, and one of its principal creators, Mr. Eugene Meyer. I should like to have all the letter printed at this point in the RECORD, but at this time I wish to read a portion of it. The letter is dated June 23:

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since I appeared before your Committee on Thursday, June 15, I have discussed the matter of the disposition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with ex-President Hoover, Chairman of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.

He informs me that in the discussions within the Commission his personal recommendation was for discontinuance of new business and for transfer of the Corporation to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The majority of the members of the Commission favored transfer to the Treasury.

Mr. Hoover called my attention especially to the point made in the Task Report, which I quote:

"Except as the temporary response to an emergency, we think, the Federal Government should abandon the concept that direct lending to individuals and business concerns is a Government function."

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the entire letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WASHINGTON POST,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1950.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Committee on Expenditures, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since I appeared before your committee on Thursday, June 15, I have discussed the matter of the disposition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with ex-President Hoover, Chairman of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.

He informs me that in the discussions within the Commission his personal recommendation was for discontinuance of new business and for transfer of the Corporation to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The majority of the members of the Commission favored transfer to the Treasury.

Mr. Hoover called my attention especially to the point made in the Task Report, which I quote:

"Except as the temporary response to an emergency, we think, the Federal Government should abandon the concept that direct lending to individuals and business concerns is a Government function."

On August 12, 1949, I testified before a Senate subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which Senator FULBRIGHT was chairman. I opposed the extension of resources and expansion of powers and liberalization of terms proposed in legislation then under consideration. I recommended the discontinuance of the activities then being conducted.

As I stated before your Committee, the proposal to transfer the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce is unnecessary and inadvisable. If it is to be consolidated with the operation of one of the permanently existing institutions, I consider the view of ex-President Hoover that the Corporation should be transferred to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System an excellent one.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE MEYER.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Obviously, therefore, Mr. President, this reorganization plan is directly in conflict with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, and judging by the letter from which I have just read, is directly in conflict with the personal views of Mr. Hoover. It is contrary to the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, first, because it would place the RFC in the Commerce Department, rather than in the Treasury Department. It is also contrary to the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, in that it would make the transfer effective before the Congress can effectively comply with the prior recommendation that Congress review the RFC and that the Congress place restrictions on direct loans.

Despite the passage of the Reorganization Act of 1949, the Congress has not abrogated its powers to legislate with respect to the organization of the Government. It has merely delegated some of these powers to the President under the Reorganization Act, retaining its own broad powers.

It should therefore be remembered that a transfer of the RFC to a department or to another agency can be accomplished by legislation as well as by a reorganization plan. There is, in my opinion, need for legislation with respect to the RFC; and I believe that the subcommittee of which I am chairman will recommend such legislation.

The President has also recommended legislation affecting the RFC, in his special message on credit requirements of small business, transmitted to the Congress on May 5. Under the terms of legislation introduced in response to the President's message (S. 3625), the powers of the RFC would be expanded. This proposed legislation will be considered, and as a matter of fact, hearings have already been started by the Banking and Currency Committee. If this proposed legislation is to be enacted, there is no reason why a transfer of the RFC cannot be provided in it.

In other words, the future role of the RFC is in doubt—whether it is to be expanded or restricted. The place of the RFC in the organizational structure of the Government can and should be determined when its role in the national economy is determined.

The proposal to transfer the RFC to the Department of Commerce is a part and parcel of the President's program for business credit. Whether or not that program is to be enacted, should be and is a question before the Congress. The location of the RFC is and should remain a question before the Congress.

This reorganization plan would preclude to a great extent the work of the subcommittee on the RFC. We have been examining the RFC from the standpoint of its operations as an independent agency. This is an entirely different question from its operation as a subservient office or instrumentality of an executive department of the Government.

The RFC is not, of course, a regulatory agency or a quasi-judicial or a quasi-legislative body. It is, however, an organization of great power to dispense public funds. Its legislative charter, Public Law 548 of the Eightieth Congress, gives to the Board of Directors extremely broad, if not absolute, discretion to make any loan it wishes to make within its over-all monetary authorization.

As a practical matter, the limitations upon the powers of the RFC are just about what the Board of Directors wish to make them.

Under the terms of the act, the Board is required to find that financial assistance to the borrower is not otherwise available on reasonable terms. The question of availability, of course, is determined by the Board itself, there being no legislative standards. In practice, this determination has been most perfunctory, in many cases amounting to a notation in the record, such as that a particular bank refused to make the loan. There is no requirement, nor is any effort made by the RFC, to ascertain whether or not stock could have been sold, or whether or not equity capital could have been raised. That particular limitation in the act is almost meaningless because of the way it has been and can be administered.

Likewise, under the act, the financial assistance must be on "reasonable terms," as determined by the RFC. There is no further definition and there is no review of such a determination. If it is felt that a borrower could not find money at 4 percent in a highly speculative venture, RFC can determine that the money is not available on "reasonable terms," although the market value on loans of that character might be 6 percent.

A loan is required to be "of such sound value or so secure as reasonably to reassure retirement or repayment." This question again is one entirely for the RFC's determination, and there is no review of the determination.

The RFC now has a total loan authorization of $3,880,000,000. Of this amount, $2,750,000,000 is allocated by statute or by legislative history to the purchase of mortgages by the Federal National Mortgage Association. The remainder is allocated as follows:

For business loans, $825,000,000.
Public agency loans, $200,000,000.
Catastrophe loans, $40,000,000.
Prefabricated housing loans, $50,000,000.
Insurance company loans, $15,000,000.

These authorizations are in the nature of revolving funds. As collections are made, they are subject to further loans. In other words, the authorization is for the continuing use of that much money without further authorization or appropriation by the Congress.

Mr. President, although I think that Reorganization Plan No. 24 is untimely, my opposition to it is based on more fundamental grounds.

Despite the inclination to call the RFC an "executive agency," it is in reality an independent agency. It has certain responsibilities to the executive branch, of course, in that it makes reports to the President, and in that its Board of Directors is appointed by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

It also has responsibilities to the Congress. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a corporation. It is not an agency, bureau, or an administration. It is a corporation operating under a charter devised by the Congress. It reports to the Congress and its obligation to comply with the terms of its charter are to the Congress.

The Corporation cannot be said to be an executive agency in any sense other than that it is not legislative nor judicial. If every organization of the Government must be arbitrarily placed in one of the three classifications—legislative, judicial, or executive—then and then only will the RFC be considered an executive agency and then only in the sense that it executes laws passed by the Congress.

As a matter of fact, the primary consideration for the creation of a corporation as distinguished from a bureau or an administration or agency is to achieve that independence of both Congress and the President which only a corporation may have. An independent corporation is relieved of the obligation of coming to Congress for appropriations and it is relieved of the obligation of justifying its expenditures to the Comptroller General before the money is expended. The only appropriations, I may say, which the Congress makes are purely for administrative expenditures—that is, the pay roll. But in the case of the RFC we do not make appropriations of the money which is used in its principal business, which is the making of loans.

It is inconsistent with the character of the activities for which the RFC is responsible, to place its Board of Directors under the supervision of the head of any department in the executive branch of the Government. Under the RFC Act at the present time and under every act which has governed the RFC since its existence, the management of the Corporation has been vested in its Board of Directors whose members have been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. It has never been the intent of Congress that the management be vested in the head of one of the executive departments.

It is true that for a time—as a matter of fact, for exactly 3 years—the RFC Board of Directors functioned under the Secretary of Commerce. For the record, I may say that on February 24, 1942, Executive Order 9070 transferred the Federal Loan Agency to the Department of Commerce. Then on February 24, 1945, exactly 3 years later (59 Stat. 5), the RFC was restored to independent status. But the circumstances inspiring that transfer were unique. The Secretary of Commerce during that period was Mr. Jesse H. Jones, who had been the Chairman of the Board of RFC, and who, at that time of his appointment to the position of Secretary of Commerce, was serving as Federal Loan Administrator. The Executive order which placed the RFC under the Secretary of Commerce reflected simply the intent of Congress that Jesse Jones should continue to be the general manager of the RFC, notwithstanding his accepting also the added responsibilities of the Commerce Department.

Jesse Jones had become the symbol of the RFC's autonomy and political independence. Continuing him in office as Federal Loan Administrator, despite his appointment as Secretary of Commerce, was tantamount to a reaffirmation of the Congress's intent that the RFC should be an independent agency.

But when Mr. Jesse Jones left the office of Secretary of Commerce, the lending agency was, as I have noted, recreated an independent agency in law as well as in fact because Jesse Jones would no longer be its head.

I think it is fair to say it has never been the intent of Congress at any time since the creation of RFC in 1932 that it be other than an independent agency.

The report of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee (Rept. No. 974, 80th Cong.) on the act under which RFC now operates, had this to say with respect to the independence of the Board, reading from page 13:

> It is the opinion of this committee that, in those fields in which RFC has the responsibility for its actions, it should be allowed to exercise its discretion free from interference by other governmental agencies and departments and, for that matter, free from all influence whether from officials in the Government or from Members of Congress. Only under those circumstances can RFC be expected to do its job properly and with full accountability. Attempts to influence the business judgments of RFC by the use of political influence, even though well intended, are a constant menace to sound administration.

These are the words of the committee report—not my words.

> While the general policies of the RFC, like those of other Government agencies, should be reviewed and coordinated by the President, this general review should not extend to particular loans. The business decisions of RFC should be the independent judgments of its Board of Directors.

While I said those words were not mine but the words of the committee, I did not mean in any sense to dissociate myself from them. I endorse them completely, and I think the statement is an excellent one of what should be the proper function and conduct of this agency.

There are two rather technical, but nonetheless significant, points dealing with the financing of the RFC, which I think the Senate should understand.

In the first place, RFC has always been financed with public debt money, through the sale of its obligations to the Treasury. In other words, the RFC, needing money, simply issues its notes to the Treasury, and draws down the funds. The obligations of the RFC, held by the Treasury, have been regarded as assets of the Treasury. In the Treasury's financial statements, RFC obligations have always appeared as though they had the same significance as any other unexpended funds belonging to the Government.

The terms of RFC's financing have always been such as to leave with the Congress and with the people of the United States, generally, the impression that the funds being used by it and by its borrowers were employed on such a basis as would leave them intact, so that they might later be appropriated by the Congress for expenditure in the conduct of the Government's ordinary affairs.

Congress has not yet forfeited its fundamental right to control the unexpended, unappropriated public money in the custody of the Treasury Department.

Congress has, however, delegated to an independent organization—which the RFC now is—the right to draw upon funds for its use without appropriations. In that connection, I think it appropriate to insert at this point recommendation No. 2, page 12, contained in the audit report to the Congress, by the Comptroller General, dated February 10, 1950, in which Mr. Warren makes the very pertinent recommendation that these funds should be appropriated as a revolving fund. I need not read it now. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, Recommendation No. 2 was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECOMMENDATION NO. 2, PAGE 12, AUDIT REPORT TO THE CONGRESS BY THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL, DATED FEBRUARY 10, 1950

2. The United States Treasury is authorized to supply financing to the Corporation from the proceeds of public-debt transactions. The withdrawal of funds from the Treasury in this manner does not require, and may in fact be utilized to avoid,[1] the appropriation procedures by which the Congress ordinarily makes funds available to Government agencies. We believe that in the interest of financial control by the Congress and simplification of financing methods in the Government, RFC (as well as other wholly owned Government corporations) should be financed solely from revolving funds appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. This reorganization plan would have the effect of delegating from the Congress to the executive branch the control of an important segment of the unappropriated funds of the Government. It is, therefore, to a limited but important degree, an abrogation of the Congress' fundamental constitutional power and duty to control the purse strings of the Government.

Another important technical aspect of this problem is the RFC's use of Government funds without the payment of interest.

Theoretically the RFC has been a self-sustaining Government enterprise. Under its present law, it is still in form a self-sustaining enterprise.

Actually it is not. The RFC has interest-free use of $350,000,000 of Government capital upon which the Treasury itself pays interest.

The Banking and Currency Committee has on two occasions during this session amended the basic acts of Government corporations to require the payment of interest on Government-supplied capital. I may say that the present occupant of the chair, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], was very instrumental in having this change brought about in those two instances, which were in connection with legislation on the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. The Comptroller General of the United States has recommended that the same principle be applied to the RFC, as I have just noted in the recommendation which I inserted in the RECORD.

Once before, on June 11, 1947, the Comptroller General made this further observation about the distinction between capital stock and borrowed money:

> The distinction between the capital stock of the Corporation and its capital borrowed from the Treasury be discontinued, since this distinction has ceased to have genuine significance. The full amount should bear interest at the rate at which the Treasury has borrowed the funds in order that the accounts of the Corporation may reflect the full cost to the Government of activities conducted by the Corporation.

This circumstance, that the Corporation has the interest-free use of $350,000,000 of Government money, was sufficient to transform a reported profit of $5,226,000 into a loss of $6,448,000, for the fiscal year 1949.

I desire to make it clear that since the beginning of RFC, and particularly during the 1930's and in the early 1940's, when it was relying upon assets which had been acquired, the fund showed a profit over all, but in the current operations that is not the case.

Thus, the effect of this reorganization plan is not only to give an executive department of the Government authority to use public money without appropriation, but it is also to grant that power, without requiring the payment of interest, on a portion of those funds.

The net effect of these two considerations is that an executive department could and would loan money and suffer losses of public money without the requirement of an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. President, may I ask how much time I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has 30 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Assuming the approval of Reorganization Plans 22 and 23, by this plan we would, in effect, give to the continuing use of an executive department, not less than $1,080,000,000, almost one-third of which would be interest-free.

Assuming a cost-of-money charge of 2 percent, we give to the executive authority to expend annually, and finally, $7,000,000, 2 percent of $350,000,000, without appropriation. We would, I believe, violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitutional provision of article I, section 9, clause 7, that:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

I have already indicated the extremely broad powers of the Board of Directors of the RFC with respect to the approval of loans—in other words, the disbursement of public funds.

To illustrate further, compare this process with the processes which Congress itself goes through in the appropriation of funds to be spent by the executive departments.

In the Texmass Petroleum Co. loan, two of the five members of the RFC Board authorized the disbursement of $10,100,000. In the Kaiser-Frazer loan, $44,000,000 of public funds were lent to a private enterprise for private profit. As a practical matter, does not this expose the public funds to temptations which are difficult to resist?

Furthermore, remember that this disbursement is final and conclusive. In the Texmass Petroleum Co. case, despite a very serious doubt as to the legality of the loan, the Comptroller General advised the committee that there was nothing he could do about it, except to advise the Congress at some later date that it may have been disbursed without authority of law.

Although the full committee and the subcommittee expressed their disapproval of the loan in very strong terms, they had no authority to prevent it.

Under the terms of Reorganization Plan No. 24, the RFC would be "subject to the supervision, coordination, and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce."

This language, of course, is broad, general, and vague. However, I think it is clear that, as a practical matter, it gives to the Secretary whatever authority he wishes to exercise. In effect, the Board of Directors would exercise an administrative function only. As I have already pointed out in reading from the report of the Banking and Currency Committee on the basic RFC Act, this is directly in conflict with the view of the committee and of Congress that the RFC should be independent.

Certainly there is no question but that this reorganization plan destroys the independent status of the RFC. That is the intention of the plan.

The question arises: "If this plan goes into effect, who is responsible for the conduct of the Corporation?"

Under the committee's present examination of the RFC, if we find something wrong, we know that the responsibility lies with the Board of Directors. If this plan goes into effect, I do not believe that Congress could determine where responsibility lies. To say the least, it could easily be passed back and forth between the Board of Directors and the Secretary of Commerce. At any rate, it is safe to say that the plan would have the effect of insulating the Board of Directors from the influence of Congress.

Under the accepted principles of our Government, the Secretary of Commerce is a member of the executive family. He looks primarily to the President for policy and for influence. It is customary whenever a cabinet nomination comes up for confirmation by the Senate that the Senate confirms the nomination as a matter of course. We regard cabinet officials, as members of the President's official family and expect them to look to him for guidance. However, we regard the Board of Directors of the RFC as subject to the will of Congress, in the sense that they exercise only those functions and powers which they derive from a congressional charter of incorporation. Under this plan, they exercise only those powers and functions, which I have described as being very broad, but they exercise them "subject to the supervision, coordination, and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce."

The task force report for the Hoover Commission sums up this issue as follows, quoting from page 63 of the task force report on lending agencies:

> Since it is a commercial activity involving the management of considerable economic power, the lending activity never should be placed under the supervision of officials who have the Government's political powers at their disposal. A lending agency, we think, has no place within the organization structure of a regular establishment in the executive branch of the Government. It should be independent to the greatest possible extent consistent with the general organization of our Government into three branches. It should report to the Congress as well as to the President of the United States, and it should be exempted from executive orders issued by the President, while at the same time remaining responsive to the general policies adopted by the Government.

The point has been made that perhaps the Reconstruction Finance Corporation needs supervision; that Secretary Sawyer is a good man and he should be able to restrain the RFC.

I also have a high regard for Secretary Sawyer's ability and integrity. But I think it is unwise to decide an organizational question solely upon the basis of the personalities involved. Secretary Sawyer is not immortal, and no one knows who will be Secretary of Commerce in the future. We do know, however, some who have been Secretary of Commerce in the past; and I think it is entirely logical to assume that we may have similar ones in the future.

This reorganization plan is, fundamentally, a slight, but important, step toward the destruction of our traditional system of checks and balances. It concentrates power in the Executive branch of the Government, at the expense, and in derogation, of the powers of the Congress.

It is perhaps true that a certain amount of confusion will be eliminated. Businessmen will know that whatever they want, they should go to the Secretary of Commerce, for the answer to their problems. To be really efficient, and to avoid all confusion in Government, perhaps there should be no Congress at all. There should be but one all-powerful individual or bureau of Government. Mussolini and Hitler were efficient in that sense, and so is the Politburo today. But they were efficient at the expense of the power of the people to govern themselves, and their efficient government brought disaster to their people.

I believe that some degree of inefficiency is a small price to pay for the division of power, as between the Executive and the legislature, which protects the people of this country from the exercise of arbitrary power by the Government.

I mention that point particularly because that seems to have been the main reliance on the part of the proponents of this plan before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. President, simply by way of background, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point two very brief editorials, one from the Washington Post of this morning, July 6, on this subject, entitled "Kill It," and the other from the Washington Daily News of July 5 entitled "Reject Plan No. 24."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of July 6, 1950]

KILL IT

The Senate votes today on a resolution to kill the plan for transferring the RFC, now an independent agency, to the Department of Commerce. Senator FULBRIGHT, who introduced the resolution, has headed a committee investigating the activities of the RFC that has uncovered some very unsavory instances of political favoritism in extension of loans as well as mistakes of judgment in making loans. When the report of this committee and its recommendations are ready for submission, the Senate will be in a much better position to decide what disposition to make of the RFC.

In the opinion of the Washington Post the time has come to abolish the agency or at least put it on an inactive stand-by basis to be revived only if an emergency arises. In any case the proposal to transfer the RFC to the Department of Commerce is most unwise, since it would then be subjected to increased political pressure. If the RFC is not abolished, it should either retain its independent status or else be transferred to the Treasury Department in accordance with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

REJECT PLAN NO. 24

The United States Senate is to vote tomorrow on one of President Truman's Government reorganization plans which deserves to be turned down.

This is the so-called plan No. 24, proposing to move the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) into the Department of Commerce.

Democratic Senator FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, who is leading the fight for rejection of plan No. 24, has good reasons for opposing it:

1. It is contrary to the Hoover Commission's recommendation—that the RFC be placed under the Treasury Department.

2. The RFC should remain in its present semi-independent status until a Senate investigating committee, headed by Senator FULBRIGHT, has reported its conclusions as to what role, if any, this big Government lending agency should play in the future.

3. Moving the RFC into the Commerce Department might subject it to greater pressure for the making of unsound and politically motivated loans.

Mr. Truman presented plan No. 24 as part of his program for aiding small business. As other parts of that program, he wants to broaden the RFC's lending powers, relax its collateral requirements and extend the time for repayment of business loans.

But the revelations of Senator FULBRIGHT'S committee justify no confidence that broader RFC lending authority, under the Commerce Department or elsewhere, would be used wisely or with adequate regard for the safety of the taxpayers' money.

Most recent of these revelations concerns a $975,000 loan to a Reno, Nev., hotel which derives most of its revenue from a gambling casino. Then there was the $37,500,000 Lustron loan, involving tremendous loss to the Government. And there have been numerous other loans which, in the kindest possible light, must be described as examples of bad judgment.

Senator FULBRIGHT asserts correctly that the President's plan for easier, longer term RFC loans to small business is really a proposal for subsidies and—if it is carried out at all—should be frankly recognized as such.

The House approved plan No. 24 last week, but without a roll-call vote and with almost half of its Members absent.

This newspaper believes that the Senate should reject that plan.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I believe that completes my remarks.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

AGREEMENT GIVING SENATOR MUNDT THE FLOOR ON MONDAY FOLLOWING VOTE ON PIKE NOMINATION

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, my reason for asking for 2 minutes to address the Senate is to propound a unanimous consent request, and to explain it so that every Senator may know what I have in mind. Late yesterday afternoon the majority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] undertook to lecture the junior Senator from South Dakota concerning some of the precedents of the Senate. During the interim I have had an opportunity to go into the precedents, and to investigate the background of the activities of the Senate in this connection. I had planned to present the result of my findings on this question today. However, inasmuch as the Senator from Illinois is in his home State, I do not wish to do this in his absence, since I shall refer to him in my remarks. So that Senator LUCAS may be here at the time, and be duly notified in advance, I ask unanimous consent therefore that after the vote on the nomination of Commissioner Pike on Monday next, I be permitted to address the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Reserving the right to object, I understand that the only purpose of the unanimous-consent request is that the Senator from South Dakota may address himself to the precedents of the Senate, and for no other purpose.

Mr. MUNDT. And to have the Senator from Illinois present when I devote myself to commenting on his observations of late yesterday afternoon.

Mr. MYERS. If that is the only purpose of the Senator from South Dakota, of course I have no objection. If his purpose were to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of any proposed legislation, I would object.

Mr. MUNDT. There is no purpose to make any motions, I assure the Senator. My only purpose is to schedule my remarks so that the Senator from Illinois can be here when I address myself to the question of the precedents of the Senate with regard to the rights of a minority Senator to propose actions to be considered by the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. With that understanding, Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent request is granted.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 24 OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 290) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950, providing for the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the senior Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I desire to speak for a short time in favor of Senate Resolution No. 290, submitted by my distinguished colleague the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], which expresses disapproval of Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950.

My reasons for opposing the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce are primarily a matter of principle, but, even if I had had no personal convictions in the matter, the hearings on the plan, all of which I attended, would have been thoroughly convincing that the transfer is exactly the sort of thing which should not be permitted to occur.

In the first place, this plan has been submitted to the Congress under the Reorganization Act of 1949, which itself was enacted so as to permit the prompt reaping of benefits from the work of the Hoover Commission. Yet, the plan is in direct violation of the majority recommendation which the Hoover Commission made with respect to RFC. As a matter of fact, the divergence of opinion within the Hoover Commission on this particular subject is amazing. For example, it is a matter of record that former President Hoover himself, Chairman of the Commission, favored transfer of RFC to the Federal Reserve System. A minority of the Commission, consisting of Commissioners Aiken, Pollock, and Rowe, wished to see RFC placed within the Commerce Department. Obviously on a compromise basis, the Commission finally arrived at a majority recommendation for transfer of RFC to the Treasury Department. This plan then, while conforming to the views of a three-man minority, conflicts with the majority recommendation which is itself a compromise recommendation.

This profusion of ideas as to the proper destination of RFC was reflected in the hearings held on June 14 and 15 by the Senate Expenditures Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. We heard testimony from a total of nine witnesses, of whom seven opposed the plan and only two supported it. The views of the plan's opponents naturally varied in accordance with their particular interests in the case, but there was one point of remarkably general agreement, and that is the deep-rooted fear that the merging of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with the Department of Commerce would expose the Corporation to irresistible partisan political influence. This point of view was exemplified in the testimony of Mr. Eugene Meyer, a former Chairman of RFC and the author of the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. Mr. Meyer emphasized that, in the drafting of that legislation, no consideration whatsoever was given to constituting RFC as anything but an independent organization. So far as the argument that RFC should be within the Commerce Department because of the Corporation's function of making business loans is concerned, Mr. Meyer directed attention to the inconsistency of arguing for such a transfer while still permitting other agencies engaged in similar activity to remain outside the Department of Commerce.

As Mr. Meyer said, if the argument of putting into the Commerce Department every agency that has to do with business in one form or another is followed, Commerce must eventually encompass such other activities as the Federal Reserve Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission, and many other activities, including some in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the Congress has acted with profound wisdom in creating and continuing RFC as an independent agency. The plain fact is that the wide scope of its lending activities, which reach into every phase of the Nation's economy, logically precludes identification of RFC with any one Federal instrumentality. It makes loans, according to its statutory authority, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce and industry. It also assists in the encouragement of small business, the development of certain types of public projects, and in the alleviation of disasters. In view of that latitude of operation, it is impossible to establish any more affinity with the Department of Commerce than with any other particular Federal agency.

Reorganizational aspects aside, it is my conviction that one of the best reasons for voting in support of Senate Resolution 290, and thus against this reorganization plan, is that I am convinced that merging RFC with the Department of Commerce, or with any other executive department, will lead inevitably to the disintegration of the acknowledged or hoped for impartiality which, by and large, has been an outstanding characteristic of the administration of its programs. I am afraid that, regardless of present intentions, such a transfer would ultimately see the reflection of political policies in RFC policies, and the potential effect of RFC on the Nation's economy is too great to take such a risk.

Mr. President, I am fully aware that those RFC policies just referred to have not always been good or sound policies. In fact, it seems to me that one of the favorite subjects of the press these days is criticism of RFC policies. I may say that criticism is not without justification. Such incidents as the Lustron and Texmass loans and others are painfully well known to everybody. It may be that one of the thoughts behind Reorganization Plan No. 24 is the submerging of RFC in the bureaucracy of an executive department, thereby not only removing it from the present undesirable limelight, but also at the same time providing it with a shelter from future unwelcome scrutiny. I do not know about that, but it has occurred to me that just such a thing may be a factor in the submission of this plan. I think so because it seems a little too obvious that this proposed strategy of consolidating RFC with the Commerce Department is for the primary purpose of aiding and abetting a program of more and more assistance to many businesses and more and more loans of all kinds on an easier and easier basis. Surely, any broader lending program must lead to more instances of the Lustron variety, and it is certainly conceivable that the more remote from close observation the lending agency would be, the happier would be the policy makers.

I think it is most important in this respect that we not forget that there is sound reason to believe that some of the worst instances of apparent bad judgment of the RFC Board of Directors have been the direct result of political pressure brought by the administration in power. It is not hard to conceive that such pressure will be many times increased should the Corporation be made subservient to a Cabinet officer.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I fully endorse the position of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that, if this plan is permitted to take effect, much, if not all, of the work of his subcommittee now investigating RFC will be nullified. I may say at this point that I think the Fulbright subcommittee has done a magnificent job. I know that many things have been brought out that will reflect a situation which needs on the part of this Congress or future Congresses prompt corrective measures. I say most emphatically that I believe time and effort should be directed to establishing some of the corrective features which Congress will have before it when the committee finally makes its report.

In addition to being fundamentally unsound, Reorganization Plan No. 24 is about as untimely as it could possibly be. That untimeliness is simply another factor adding to the conflicting views regarding RFC. Incidentally, Mr. President, reverting for a moment to those conflicting views, Mr. Jesse Jones, one of the former Chairmen of the Corporation, has recommended, as we all know, the outright abolition of RFC, with the suggestion, as I recall it, that the Corporation be given a decent burial. Not only does this plan disagree completely with the Hoover Commission recommendation in the report on the Treasury Department, but it circumvents the present investigation which is itself being made pursuant to other Hoover Commission recommendations. In its report on Federal business enterprises, the Hoover Commission, in recommendations 8 and 18, recommended that the Congress review the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and prescribed the direction which the investigation should take. Now we have a situation where we are asked to proceed on a corollary recommendation before we can finish acting on the previous ones.

Mr. President, another reason which causes me to oppose Reorganization Plan No. 24 is the fact that the war clouds are becoming darker and darker day by day. During the last war, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was the organization of the Federal Government that provided the first aid. As a result of its broad authority and independent status, RFC was able to proceed immediately toward production and procurement of strategic materials. The role which RFC played in the national defense can scarcely be overemphasized and I fear that the time may soon arrive when we will be thankful that we have such an agency at hand.

If the Senate permits RFC to become a part of the Department of Commerce, or of any other agency, it will be encumbering the ability of the Corporation to act quickly in an emergency. This is in no sense an intimation that there would be less desire to act quickly on the part of a Cabinet officer or any other supervising official, but the fact is that whenever another layer of authority is added, there is more red tape. It is my fervent hope that this reason for retaining RFC as an independent agency may never materialize, but we would be naive indeed were we to overlook such a contingency.

Considering everything, Mr. President, I regret that I can find nothing favorable about this plan. As we all do, I favor intelligent and timely reorganization in the interest of greater efficiency and greater economy. This plan simply does not measure up to that yardstick. I shall vote for Senate Resolution 290, to defeat this plan, and I sincerely hope that my colleagues in the Senate will do likewise.

Mr. MYERS. I yield myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, before I address myself to Senate Resolution 290, I wish to say that I sincerely trust that the vote on the resolution will not be considered an indication of the view of the Senate as to whether or not RFC should be abolished. We have heard here today that some have advanced the theory that it is about time to liquidate the RFC. Regardless of the outcome of the vote about to be taken, I sincerely trust that it will not be interpreted to mean that the Senate believes the RFC should be liquidated, because I know that in my State of Pennsylvania there are many industries, many businesses, which would not be operating today if it were not for loans granted by the RFC. There are many communities in which there would be serious unemployment if it had not been for the loans granted by the RFC. There have been in my State instances of commercial banks having turned down industries, which later went to the RFC, and after the RFC indicated that they would make the loans, then the commercial banks in the localities granted the loans which theretofore they had refused. So I think this agency plays an important part in the economy not only of my State, but in the economy of the entire Nation, and it would be bad indeed if the vote on the pending resolution should be interpreted as indicating that it is the will of the Senate that the RFC should be liquidated.

Mr. President, Reorganization Plan No. 24, in my estimation, is an integral part of the President's small-business program, on which the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is now holding hearings. Transfer of the RFC to the Department of Commerce was recommended by the President in his small-business message to Congress on May 5, 1950. Originally it was intended that this transfer would be accomplished by legislative provisions in the bill to carry out the President's small-business program. However, before the message on small business came to the Capitol, I understand the President consulted with some interested Members of the Senate as to whether they preferred that the transfer be sought by legislation or by a reorganization plan. I understand, too, that they indicated that they perferred the reorganization-plan method, and President Truman followed their advice. I believe it would be a substantial blow to the small-business program if this reorganization plan were not approved.

Mr. President, to my mind the plan would improve the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government.

First. The RFC, whose functions are to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, to encourage small business, to help in maintaining the economic stability of the country, and to assist in promoting maximum employment and production, would be brought under the Cabinet member whose departmental responsibility is broadly to foster, promote, and develop the industry and commerce of the country.

The RFC, one of the three Government corporations still remaining outside the Cabinet structure, would thereby be brought into the Department whose major purposes it shares if Reorganization Plan No. 24 were approved.

Second. Coordination of the RFC within the broader framework of the Department would permit improvements in policy making, programing, and operations.

The RFC Board of Directors would receive supervision, coordination, and policy guidance from the Secretary, who, because of his departmental responsibilities is the most appropriate adviser on the economic and business factors which under its statute the RFC is to take into consideration in forming its general loan policy, and who, because of his Cabinet position, could integrate RFC policy with the general policy of the President.

I may add, Mr. President, that related programs of RFC and other parts of the Department could be coordinated so as to avoid both duplication and neglect in the meeting of business needs. This would be especially important to small business.

Then, Mr. President, although the Secretary would not have authority to transfer budget or staff from RFC to other parts of the Department, staffs having related duties, both in Washington and in the field, could be brought into suitable operating liaison with resulting improvements in service.

That is my first reason why I believe this plan would improve the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government.

Second, the plan would make the RFC a more responsible instrument of public policy. Why do I say that? I say it because the President's constitutional responsibility toward the RFC as an executive agency would be much better implemented. The power of the Congress to legislate, to investigate, and to control through appropriations would not be affected.

Mr. President, we have heard much today about investigation, and, in passing, I must compliment the very able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] for the fine work which he is now doing in thoroughly invesigating the RFC and the loans which it has made. He is focusing public attention on the mistakes of the RFC, as the Senate, and particularly the Senator from Arkansas, as the chairman of the investigating committee, should properly do. So the Senator from Arkansas is deserving of the high praise of the Senate for his splendid performance, the time he is giving to this problem, the knowledge he has of the problem, and the results which I am sure will finally accrue from his inquiry and investigation. Yet, I repeat that the President's constitutional responsibility toward the RFC as an executive agency could be much better implemented by this reorganization plan, and the power of the Congress, the power of the Senator from Arknsas, and the power of his committee, to investigate, to recommend legislation, and to control through appropriations, would in no wise be affected by the reorganization plan, if it should become effective.

The President, who cannot give the RFC the direct attention required for its proper supervision, would be represented by a Cabinet member having qualifications as I have already stated.

The Congress which today must address its criticisms of RFC policy either to the Board, whose members are personally involved in the policies under criticism, or to the President, could turn instead to a Cabinet member, who would be closer to the program than the President, and yet not so close as to lack perspective.

And then, Mr. President, the plan would strengthen the Government's efforts in behalf of small business. I particularly plead for the approval of the plan because of its effect upon small business.

The small-business man, unlike large corporations, which can keep well informed on Government programs, will benefit especially from having a single principal spot in the Government where its needs can be dealt with in appropriate terms.

Because the small-business man may require technical or managerial counsel as much as financial assistance, it is important that when he turns to a Government agency all the services, nonfinancial as well as financial, that are available to him, be linked together so that they may be drawn upon as the circumstances of the individual case may warrant.

In that connection I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement which was made by Mr. W. E. Willett, Director of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, on Reorganization Plan No. 24, before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF W. E. WILLETT, DIRECTOR OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION, ON REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 24 BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to appear before your committee and give my personal views with respect to Reorganization Plan No. 24, which would transfer the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce to be administered by the Board of Directors and officers of the Corporation subject to the supervision, coordination, and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce. I would like to emphasize that the following comments are my personal views and do not necessarily represent the official views of the Corporation or other members of the Board.

I first became associated with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in 1934 and my opinions are based upon experience both as an employee and as a director since 1948. We who have been connected with RFC over a period of years have taken a deep pride in the relatively independent position which the Corporation now enjoys in reporting directly to the Chief Executive. However, I must in all honesty admit that this attitude is predicated upon a narrow, personal point of view. I believe you will find that this personal feeling exists with very nearly, if not all, of RFC personnel. It is only human to desire to have direct access to the Chief Executive. However, I fully recognize that one's individual views must be considered in relationship to the broader problem of attaining the most efficient organization of the Government as a whole. I firmly believe that from an organizational point of view, adoption of the proposed plan would not only be to the best interests of RFC but would inure to the benefit of the President, the Congress, and the Nation as a whole, as it is affected by the functions which the Corporation is authorized to perform.

The executive branch of the Government has grown tremendously both in size and complexity since the RFC was established in 1932. I would like to refer specifically to the fact that the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government pointed to some of the critical problems resulting from this growth. The Commission stated: "Such rapid growth could not take place without causing serious problems. Organizational methods effective 20 years ago are no longer applicable. The growth of skills and methods of private organizations has long since outmoded many of the methods of the Government. This Commission has found that the United States is paying heavily for a lack of order, a lack of clear lines of authority and responsibility and a lack of effective organization in the executive branch." The Commission's first finding was that "the executive branch is not organized into a workable number of major departments and agencies which the President can effectively direct, but is cut up into a large number of agencies, which divide responsibility and which are too great in number for effective direction from the top." To remedy this situation, the Commission proposed that: "The numerous agencies of the executive branch must be grouped into departments as nearly as possible by major purposes in order to give a coherent mission to each department." Reorganization Plan No. 24 is clearly consistent with the objective set up by the Hoover Commission.

In my opinion there can be no question that the major purpose of RFC today is to assist in promoting the development of American business and industry by rendering financial assistance in eligible cases and in keeping with the objectives of the Congress. This purpose is shared by many of the nonfinancial services which are now furnished to business by the Department of Commerce. The transfer of the RFC to the Department of Commerce will be conducive to better teamwork and will ultimately redound to the benefit of both the RFC and the Department.

I consider the following to be some of the more important advantages which the RFC will obtain as a result of the proposed reorganization. As a member of the President's official family the Secretary of Commerce necessarily has far more frequent contacts with the President than do the RFC directors and consequently would have a better opportunity to discuss RFC matters directly with the President. Through the Secretary of Commerce the Corporation will have a voice in the President's Cabinet. He will be able to bring up for Cabinet consideration various important matters of direct interest to the Corporation. The RFC organization does not have such a spokesman today. Furthermore the Directors will have the benefit of the guidance of the Secretary of Commerce as to the relationship of the RFC program to the broader economic objectives of the Government. For example, the Secretary's counsel will be of great value to the Directors in determining how the Corporation can most effectively encourage small business, help in maintaining the economic stability of the country, and assist in promoting maximum employment and production, which are the purposes set forth in the basic statute of the Corporation. There undoubtedly will be instances where the Secretary can from his vantage point bring to the attention of the RFC Board sources of pertinent information within the Department of which they are unaware. The availability of the facilities of the Department of Commerce will greatly strengthen the Corporation's ability to perform the functions assigned to it by the Congress.

The grouping of all of the Government's major services to business in one department will be of substantial benefit to business as a whole and particularly to small business. The average small-business concern is not as fully informed with respect to these services as are larger business enterprises and is often bewildered by the complexity of existing Government organization. The President has clearly stated the problem in his special message relating to small business. The President said, "It is most desirable that we group these functions together under common supervision. This would simplify government administration. More important, it would make it easier for the small-business man to take advantage of the various types of financial assistance already available or newly provided."

In my opinion RFC has done a very good job in helping small business. However, a combination of RFC's experience in making loans to small business and the know-how of Commerce in giving small business information and technical assistance should make a team hard to beat in providing essential assistance to small business.

Plan No. 24, of course, does not in any way alter the Corporation's relationship to the Congress or reduce the latter's authority with respect to the Corporation's policies and program. On the contrary, it will enable the Congress to obtain from a single Federal official as well-rounded picture of the Government's total program as it applies to business.

The plan is not an extreme departure from the organizational set-up under the Federal Loan Agency, created in 1939. The relationship of the Board of Directors to the Secretary of Commerce will be almost identical with that which it had to the Federal Loan Administrator from 1939 to 1947. During the period from 1942 to 1945, the functions of the Federal Loan Administrator were exercised by the Secretary of Commerce. The functions of the Federal Loan Administrator were to "supervise the administration, and * * * be responsible for the coordination of the functions and activities" of a number of agencies including the RFC; whereas the present plan proposes that the Corporation be administered by its Board of Directors subject to the supervision, coordination, and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce. To my mind, the authority to be given to the Secretary of Commerce is very much the same as that which was exercised by the Federal Loan Administrator and subsequently by the Secretary of Commerce. From my experience during the time the Federal Loan Administrator and the Secretary of Commerce exercised supervision over the Corporation, I can state that this arrangement did not result in divided responsibility or confusion as to the respective roles of the Board and the Loan Administrator and the Secretary.

In the fields of housing and agriculture we have already recognized the advantages of grouping both the financial and nonfinancial activities of the Government and I can see no sound reason for maintaining the present gap between such services in the area of business.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to refer briefly to a few of the statements made by Mr. Willett when he appeared before the House committee. He said:

I firmly believe that from an organizational point of view, adoption of the proposed plan would not only be to the best interests of RFC but would inure to the benefit of the President, the Congress, and the Nation as a whole, as it is affected by the functions which the Corporation is authorized to perform.

Then Mr. Willett went on to discuss the Hoover Commission recommendations, and he had this to say:

The Commission's first finding was that "the executive branch is not organized into a workable number of major departments and agencies which the President can effectively direct, but is cut up into a large number of agencies which divide responsibility and which are too great in number for effective direction from the top." To remedy this situation, the Commission proposed that: "The numerous agencies of the executive branch must be grouped into departments as early as possible by major purposes in order to give a coherent mission to each department." Reorganization Plan No. 24—is clearly consistent with the objective set up by the Hoover Commission.

Mr. President, I understand the Hoover Commission recommended that the RFC be transferred to the Treasury Department. I understand that since then there has been some change of heart, some change of view, and that now the Chairman of the Commission believes the RFC had much better be transferred to the Federal Reserve System. Nevertheless, the Hoover Commission did believe that it should not remain as it is, but that it should be transferred to some other agency of Government. I believe that is the import and the impact of Mr. Willett's statement when he indicates that Reorganization Plan No. 24 is clearly consistent with the objectives set forth by the Hoover Commission.

Then Mr. Willett went on to say:

Through the Secretary of Commerce the Corporation will have a voice in the President's Cabinet.

I think it is very important, Mr. President, that the RFC should have a voice in the Cabinet of the President of the United States. Mr. Willett went on to say:

He—

Namely, the Secretary of Commerce—

will be able to bring up for Cabinet consideration various important matters of direct interest to the Corporation.

Mr. Willett went on to make another point when he said:

The grouping of all of the Government's major services to business in one department will be of substantial benefit to business as a whole and—

I emphasize what I stated before—particularly to small business.

In my opinion—

Said Mr. Willett—

RFC has done a very good job in helping small business. However, a combination of RFC's experience in making loans to small business and the "know how" of commerce in giving small business information and technical assistance should make a team hard to beat in providing essential assistance to small business.

Mr. Willett continued:

Plan No. 24, of course, does not in any way alter the Corporation's relationship to the Congress or reduce the latter's authority with respect to the Corporation's policies and program. On the contrary, it will enable the Congress to obtain from a single Federal official a well-rounded picture of the Government's total program as it applies to business.

I think the statement made by Mr. Willett should command the attention of every Member of this body. I only wish all Members of the Senate could have read his statement. I wish it were possible for every Member of the Senate to have an opportunity to read the statement before the vote is taken at 4 o'clock. I know that is impossible. Nevertheless, I wish to say that usually we find members of various departments or agencies of Government whose department or agency is involved in a reorganization plan, buttonholing Senators, coming to Members of Congress and asking that their department, their agency, be not touched, that they be left alone, that they be not affected by a proposed reorganization plan. Here we have a member of the RFC, a member of the Board, who frankly said to the committee of the House of Representatives that the plan is good, that it will make for better government, and that it will improve not only the relationships between the executive and the legislative but will also be of great help and assistance to small business. It is rather unusual to find an employee of the Government, whether he be in a high or a low position, coming to the Congress and making such a recommendation. The contrary is usually true.

I do not believe that the reorganization plan, if put into effect, would in any way interfere with the investigation now being so ably conducted by the Senator from Arkansas. I feel rather sure that that investigation will continue in the same vein that it has been undertaken by the Senator from Arkansas. I feel that if the agency were transferred to the Department of Commerce the investigation, the study, the inquiry being conducted by the Senator would in no wise be affected.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I trust and hope that the Senate will reject Senate Resolution 290, and will allow the reorganization plan to become law.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the Senator has remaining 31 minutes.

Mr. MYERS. How much time does the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has exhausted the time under his control.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas as much time as he may desire.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I now yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, in behalf of myself and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], who is unavoidably absent, I should like to make a brief statement.

Senate Resolution 219, adopted by the Senate February 9, 1950, instructed a subcommittee of which the able junior Senator from New Hampshire and myself are the minority members, in studying the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to give special attention to the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. In substance the Hoover Commission recommendations were two-fold; namely, that the policy of direct lending by the Corporation in a peacetime prosperous period should be reviewed by the Congress and that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be transferred not to the Department of Commerce, but to the Department of the Treasury.

It is to be noted, also, that the Hoover recommendation was that this matter be studied in respect to the RFC's lending in a prosperous, peacetime period.

The subcommittee of which the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is chairman, is giving earnest consideration to those two recommendations, and has developed a great deal of factual information which should serve to enlighten the Congress in its consideration of these recommendations. However, the study by the subcommittee to date has convinced us that the subject is of such complexity and importance that a thorough exploration will require longer than was originally anticipated.

Mr. President, I may say that I do not quite understand why the President submitted to the Congress a reorganization recommendation in respect to the RFC, when the subcommittee was in the midst of studying the entire problem with an open mind.

In effect, Reorganization Plan No. 24 proposes to achieve one of the objectives stated by the Hoover Commission, namely, the inclusion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in a department of the Government, while the subcommitte is in the midst of its study of this subject. However, the Hoover Commission recommended that the RFC be transferred to the Treasury Department, I repeat, not to the Commerce Department. The facts and the reasons for and against this proposal and the recommendations of the subcommittee are not yet available to the Congress. Action at this time, therefore, would of necessity be based upon incomplete and inadequate knowledge. The mandate of the Senate to the subcommittee to study and consider the recommendations of the Hoover Commission would prove meaningless after action had already been taken by the Senate on one of the major items which the subcommittee was instructed to explore, namely, whether or not the RFC should be transferred to an executive department.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. By way of argument only, I should like to ask this question: If Reorganization Plan No. 24 is adopted this afternoon, and if at a later date, as a result of the investigation by the Fulbright subcommittee, it is recommended to the Senate that the RFC be retransferred from the Department of Commerce to an independent status, would not the Senate then have to set aside a considerable amount of time for debate, only for the purpose of undoing in the future what we would have done at this time?

Mr. CAPEHART. I think there can be absolutely no question that the Senator is correct.

Accordingly, Mr. President, it would seem to the subcommittee that the presentation of Reorganization Plan No. 24 is premature, and we believe that its consideration should be postponed.

Failure of the subcommittee to complete its study and file its report with the Senate prior to this time is not due to a lack of diligence on the part of the subcommittee. The subcommittee has held 14 public hearings, comprising approximately 1,986 pages of record. In addition, the subcommittee has held 10 executive hearings, comprising approximately 1,061 pages of record. In addition, the subcommittee and its staff have done a great deal of preparatory work on matters which are not yet ready for public hearing.

The subcommittee has filed one report, namely, that on the loan to the Texmass Petroleum Co. The report was unanimously approved by the subcommittee and by the full Senate Banking and Currency Committee, and was submitted to the Senate on May 19, 1950.

The subcommittee has proceeded upon the basis that a study of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is more meaningful when decisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are examined in the case of specific loans. In other words, in the view of the subcommittee, the lending standards set forth in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act are extremely broad and general, and they acquire significance only when they are applied to specific factual situations.

The subcommittee believes firmly in the principle that there should be thorough preparation by the staff of the subcommittee before public hearings are held or reports are filed. In appropriate instances, especially where there is a possibility of reflecting adversely upon individuals, the subcommittee gives preliminary consideration to the subject in executive hearings. The subcommittee believes through this method its public hearings and its reports can be made sounder and more useful to the Senate.

We believe that the Senate desires the subcommittee to do a thorough job, not a superficial one; and we are convinced from our study up to this point that the question of national policy with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation involves basic economic and governmental considerations, and should, therefore, be given the most thoughtful attention by the Congress.

Transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce at this time would, therefore, in our opinion be unwise, since it would constitute a permament and far-reaching disposition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation before all the facts are in the record and before the agency of the Senate expressly directed to consider this problem has been able to formulate its recommendations.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the issue before the Senate this afternoon is one upon which men of good will and probity may well differ. I recognize the force of the contention that in the interest of more coherent administration, it probably is desirable to reduce the number of independent agencies and to put at least some of them under the direction of the established departments.

It was because of this feeling and because of my desire to make the administrative lines of authority more direct that I have hitherto favored all the reorganization plans which have been submitted to this body.

I regret that I am unable to do so in the present case. It has been my lot to serve on a subcommittee which has been investigating the affairs of the RFC, under the chairmanship of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who has conducted the inquiry with thoroughness, integrity, and with scrupulous fair play.

Although it is too early to make final and definitive judgments, we have taken sufficient evidence to convince me that there have been grave abuses in the affairs of the RFC, in the loaning of Government money to private interests. I have only to mention the Texmass loan, of approximately $10,100,000; the Mapes loan, of almost $1,000,000; the Ribonwriter loan, which in my judgment should never have been made; and the Lustron loan. In the case of the Lustron loan, to state the matter mildly, the RFC did not effectively prevent a wasteful dissipation of funds which had been publicly derived. Furthermore, the RFC officials, I am convinced, have exhibited an excessive degree of callousness in permitting their officials who have passed on applications for loans, later to accept well-paid positions in the employ of the very companies to which the loans have been made, and have permitted that practice to continue.

Mr. President, I do not wish to make charges against the character of the men who have been in charge of the RFC's activities. That is a grave matter, in respect to which we would do well to observe a proper degree of restraint. Perhaps some abuses are inevitable in connection with these types of loans. Various businessmen, who are unable for one reason or another to obtain loans from banks, are naturally desirous of obtaining loans from the RFC. Sometimes banks want to be bailed out from bad loans which they have made, and seek to unload them upon the RFC. These gentlemen make their applications to the local RFC agency; and if the amount of the application is large or if they have been turned down by the local agency, they then come to Washington. They are, naturally, anxious to have the loans made. They consult their Senators and their Representatives in Congress, and they ask us to use our influence before the RFC. That puts us in a very difficult position, because, on the one hand, we wish to be of service to our constituents; and, on the other hand, we wish to conserve the public funds and to protect them from being improperly invested.

If we are wise, we confine ourselves to introducing the applicants to the RFC and giving to the RFC a letter stating the facts, but making it clear that the RFC is to use its own discretion and its own judgment in deciding the question as to whether or not the loan should be made. If we are incautious, perhaps we go somewhat further. However, I am sure that upon reflection the Members of the Senate will feel that this is not a proper course for them to follow.

However, the businessmen also approach, and, I am afraid, are approached by, men in Washington who represent themselves as having influence with the RFC—lawyers or expediters, as they are called. These are men who are, as they say, able to influence the making of the loan. Sometimes businessmen seek the expediters, and sometimes the expediters seek the businessmen. But whoever is the pursuer and whoever is the pursued, the two come together after a time. The expediters are paid fees. They are paid fees by the companies which receive the loans. These fees, of course, are derived from the loans which the Government has made and hence they are paid from public moneys. There has grown up around the RFC, I am afraid, this trafficking in political influence, both official and unofficial. I recognize, of course, the difficult position in which the members of the RFC Board and staff are placed. I do not wish to condemn them. I am afraid that it is almost inevitable in a public enterprise of this type. I do not want to say that all Government loans to private business should be discontinued. I think small business suffers real disadvantages in getting credit, and I believe that, in certain lines of industry, investment bankers do not want to finance new firms and permit them to come into the industries. There is a real need to break some of the blockade in banking which now exists. But Government participation in these loans is attended with grave moral and financial risks, and I think the Fulbright subcommittee is beginning to disclose certain of these dangers.

Mr. President, I know it will be contended that if we transfer RFC to the Department of Commerce some of these abuses will be remedied. It is possible that they might be. But what the RFC needs is not so much a transfer of administrative lines of authority as a thorough house cleaning. That is what is needed. What I am afraid would happen if we transferred it to the Department of Commerce is that people would say that the job was done, that the reorganization had been effected, that the eyes of the Secretary of Commerce would be over the affairs of RFC, and that such abuses as exist would be cleaned up. The disease is, however, far more deeply rooted than that. I am afraid, therefore, that this transfer would postpone, if not prevent, the thoroughgoing clean-up which is needed. It would in addition, as several Senators have said, interpose a protective screen between the RFC and the Congress—the screen of a department which would stand between the Corporation and the legislative body and help to protect it from scrutiny.

For all these reasons, therefore, I shall support the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Arkansas and, for the first time, I shall oppose one of the reorganization plans which have been submitted.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to my colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas, chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement regarding this plan and the pending resolution. As in the case of all reorganization plans, this plan was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. It will be noted that the committee reported the plan without recommendation. I felt that the Senate was entitled to know the exact action taken by the committee, and why the committee did not report either favorably or unfavorably on the plan, at the conclusion of the hearings, and when we were able to have an executive session.

As the Presiding Officer knows, and as other Members of this body know, nowadays we experience some difficulty in getting a quorum in order to report bills. On the occasion on which we held the executive session, immediately following the conclusion of hearings, there were present but a bare quorum of seven Members. Two of the Members present expressed the view that they had not yet made up their minds with reference to the plan. One of those present favored the plan. The other four opposed it. But the four who opposed the plan and favored the resolution did not constitute a majority of the committee, and therefore we felt it advisable at that time to report the plan and resolution without recommendation.

At the same time, the committee instructed the chairman to poll the committee and to announce on the floor of the Senate how the committee would vote on it. By that direction, I have had the staff director of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments poll the committee with reference to this plan. I am advised by him that nine members of the committee favor the resolution and oppose the plan, one member favors the plan, and the other members have made no expression with reference to their positions. Therefore, a majority of about three-fourths of the committe definitely oppose this plan.

Mr. President, I oppose the plan, and I should like to explain briefly why I do so. In the first place, I believe that this lending agency of the Government should be kept independent. I do not believe it should be buried in any department of the Government. The functions of the RFC involve millions of dollars. It involves policies with reference to making loans and with reference to carrying out the functions and purposes of the RFC Act and amendments thereto.

Reorganization Plan No. 24 does not clarify anything. It does not give a line of direct authority, so that it is possible to identify that authority and follow through on it. I call attention to the wording of the plan, which says:

> The Reconstruction Finance Corporation * * * is hereby transferred to the Department of Commerce—

And, Mr. President, listen to this—> and shall be administered, subject to the supervision, coordination, and policy guidance of the Secretary of Commerce, by the Board of Directors and officers of the Corporation.

When witnesses appeared in favor of this plan, including the Secretary of Commerce and representatives of the Bureau of the Budget, I tried to get them to define what this provision means. What is meant by "policy guidance"? What is mean by "supervision"? Where does the power of the Secretary begin? Where does it end? Where would the responsibility of the Board attach, and where would it stop?

The RFC is presently under investigation by an appropriate subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. I compliment my colleague, the able junior Senator from Arkansas, as chairman of that subcommittee, and also the other members of the subcommittee for the very excellent job they appear to be doing, the conscientious job of investigating present policies and practices of the RFC.

I think I can say, without having full knowledge of what has been developed thus far, that very definitely the subcommittee has found and has revealed through its investigation that certain practices and policies are being pursued which need to be corrected. But, Mr. President, we now know whom to hold responsible for whatever is wrong in the RFC. We can identify them, put our fingers on them, call them up on the carpet before the approving committee, as is being done, and inquire into their activities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, may I have one additional minute?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield one additional minute to the Senator.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, if this plan should go into effect, we would transfer this agency behind the protective shield of a departmental secretary, and the efforts and work of the subcommittee would be lost. We would also transfer it into a state of confusion, of divided authority. Such a transfer under this plan would be confounding the difficulties which exist today, rather than clarifying or simplifying them.

Mr. President, I believe the plan should be defeated.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present. The quorum call discloses the presence of 79 Senators.

The question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 290.

Mr. MORSE and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. [Putting the question.]

A majority of the authorized membership of the Senate having voted in the affirmative, the resolution is agreed to.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 22

In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into earlier today, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 299), which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. 22 transmitted to Congress by the President on May 9, 1950.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into, 1 hour of debate is available, if desired, with the time to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents, and to be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I may not be able to finish my remarks in the 10 minutes available to me, I ask unanimous consent, if I do not complete my remarks, that all my remarks appear together when I obtain the floor later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not address myself to the resolution before the Senate. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] has 10 additional minutes available to him which he kindly allotted to me to discuss a matter of a great deal of importance.

(Mr. McCARTHY proceeded to address the Senate on the question of the necessity for the protection of the Government against Communists and subversive groups.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I shall continue later.

(Subsequently Mr. McCARTHY resumed and concluded his speech, which appears entire elsewhere in today's RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, Reorganization Plan No. 22, which was submitted by the President to the Congress on May 9, 1950, has for its purpose the transfer of the Federal National Mortgage Association from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Senate Resolution 299, submitted by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the junior Senator from Washington, is in opposition to Reorganization Plan No. 22, and was offered because of the following views, shared jointly by the Senators from Georgia and Washington and other Senators.

DISSIMILARITY OF PURPOSE

One of the principal purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1949 was to provide for the grouping, coordination, and consolidation of agencies and functions according to major purposes. The President's message to the Congress dated May 9, 1950, states that one of the purposes of plan No. 22 is to assure the necessary coordination of FNMA's operations with other housing programs.

Mr. President, there is little relation between FNMA's activities providing for a secondary market for Government-guaranteed or insured home-loan mortgages, and the administration of the Government's housing program. FNMA is essentially a credit and banking activity and not a housing activity.

Mr. President, the fact that the functions of several agencies of the Government have relation one to the other does not mean that they all serve the same major purpose. Thus the fact that FNMA buys mortgages insured by FHA has little or no bearing on the functions performed by each. Were this fact any criterion, FNMA should more properly be placed under the jurisdiction of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, since in recent months at least 90 percent of the new mortgage loans being acquired by FNMA are home loans guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration.

If Reorganization Plan No. 22, which is the pending business, would result in either substantial economies or greater efficiencies, in my opinion the plan ought to be approved by the Senate this afternoon, but plan No. 22, if adopted, will never improve efficiency or achieve any economies.

Permit me to draw attention to a fact which all of us all too often forget. Section 2 (c) of the Reorganization Act of 1945 requires that in any consolidation of existing agencies, there shall be accomplished an over-all reduction of at least 25 percent in the administrative costs of the agency or agencies involved. No single witness appearing before the committee in opposition to Senate Resolution 299, or in favor of Reorganization Plan No. 22, was able, in reply to the specific question addressed to every witness by the committee chairman, the senior Senator from Arkansas, to establish any economy that would result in the proposed transfer. This point is further established by language found in the committee report which accompanies Senate Resolution 299. I should like to read but a portion of one paragraph, to be found on page 5:

> There is admittedly no prospect of more economy in operation nor of any appreciable increase in efficiency. On the contrary, because of the fact that the plan excludes from the transfer the present officers and directors of FNMA, it would involve the possible risk that both more cost and less efficiency might result should the transfer be effected.

I submit that the present HHFA, itself a creation of a reorganization plan back in 1947, never has complied with the intended purpose of the Reorganization Act of 1945. As a matter of fact, the 1951 budget calls for administrative expenses 400 percent greater than in 1947. The figures are: 1947, $1,518,000; 1951, requested in fiscal budget 1951, $6,000,000. The latter figure is only for the office of the Administrator.

Can we conceivably transfer FNMA to an agency which on the record is budgeted to cost 400 percent more now to operate than it did in 1947? This budgeted increase in HHFA's administrative costs did not contemplate the transfer of FNMA. The $6,000,000 item would have to be increased if FNMA were transferred to HHFA.

In contrast, let us look budgetwise at the RFC. Employees of RFC, in addition to their present duties, are handling FNMA operations without appreciable increase in personnel. This is reflected in the fact that RFC's administrative budget request for 1951, including its existing program covering tin, rubber, war liquidation, and all of its business lending activities in addition to FNMA, shows but a slight increase over 1949 actual expenditures; 1949 expenditures were $26,774,770; estimated for 1951 is $27,690,000.

Transfer of FNMA would place control of the secondary mortgage market under HHFA, and would seriously impair the veterans' home-construction program.

Mr. President, I believe that sentence in itself will be of real interest to every Member of this body, for the Senator from Washington, together with the Senator from Georgia, is merely saying in the sentence that if we transfer "Fannie May" from where it presently is, in the RFC, to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, we run an unnecessary risk of holding in jeopardy the veterans' housing program, which all of us have tried to do so much to accelerate in recent years.

It is a known fact, established by the figures, that the number of FHA mortgages being handled by "Fannie May" are diminishing at a rapid rate. On the other hand, the number and amount of Veterans' Administration guaranteed mortgages being handled by "Fannie May" have been and are daily increasing by leaps and bounds. It would therefore be extremely unwise, I think, for the policy of the Veterans' Administration relative to the present magnificent home-construction program to be dominated in the future by the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. In view of the apparent injury the proposed transfer would do with respect to the cost of veterans' housing, I wonder whether the Senator from Washington is able to tell us the attitude of any of the veterans' organizations toward the reorganization plan.

Mr. CAIN. The question is an extremely pertinent and legitimate one, and the answer will be given to it in a moment.

Mr. President, during the 11-month period from July 1949 through May 1950, FNMA made commitments to purchase FHA-insured mortgages to the number of 17,798, and in the amount of $253,604,000. In that same period, FNMA made commitments to purchase 201,192 VA-guaranteed mortgages in the amount of $1,522,842,000. Here we have a dollar ratio, VA to FHA, of 6 to 1. During the same 11-month period, we find that FNMA actually purchased $126,895,000 worth of FHA mortgages and $729,314,000 of VA mortgages, again a ratio, VA to FHA, of 6 to 1. In May 1950 FNMA held, in its portfolio, FHA mortgages totaling $266,865,000, and at the end of the same month held VA mortgages of $774,792,000. Here again we find that the predominant activity of FNMA is in the field of VA mortgages.

These figures, I may say in answer to the question recently submitted by the Senator from South Dakota, vividly portray the compelling reason why four of the veterans' organizations, namely, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, AMVETS, American Legion, and the Disabled American Veterans testified in sturdy opposition to Reorganization Plan No. 22.

The latest release from the Department of Commerce covering new construction activity, dated July 2, 1950, states that—

> Indications are that close to 1,250,000 new dwellings will be placed under construction in 1950, surpassing by far the 1949 record of 1,026,000 and the previous high of 937,000 units in 1925.

This new all-time housing-construction record is evidence of the present smooth operation within the mortgage market. Transfer of FNMA to HHFA, in the opinion of most competent observers in the construction industry, would bring about a decrease in volume and general disruption of the present veterans' housing program.

Mr. President, in conclusion, by way of summary, I should like to state only the obvious. Reorganization Plan No. 22 should be rejected because—

(a) It will cost much more money to administer "Fannie May" if it is transferred to the House and Home Finance Agency than if "Fannie May" remains where it is presently—an agency of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

(b) Reorganization Plan No. 22 ought to be rejected because if "Fannie May" is transferred from the RFC to the Housing and Home Finance Agency it will be necessary to select and train an administrative and processing staff. This unnecessary effort will consume weeks and months of precious time.

(c) Lastly, Mr. President, in the view of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the junior Senator from Washington, Reorganization Plan No. 22 ought to be rejected because if "Fannie May" is taken from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and taken over by the Housing and Home Finance Agency the booming and healthy veterans' housing program will be disrupted, and injured for at least an uncertain and unknown period of time. Unless this program which has been supported and approved by every Senator on both sides of the aisle can be strengthened and materially assisted by the proposed transfer of "Fannie May" to the Housing and Home Finance Agency common sense dictates that plan No. 22 be rejected.

This plan, sir, could not substantially improve present-day mortgage conditions in America, which are currently both sound and productive, a compliment to everybody, including the RFC and "Fannie May." But the plan, if adopted, could wreck the good things which cover us so beneficially today.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I wonder if, in addition to the very persuasive and compelling arguments which the junior Senator from Washington has presented so eloquently to the Senate, he would not like to comment on a statement made in the report issued by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, in reporting the resolution to the Senate. We point out as follows:

> As a general principle, the committee is somewhat doubtful of the wisdom of disturbing an organization which, by general admission, has in the broad perspective served its purposes well.

In other words, when there are no economies to be effectuated, when there are no efficiencies to be secured, it seems to the committee, and to this speaker personally, to be the height of folly and a reckless experiment merely to be kicking organizations around from one administrative agency to another, thereby causing confusion and increased extravagance.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington thanks the Senator from South Dakota for the contribution which he has just made to the discussion. Both Senators believe that there should be adopted a reorganization plan only if it improves current conditions and results in a greater efficiency and in the saving of money. Reorganization Plan No. 22 plainly accomplishes neither of these benefits.

Mr. MUNDT. In other words, there is no virtue in the term "reorganization" unless something salutary is accomplished thereby.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington can only guess, but he thinks that some well-intentioned agents within the executive branch thought that because "Fannie May" had something to do with housing that it ought logically enough to be associated with the Housing and Home Finance Agency. But the Senator from Washington hopes that he made one of his points clear that "Fannie May" is essentially a credit and not a housing activity.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. As one of those who voted against the transfer of the RFC to the Commerce Department I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does the testimony show that the proposed plan was made on the basis that the President anticipated that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's activities would be transferred to the Commrce Department and that then "Fannie May" being only a loaning agency of the RFC, should be transferred to some other department and not transferred to the Commerce Department?

Mr. CAIN. I am not qualified to answer the question just asked by the Senator from Michigan; but logic impels me to say that inasmuch as a few minutes ago the Senate decided to leave the RFC where it is until the so-called Fulbright investigating subcommittee has made recommendations to the Banking and Currency Committee, and eventually to the Senate itself, it follows in sequence that we should leave "Fannie May" where it is; namely, as an agency of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. CAIN. I shall be glad to yield, and to answer the question if time permits.

Mr. FERGUSON. The recommendation of the committee is not either for or against the transfer. Does the Senator care to state to the Senate the number of members of the committee who favored the transfer and the number of members of the committee who opposed the transfer?

Mr. CAIN. I am not a member of the committee; therefore, I do not know how its individual members voted.

However, in a sentence, this is what the committee gave the Senate to ponder over; again I read from page 5:

The lifting of this going concern—

Namely, "Fannie May"—

from the location which it has occupied since its inception can scarcely be expected to produce administrative economy and efficiency, although it is admitted that its administration might be as effectively conducted by corresponding officials of HHFA.

I should like to say that I think we presently have no right to take an unnecessary risk, when one of our committees says that the best we could look forward to would be that "Fannie May" might be as effectively administered by the Housing and Home Finance Agency in the future as it is presently being managed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE TO SUBMIT REPORT DURING RECESS OF THE SENATE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Appropriations Committee, if it reaches a conclusion of its consideration of the omnibus appropriation bill—H. R. 7786—between now and the time when the Senate reconvenes on Monday, may make its report in the interim period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MARSHALL PLAN OF IDEAS

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, yesterday Ambassador John Foster Dulles, who has just returned from Korea, concluded his testimony before the Thomas subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—which is holding hearings on my resolution, Senate Resolution 243—with the following powerful warning, and this is a direct quotation from the testimony taken at that time:

On the effectiveness of our propaganda against that of the Russians may hang the question of war or peace in the next few months.

Mr. President, the current hearings before that subcommittee deal with a subject which is of such critical and immediate importance that I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD my statement of yesterday before the subcommittee. In the statement I explain why we must "recognize that what is going on in the minds and hearts of men everywhere is now a matter of life or death for us."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BENTON BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

It saddens me to think we meet today to discuss how we can best project democracy in the world at a time when our failure to do so has involved this Nation in what may be the shooting start of another global war. I choose to view the fighting in Korea today as a direct failure of this Nation to project the idea of democracy in the world, and to publicize our determination to stand up for the things we believe in, and the principles we will fight for. Whether we could have succeeded in preventing this outbreak through an adequate program of information and education, no man can say. But we should have made the attempt. If we had succeeded there would have been no need for the sacrifices that may turn Korea into another Sarajevo, another Poland, igniting a still mightier and more tragic world-wide catastrophe.

We have poured millions into Korea to build up its economic life, to give Korea a chance to become a model of democracy patterned after what we believe to be the good way of life in our own country. We encouraged the creation of a police force, to preserve law and order—what else can one call the Korean constabulary without tanks or planes or the equipment necessary to repel attack? We have been prepared to sacrifice our dollars and share our spiritual heritage with tiny Korea so that we could fulfill the promise of freedom and independence we made that unfortunate nation. We have been prepared to give them everything but guns and tanks and planes and these we give them now, together with our own troops—and not too late, I pray. The tragedy is we thought we were so near success we could taste the wine though the grape had not yet been plucked.

The tragedy is that while we were doing all this, Russia, to the north, filled the North Koreans with hate and lies about our contributions to the south. The tragedy is that while we sought to build prosperity on peace, on friendship with the South Koreans, the Russians fed tanks, guns, planes, and fertile multiplying lies to the North Koreans. Russia mocked our virtues day after day with treacherous canards. We gave the South Koreans peace. "Warmonger," cried the Kremlin. Day after day the Soviet propagandists hammered away at North Korea by radio, movies, pamphlets, and diabolical rumors, to distort the peace we hoped to build in Korea into a bloated image of an angry god of war. They also fed this poison wholesale to the South Koreans. We let them get away with it. I tell you we have been criminally negligent. We let them get away with it and did little to counteract their insidious propaganda. The Voice of America is a hoarse whisper, and our literature and propaganda techniques in defense of our great democracy are by comparison schoolboy essays. We can't seem to wait for the bell to ring until we can get out of class and get back to play.

We have given the South Koreans nearly half a billion dollars for relief and economic rehabilitation since 1945—356 million during the period of occupation and 110 million through ECA during the past year. We sought to give them freedom and integrity, economic independence. Russia blasted this as "Yankee imperialism." Russia told so many lies about this, and blackballed us so viciously and with such determination, the North Koreans could do no less than say "there must be truth in what Russia says about America".

And we let them get away with it. While the Communists poured it on by every known method, we appropriated 1.4 million for information and educational work in behalf of the United States in Korea during the past year. That was regarded as a very large sum in Washington—I'm told the largest such State Department appropriation for any one country. The big broadcasting station in Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea, with power estimated above 50,000 watts, blanketed all Korea with Communist propaganda. The South Korean station couldn't generate more than three or four kilowatts. The North Korean station boasted of the hundreds of North Koreans who were being sent to Moscow for study and instruction—sometimes 200 at a time. Our own people had funds to send less than 20 Korean students to the United States. The North Korean radio described the hundreds of Communist cultural centers that had been set up in North Korea. Our people had nine little information centers, only one of which—in Seoul—was manned by Americans. Scores of Communist books were translated into Korean; we managed a few. Our motion-picture program was hampered by old and worn equipment. I have this information from a cultural officer who returned from Seoul only last week.

Gentlemen, we would never think of matching a Willie Pep, good as he is, against a Joe Louis in a ring fight in this country; but that is what we did in our propaganda fight with Russia.

Korea is part of a pattern. The ominous fact is that, wherever in Asia we have seen Communist aggression, Communist uprisings, or Communist guerrilla campaigns, the Communist fighters have been native and local Asiatic fighters—all too often with support from local civilian populations. However deluded they may be, we can assume that most of them believe they are struggling for a good cause. How did they get that way? The prime answer is given, in my judgment, in the preamble to Senate Resolution 243: "The real methods of Communist aggression are incessant and skillful propaganda designed to prepare the way for political infiltration, for sabotage, and for the consolidation of power by suppression and terror." It is a world-wide pattern.

This is the background against which witnesses will testify this week. This is why I'm so grateful for the action taken by the Foreign Relations Committee in scheduling this open hearing so that the Senate can come to grips with what I consider the most vital problem of our time.

The problem is how to shatter Russian propaganda with truth. If the people of the world believe we are right as well as strong, communism will become easy to contain. The fight is for the minds and loyalties of all mankind. It is nothing less than that.

It is to tell the world what we stand for, so it can choose for itself between our freedom and the world's freedom, or Red Russian enslavement where people are numbers, where people are tools, where they are machines and statistics, where people are everything but humans fashioned in the image of the God we believe in.

We've sold the world everything from soap to Senator BYRD's apples. We've sold them our machines and our technology. We've sold them our movies, our music, and our dentistry. We have sold them everything but the most important item of all, our spiritual heritage of freedom and our intense belief in it.

Russia, through its clever propaganda in the past 30 years, has been selling the world a phony package. The Russians are the world's greatest plagiarists. They have stolen or bastardized the great ideas of the West—peace, democracy, justice, national independence—our phases that exult and sing of our freedom, and corrupted them to the end of tyranny. This has got to stop, and we have got to stop it.

A great campaign of ideas is, I believe, finally the only way in which we can boot Soviet propaganda where it deserves to be booted. We've got to do it now. There is no time tomorrow. Already it is late.

We have made a start. Since 1945, when we began our first peacetime program of international information and educational exchange, I estimate that some 60,000 foreign students have spent a period of study in the United States. I wish it had been a quarter of a million. We have a Voice of America broadcast. The Soviet decision to throw 200 to 250 trarsmitters into the task of jamming the Russian-language broadcasts of the Voice of America and the BBC is a backhanded tribute to its effectiveness; we are still getting through with some of our broadcasts.

In the resolution which this committee has undertaken to study, these are the immediate steps we can take to smother Russia's lies with cold logic and warm truth:

1. We must apply constant pressure, never letting up, through the United Nations and all available diplomatic channels for freedom of the press, radio, television, and the movies—every channel, source, and communication medium must be allowed to be free to sow truth in the world.

2. We must back UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization with solid American dollars to promote its great work.

3. We must encourage a vast two-way flow of students from all the countries of this earth, and from America to these free nations.

4. I would expand the Voice of America fivefold.

5. I would employ documentary motion pictures on a scale worthy of the effectiveness of this great medium.

The program outlined in these proposals is not merely a crisis program. It is not psychological warfare. Psychological warfare may become necessary. But it will call for other kinds of activity. These proposals will be helpful in the present crisis. But primarily they are designed to prevent such crises. For generations the United States had no such program. For all practical purposes we were indifferent to foreign opinion. Nations to whom foreign relations were a matter of life and death were not so indifferent. The French as far back as 1870 launched a cultural exchange program, and it can be argued that, with French military and economic power now small relative to other powers, France's cultural reputation in some measure accounts for its continuing influence. Britain's first systematic international information work was started by businessmen. The totalitarian powers were the first to exploit communications to the full. It was Soviet Russia—which was built on propaganda—that has shown the tremendous power, for good or evil, of projecting ideas in international relations. No figures are available but all indications are that the Soviet Union is spending more for international propaganda than all other powers combined.

I hope the distinguished witnesses who appear before this committee will appear in support of the resolution. There may be other ways to work out this psychological offensive of democratic ideas, and we must leave our minds open to accept the best of them. But I beg you, let's get going with this offensive now. Let's recognize that what is going on in the minds and hearts of men everywhere is now a matter of life or death for us.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD Secretary Acheson's brilliant analysis, in which he explains why "there has never been a time when men everywhere who value freedom had a greater need to know the truth."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON BEFORE A SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SENATE RESOLUTION 243, WEDNESDAY, JULY 5, 1950

I welcome warmly the action of Senator BENTON and the 12 Senators associated with him in introducing Senate Resolution 243, calling for "a greatly expanded program of information and education among all the peoples of the world to the full extent that they can be reached." The sponsors of this resolution have accurately diagnosed one of the elements not only vital but in fact indispensable to the conduct of American foreign relations today. We must make the truth known to the peoples of the world. This is a task that calls for greatly expanded and intensified efforts.

Truth in the world today is a political force. Nothing makes plainer the power of this force, I think, than the Communist fear of it. Behind the iron curtain, it has been said, "Truth is treason." We are familiar with the immense machinery of the police states for ensuring that the words and acts of their citizens conform slavishly to the doctrines advocated publicly by their masters. That machinery has also, as one of its primary tasks, to exclude the truth, to suppress facts. Some of these facts seem to us curiously harmless, but once you begin to exclude the truth, to found your state on deliberately preserved ignorance and deliberately disseminated falsehood, even very simple facts have a potentially explosive force.

The Communist states have not only shown their fear of truth by elaborate internal controls and policing. They have set up at their borders bars against free communication and free movement of men, books, ideas—against all the carriers of truth and information. They have pursued a policy of deliberate self-isolation. They are afraid to let their citizens look out, and they are afraid to let others look in. The recent demands that the United States close its information services in Rumania and Czechoslovakia are witnesses to the power of truth as a political force. So is the Soviet jamming of our radio broadcasts.

If totalitarian regimes canot flourish where the truth is fully available, free and democratic countries cannot flourish unless their citizens do have access to the truth. The freedom of free nations grows out of the minds of its citizens. Freemen make up their own minds, on the basis of free access to the truth, to the facts.

The growth of an international community of free and democratic nations depends upon the ready and free flow of facts, ideas, and people. Only this free flow of facts, ideas, and people can make clear the common bonds and interests of nations, and allow them to settle their differences peaceably and justly.

International Communist propaganda has been engaged in a great campaign of falsification, distortion, suppression, and deception. We have had recently in Korea an illustration of the cruel deception being practiced by Communist propaganda on the universally felt desire for peace. Just a few weeks before Communist armed forces launched their carefully planned attack across the thirty-eighth parallel, over half of the population of North Korea was reported to have signed Communist-circulated petitions for peace. The cynical aggression of communisim in Korea, and the falsehoods that have preceded and accompanied it, make inescapably clear the importance of the objectives in this proposed resolution.

This country has been a special target of the Communist campaign of falsehood and abuse. We have not been selected as a target simply because the Communists don't love us. The Communist effort to misrepresent and discredit the aims and nature of American life, and the aims and nature of Amercan foreign policy, has primarily a great strategic value in the furtherance of Communist world objectives. This Communist campaign therefore jeopardizes the security of the United States, and is a threat to the security of the free world.

One of the strategic objectives of this Communist campaign is to divide the free world, whose unity is essential to its strength, and essential to the elimination of Communist expansion.

Another is to confuse the world about the nature of democratic aspirations and ideals, and to weaken the moral force and attraction of the free world.

Another is to spread deception about the free world's strength and resources, of every kind, and thus to weaken the free world's confidence in itself.

Another is to sow doubts regarding the free world's firmness of purpose, its determination to fulfill the international obligations it has accepted in the cause of freedom, and thus, to produce irresolution, fear, and uncertainty.

So far as Communist efforts to foster falsehood about the United States are successful, they serve these Communist designs. They help to drive wedges between the United States and other countries, to create hesitancy, and to prevent clear, effective, unified resistance against Communist aims.

We must therefore make unmistakable the truth about the United States and the other free nations. In doing this we will make plain the essential bond of common beliefs and common interests that underlie differences in national customs and circumstances. We must make plain the facts of international relationships today, so that every man has an opportunity to make a true judgment on the immense issues and decisions that confront him. We must make plain the difference between Communist pretensions and Communist performances.

The President, in his address before the American Society of Newspaper Editors on April 20, said: "Our task is to present the truth to the millions of people who are uninformed or misinformed or unconvinced. Our task is to reach them in their daily lives, as they work and learn. We must be alert, ingenious, and diligent in reaching peoples of other countries, whatever their educational and cultural backgrounds may be. Our task is to show them that freedom is the way to economic and social advancement, the way to political independence, the way to strength, happiness, and peace. We must pool our efforts with those of the other free peoples in a sustained, intensified program to promote the cause of freedom against the propaganda of slavery. We must make ourselves heard round the world in a great campaign of truth."

The President directed me at that time to plan a strengthened and more effective national effort to use the great power of truth in working for peace. In accordance with that directive, the Department of State has submitted to the President a plan for a broader and stronger program of information and education designed to carry out a great campaign of truth, in the interest of a free and peaceful world. That plan is presently being considered by the President. It is dedicated to the achievement of the principles and purposes so clearly set forth in the proposed resolution.

The task of telling the truth, as the President has emphasized, is not "separate and distinct from other elements of our foreign policy. It is a necessary part of all we are doing to build a peaceful world." It is essential to the success of our foreign policy that the military, political, and economic measures we are taking be accompanied by an effective information program. The Marshall plan, point 4, military aid must be seen fully and truthfully in the widest context of the United States' hopes and aspirations. The facts about what we do, the facts about why we do it, the facts about the way we do it, are integral parts of what we do in foreign affairs.

We must remember in these efforts that the truth is a hard master.

We must always be on our guard against permitting what we say to outrun what we do. We must recognize that the more fully our principles are understood, the more closely our practice will be inspected. Our performance must not tag behind our principles. We must remember, too, that peoples speaking to peoples involves peoples listening to peoples. We must remember that the truth cannot be monopolized.

In the struggle for men's minds and men's allegiances, the free nations have great advantages. The truth is on their side. In addition, the free nations have developed to a high degree as integral parts of their free institutions, technical resources, and skills for discovering the truth and for telling the truth. The democratic concept has depended on the ability of every man to learn the truth and to act as an individual on the basis of it. Just as totalitarian states by their nature are equipped to suppress the truth, so the free nations are equipped by their nature to discover and disseminate it. These great resources implicit in democratic life must be utilized to the fullest. The emphasis placed in the sixth point of Senate Resolution 243 on the efforts of private American citizens seems to me to recognize this essential principle, and I welcome particularly this emphasis on private participation. Governments can do only a very small part of the task. It is the individual citizens, the private organizations, the independent groups, who make the major contribution to ensuring that the truth is known.

There has never been a time when men everywhere who value freedom had a greater need to know the truth.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, today Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, the great pioneer in the development of American broadcasting, and the distinguished chairman of the Board of Directors of the Radio Corporation of America, came to Washington to testify before the Thomas subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee which now is holding hearings on my resolution—Senate Resolution 243—calling for a great, world-wide campaign of ideas. The committee found General Sarnoff's testimony so illuminating and important that I ask unanimous consent to have his prepared statement printed at this point in the RECORD, so that it will be brought at once to the attention of the Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON VOICE OF AMERICA BY BRIG. GEN. DAVID SARNOFF, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA, BEFORE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, UNITED STATES SENATE, JULY 6, 1950

Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I am glad to respond to your invitation to participate in the discussion of the development of a Marshall plan in the field of ideas, and to consider the urgency of a world-wide plan to strengthen the Voice of America so that it will contribute more effectively to the high purposes outlined in Senate Resolution No. 243.

In an effort to be helpful may I first review the important steps in the history of the Voice of America.

For many years, I have been concerned about the need for an effective system of international broadcasting which would serve our national interests and advance the cause of world peace.

As early as 1938—12 years ago, and 3 years before we entered World War II—I discussed this subject with President Roosevelt, to stress its growing importance in a troubled world. At the President's direction I brought the problem to the personal attention of the then Under Secretary of State, Mr. Sumner Welles. In my memorandum to Mr. Welles, dated October 25, 1938, I said:

"The principal nations of the world are now busy strengthening and increasing their physical equipment for national defense, to meet changing world conditions. But it would seem that mental preparedness may prove as vital as physical preparedness. Radio, especially in the international field, is the instrumentality by which this can best be accomplished."

During the war, international broadcasting activities of the United States were placed under the control of the Office of War Information (OWI). The war demonstrated daily the vital importance of this service and its great potentialities in psychological warfare. But no policy looking to the future of international broadcasting was then being developed by our Government, while other governments, such as Great Britain and Russia, were expanding their foreign broadcasting organizations and facilities far beyond anything we were doing or contemplated doing.

In January 1943—a year after Pearl Harbor—I again called President Roosevelt's attention to the problem and emphasized the need for developing a Government policy to meet the postwar situation. The President was sympathetic with my views and directed me to carry on with the then Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull. I called on Secretary Hul and found that the President had personally informed him about our previous talks and had expressed the hope that the State Department would develop and recommend a comprehensive program to meet our national requirements.

In my talk with Secretary Hull, I stressed particularly the importance of developing a Government policy respecting international broadcasting after the war. It was at that time I originated the plan and called it the Voice of America, although I had discussed the concept with President Roosevelt in 1938.

Secretary Hull appeared much interested and asked me to give him a memorandum covering the principal points I had made to him orally. Accordingly, I submitted to the Secretary a memorandum dated January 9, 1943, from which I quote the following paragraphs:

"With the victory of the United Nations, the United States will have to play an increasingly important part in world affairs.

"The likelihood is that the United States will emerge as a more vigorous entity than any other. Our production capacity will be at a new peak, our resources will be greater than those of any other nation, our technology will have produced many synthetic substitutes to add to the sum total.

"Our science will have created new products and new services that the rest of the world will want and need. Our agriculture will be producing food that the rest of the world would require.

"The war doubtless will have been fought but little on our own soil. Therefore, our land and our industry will be stronger than before; whereas those of other leading nations will be weaker.

"Our aviation and communications will be immeasurably expanded, and available for service in the new kind of world that is to follow. Our gold supply and financial standing will be enhanced.

"We shall be called upon, doubtless, to help feed, clothe, and shelter war-torn Europe and Asia. We shall be called upon to assist in reestablishing law and order. Many countries in the world will perhaps be seething with rebellion as a result of the disestablishment of Axis control and the impoverishment and disillusionment of people who have lost all in the war.

"We shall be nearer to all the other parts of the world than ever before, both physically and mentally, due not only to more rapid communications, but because millions of our people will have been abroad. Doubtless, new ideologies will develop, yet there will be a continuing struggle of democracy against totalitarianism. Our aid will be given to some peoples and denied to others, and it will be necessary that we cause all peoples to understand the reasons for our aid as provided or withheld.

"In order to help the peoples of the world understand the reasons for our policies, it will be necessary to utilize a mass means of communications. The means of communication reaching the largest numbers most rapidly is radio broadcasting. This, therefore, means that we shall be necessarily closely linking our foreign broadcasting to our foreign policy.

"The expansion and maintenance of our foreign policy is, of course, traditionally the responsibility of the Department of State. It, therefore, seems not only reasonable, but imperative that the means of expansion (foreign broadcasting) be readily available and closely related to this Department.

"The job of maintenance and expansion of our foreign policy will be no less global in peacetime than it is in wartime. In fact, its global nature may well be intensified, because it will be essential to reach peoples everywhere, including those now residing in enemy and conquered territories.

"More people would be listening to international radio everywhere in times of peace than are listening in time of war, because, with the removal of wartime restrictions, listening will be encouraged. So, we shall have to serve a vastly increased audience. International broadcasting in the postwar world of the future will naturally be incomparably greater in magnitude and scope than that before the present war.

"It is also reasonable to expect that other nations, having learned during the war of the power of international broadcasting as an instrument for the exposition of national policy and for propagandizing, will be unwilling to relinquish or to diminish their activity in those fields. On the contrary, each may be expected to expand these activities in order to justify its own policies and to plead its own case.

"It is inconceivable that the international voice of the United States should be silent or remain weak in the postwar world that will be struggling competitively both in commerce and in ideologies."

That memorandum, gentlemen, was written during the war. It was submitted to Secretary Hull 7 years ago.

Three years later, on April 4, 1946, I outlined a similar program to the United Nations. Recognizing the fact that "Freedom to listen" is absolutely essential to advance the cause of world peace I pointed out to the officials of the United Nations that one vital way to increase the effectiveness of the UN, would be to provide a world-wide system of mass communication that could reach all peoples of the world freely and simultaneously.

At that time, I proposed a 2-point plan along these lines and submitted it to the President and Secretary General of the United Nations. The plan was as follows:

"I. Establish the principle of 'Freedom to listen' for all peoples of the world. This is as important as 'freedom of speech' and 'freedom of the press.'

"II. Establish an independent international broadcasting system to be known as 'The Voice of UN.' This system should be owned and operated by the UN. It should have a world-wide range and be used for broadcasting the public proceedings of the United Nations, for disseminating its information to listeners everywhere, and for spreading knowledge and understanding among the peoples of the world. 'The Voice of UN' should broadcast in the principal languages employed throughout the world. The UN should continue to afford to other broadcasters and the press the privilege of broadcasting and publishing its proceedings and information."

That plan was referred to the experts at UN and received their study and consideration. Thereafter, they informed me that because of their limited funds they were unable to adopt the complete plan. However, the UN did establish certain facilities and now broadcasts some programs internationally.

After my meeting with Secretary Hull and subsequent to this proposal to the UN, I discussed the same subject and repeated my suggestions to the succeeding Secretaries of State, Mr. James F. Byrnes and Gen. George C. Marshall. My views also were presented to the Federal Communications Commission.

All of these communications are included in a booklet, "The Voice of America, Freedom to Listen and Freedom to Look", which contains a chronological history of the facts I have recited, including the text of the memoranda to which I have referred. Copies of this booklet are available for each member of this Committee.

In March of the present year, I reviewed the problem with President Truman and with the present head of "The Voice of America", Assistant Secretary of State Mr. Edward W. Barrett.

In the meantime, Senator BENTON—the author of Senate Resolution 243, which you are now considering—had been appointed Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs on September 19, 1945. He imbued that section of the Department with a vigorous spirit of action. He reviewed the information I had previously supplied to the State Department as well as the facts which he collected on the subject. During his regime considerable progress was made.

Upon his retirement on September 24, 1947, his successor, Mr. George V. Allen, assistant secretary, picked up where Senator BENTON left off and made further progress.

The present Assistant Secretary, Mr. Edward W. Barrett, has shown a full understanding and appreciation of the problem. I understand that he has prepared tentative plans and recommendations for expanding the Voice of America and other related services in the international field.

In August 1946, while I was in Europe, Mr. James F. Byrnes, then Secretary of State, invited me to come to Paris where he was attending a meeting of the United Nations. He was concerned about international broadcasting, and asked for my views on the subject.

After a full discussion of the matter with Secretary Byrnes, and at his request, I addressed a letter to him under date of August 10, 1946. In that letter I outlined the immediate requirements for international broadcasting as I saw them from the standpoint of the interests of the United States, especially in regard to the east and west zones of Germany. I pointed out that as a result of my visit to Germany, from which I had just returned, I had observed that the Russians were reaching more Germans with local broadcasting in the German language than the Americans. The Russians controlled more powerful broadcasting stations in Germany and used them most effectively. I called his attention to the fact that this could not help but prejudice the American point of view and the American interests in Germany.

For this reason I advised that additional technical facilities be provided in the American zone to furnish a service equal or superior to that given the Germans in the Russian zone. I also suggested that the broadcast station in Munich, Germany—under American control—be equipped with short-wave facilities sufficiently powerful to reach Moscow and other important Russian cities. Further, I urged that means be provided at Munich, to receive the programs originating in the United States and to retransmit them by means of the Munich short-wave station to Russia and other iron curtain countries. This has since been done.

I am glad to be here today to participate further in these important discussions. The critical events of the past few weeks indicate the vital necessity for immediate and definite action.

While I am in general agreement with the purposes of Senate Resolution 243, nevertheless, I should like to address myself specifically to four prime purposes which Senator BENTON has listed in his measure. These purposes are:

"PAR. 3. (c) Creation of a world broadcasting network capable of broadcasting on long wave, short wave, or medium wave, with an ultimate goal of reaching virtually every radio set in the world.

"(d) Use of any and all possible means to reach people who are shut off from the free world by censorship and suppression.

"PAR. 4. Promotion of democratic education abroad, notably in the occupied areas of Germany and Japan.

"PAR. 6. Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the international propagation of the democratic creed be made an instrument of supreme national policy, by the development of a Marshall plan in the field of ideas."

The principal nations in the world engaged in international broadcasting are Russia, Great Britain, the United States, and France. Of these nations, Russia leads in coverage, hours of operation, and number of languages and dialects broadcast. Russia covers large areas of the world with four times as many hours of broadcasting as we do. The British are next in this field. Their international broadcasting services also cover larger areas; they transmit for longer periods and program in more languages and dialects than we do.

I am informed that Russia and her satellites transmit 832 program-hours a week. Great Britain 635 hours, and France approximately 200 hours.

Compared with these figures, United States transmissions total 192 program-hours a week. Russia holds first place among these nations in international broadcasting, and the United States last.

I am further informed that in the past 2 weeks Russia has stepped up its service to North America to 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. These Russian programs are in English.

It is tragic that the United States is so far behind Russia in the use of this modern method of battling for the minds of men.

The immediate need is to expand our international radio broadcast service as quickly as it is physically and technically possible to do so.

At present the Voice of America is transmitted daily in 25 languages and dialects. It operates 20 short-wave 50-kilowatt transmitters on the east coast of the United States, 7 short-wave 50-kilowatt and 1 short-wave 200-kilowatt transmitter in the Middle West, and 8 short-wave 50-kilowatt and 2 200-kilowatt short-wave transmitters on the west coast. In addition, there are 2 short-wave 100-kilowatt transmitters in Hawaii, 2 short-wave 50-kilowatt transmitters at Tangiers, 5 short-wave 50-kilowatt transmitters at London, and 4 short-wave transmitters at Munich. We also have 2 short-wave 50-kilowatt transmitters and 1 50-kilowatt medium-wave transmitter at Manila.

When these stations are laid out on the map of the world it will be seen that we are short of stations between Tangiers and the Philippines, through the Mediterranean, in Arabia and India effectively to ring the iron-curtain countries.

It is highly desirable also to place both medium-wave and short-wave stations with high power at suitable sites in the following countries: Greece, Arabia, Iran, India, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Japan, and possibly on Okinawa. It is also desirable to place short-wave, high-power stations in the territory of Alaska, to beam into Siberia.

I believe that the people on the other side of the iron curtain who listen to our programs have learned to trust the Voice of America. Their politicians fear its truth and influence.

The Russians are doing everything possible to jam our transmissions, particularly on short waves. Such success as we now have in reaching Russian listeners is due to the transmission of the same messages on many different frequencies with much repetition in various languages. Simultaneous broadcasting on many frequencies is the best method today to combat jamming.

While I favor an increase in the number and power of short-wave stations located in the United States, this alone would not solve the problem because jamming takes place near the receivers. This jamming is usually tailored to fit the strength of the received signals.

In the present state of the radio art it is impractical to deliver satisfactory signals, at all hours of the day and night, to all parts of the world, with transmitters located only in the United States, regardless of their power.

Our immediate objective should be to ring the iron courtain countries with radio broadcasting. To do this, strategic sites must be obtained on American and other free territory upon which both short-wave and medium-wave broadcasting stations can be installed and operated.

I would propose that we build stations wherever there is a free democratic government that will permit us to do so, and that each of these stations be equipped with several high power, short-wave, and medium-wave transmitters, and a proper selection of frequencies.

Further, I would suggest that the major portion of program material be originated in the United States. These programs should be transmitted to the proposed stations on foreign soil, where modern receiving facilities can be provided to enable these stations to receive despite jamming. The additional coverage we would gain through short-wave receivers tuned directly to our United States originating stations, would be so much to the good. This program service could be further supplemented by transcriptions from the United States.

The most practical extension of our service to the listening public in foreign lands, would be through high-power stations operated by the United States in those countries. This we can do today in Germany, Tangier, Japan, and the Philippines.

The State Department should be granted the necessary funds and authority to erect additional stations in territories now under our control, and to add stations wherever they can reach high concentrations of population. Also, the Department should be authorized to negotiate for transmitter sites with nations whose territories fringe upon the iron curtain satellites.

Such a comprehensive world-wide plan would permit the Voice of America not only to render more reliable service, but would also increase the number of hours and the number of languages and dialects which could be covered. We should not only match, but surpass the Russian broadcast service in the international field.

The cost of erecting a world-wide network system such as I have recommended to ring the iron curtain countries would be approximately $200,000,000. This is no more than the price of two modern battleships.

The cost of operating such a network would be approximately $50,000,000 a year.

I believe that our State Department has succeeded in making some arrangements with the British Government whereby the British Broadcasting Corp. is cooperating with us in broadcasting the programs of the Voice of America. I suggest that such arrangements be expanded on a much wider basis. Through the extensive facilities of the BBC, the British Government is in a position to help us and to help itself in increasing the range and scope of the Voice of America.

The State Department, if it has not done so, might also consider the possibility of purchasing time for programs of the Voice of America on local stations in foreign countries. These stations could transmit or relay American programs into many vital territories. Friendly and democratic nations, particularly those to whom we are furnishing economic and military aid, should be urged to cooperate with us in the proposed expanded service. These nations face a common problem with us in fighting communism and preventing the cold war from being converted into a hot one.

We should also take into account the promising possibilities of international television. It is not too early to give serious consideration to ways and means for adding sight to sound, in our efforts to reflect democracy to those abroad who seek freedom from oppression. The voice and vision of America can be a powerful aid in achieving these goals.

I suggest that all existing information pertaining to international broadcasting and television be coordinated and crystallized in the preparation of an over-all comprehensive and definitive plan. For this purpose, I recommend the establishment of a commission to study the subject in all its aspects. It should be able, in 60 days, to prepare such a comprehensive plan, including specific estimates of costs, and to transmit its findings to the President of the United States and to the Congress.

In this connection I would call attention to Senate bill 3780, introduced by Senator Mundt, of South Dakota, on June 15, 1950, providing for the establishment of a Commission on Cooperative International Relations. That bill contains suggestions for the composition of a commission that seem to fit the situation that confronts us.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD statements made before the Thomas subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], 2 of the 13 sponsors of Senate Resolution 243.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEHMAN

A few months ago the resolution which I am supporting here today was introduced in the Senate by my colleague, Senator BENTON, in behalf of a number of Senators of whom I had the honor to be one. The text of this resolution was embodied in a speech by Senator BENTON which was prophetically entitled "The Struggle for the Minds and Loyalties of Mankind."

It was, of course, impossible to foresee on that day that a military phase of the world struggle was so soon to involve the United States; that within a few short months our armed forces would be compelled to hasten to a distant corner of the world where the struggle between freedom and tyranny had so unexpectedly burst into open, armed conflict.

Mr. Chairman, it is my deep personal conviction that the six simple proposals set forth in this resolution, if they are approved and carried out, will have a most important bearing on the outcome of the conflict to which Senator BENTON referred 3 months ago, and of which the present operation in Korea is a part.

We are now working against time in all parts of the world. It is impossible to prophesy where the aggressor will strike next as he probes for the soft spots in the non-Soviet world. The contest to win men to ideals of freedom, peace, and justice has reached a stage of crisis. We must strive with the greatest speed and determination to mobilize the moral resources of all nations and all peoples as we prepare for the next phase of the struggle.

I am not pessimistic about the outcome. I am greatly gratified at the steps which have been already taken.

I believe that free nations, on the initiative of the United States, have followed the only possible course.

I have faith that mankind will rally to the side of those who demonstrate a positive faith in human and individual values and in the rights of peoples to work out their destinies in peace and security.

But armed might alone cannot speak for democracy.

We cannot run the risk of having peoples throughout the earth remain in ignorance of our democratic ideals and of our objectives, or be deceived by the devious propaganda of the Soviet Union and its satellites.

I have studied this resolution carefully with a view to determining whether any of its provisions should be eliminated or modified to meet the new conditions which have arisen from the Korean crisis. I have concluded that quite the contrary is true; that the words of the resolution have taken on a much deeper meaning in the light of recent events. The resolution, would, in my opinion, constitute a foreceful recommendation by Congress to amplify the voice of democracy so that it may reach those who are shut off from the free world and bring hope and reassurance to those who are joined in struggle to insure the survival of that world.

The basic structure of a Marshall plan of ideas is here in this resolution. It offers six practical ways by which this Nation and other free peoples can, with speed and effectiveness, counter the concerted efforts of the Soviet Union—concealing its imperialistic motives—to win over to its side the allegiance of large sections of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully urge immediate approval of this resolution both by this committee and by both Houses of Congress. Furthermore, it is my hope, once Congress resolves that these important steps be taken, that the resolution will be speedily implemented by the necessary appropriations and administrative action.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FLANDERS

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly in support of Senate Resolution 243 which proposes to expand and intesify the "program of information and education among the peoples of the world, with a view to closing the mental gulf that separates the United States from other peoples and blockades the universal hope for freedom and peace."

I would first like to call attention to the fact that Russia has made her most dangerous advances by the subversion of men's minds and loyalties. While it is true that she has had her military strength in the background, the actual work of conquest has been by psychological means. She came painfully close to winning western Europe by this means alone. The conquest of China could not been achieved by arms alone. The subversion of southeastern Asia, aside from Indochina, is undertaken by unaided propaganda. A minor expenditure and a major effort in this field is an essential for achieving peace and world order. This cannot be obtained by arms alone. Russia has known this from the beginning. We are only just now awakening to the facts of life.

This contest of tyranny against freedom extends the world over. It does not involve commitment to armed action the world over and our commitments for such action will be greatly diminished if we place the degree of dependents on spiritual and psychological means which wisdom and experience would suggest.

It will be useful to survey the whole field of action in this war of tyranny against freedom. Such a survey shows that there are approximately 750,000,000 people living in competitive freedom and outside of the major assault on freedom by the Russian Government. This includes western Europe, Africa, North and South America. Of course this area is not entirely free and new spots of trouble are breaking out, particularly in Central and South America. The freedom is relative.

There is a second area of about the same proportion, 750,000,000, which is the active missionary field of the Politburo. Here they are working with propaganda and subversive influences rather than by force of arms and only such action as is called for in this resolution can be of any effect against their continued progress. This area is southern and southeastern Asia.

The third area is that inside the curtain, which again has the population of about 750,000,000. This great area can be subdivided into three groups—the satellites, the Russian people, and the small group of Politburo members and the organization which they head and control.

Of these three great areas of the world this resolution would be properly directed toward the support of freedom in the missionary areas. Russia has been winning here by default. A hundred converts to communism are made in India, Pakistan, and Indonesia to one that is made to the cause of freedom. In India, for instance, there is, practically speaking, no literature on our side available to students of secondary schools, colleges, and universities. The book shelves and reading tables are loaded with Communist literature. Communist speakers are to be found everywhere. Experience with the round-the-world trip of the Town Meeting of the Air indicates that American speakers drawn from among our colored citizens would be highly acceptable and tremendously useful.

Furthermore, it is going to take something more than arms to safeguard Indochina, which is our dike against the southward spread of communism. The contest there must be carried on in such a way that the armies fighting on our side are welcomed by the inhabitants. The Communist armies of China succeeded in making themselves welcomed by the Chinese farmers. We have a very difficult task indeed to accomplish the same result in Indochina. Arms, armament, and warfare are necessary but it has to be said again and again that no military action can do the job if men's hearts and minds in this area are disaffected. One of the immediate possibilities is the furnishing of the simple and ordinary everyday medicines in all the areas to which the French and Viet Nam armies gain access. Means must be found to make the inhabitants glad when these areas are expanded.

This, of course, involves serious consultation between ourselves, the French, and the government of Bao Dai on the subject of the welfare of the Indonesians themselves. Should the French endeavor to reconstitute this country as an easy source of wealth, they will find instead that it is a bottomless pit into which they must pour treasures of money and the lives of their soldiers. They must learn and we must insist that they learn the lessons which have been learned by the English and the Dutch. Should they learn these lessons, there is the opportunity for the old connection between France and Indochina to develop into something more stable, and also to the advantage of both countries. This is a little outside the immediate purpose of this resolution, but nevertheless it is connected with it.

We have finally to relay messages of wisdom and hope to the subject peoples of the satellite states. Wisdom is needed in view of the precarious position in which these patriotic nationals find themselves. Paragraph No. 6 is of especial importance here. This reads:

"Encouragement of the establishment of a nongovernmental agency to help inspire and guide the efforts of the millions of private American citizens who might use their talents and resources and contacts overseas in furtherance of the programs and objectives of this resolution."

As is well known, undertakings of this sort have already been initiated by a private organization known as the National Committee for Free Europe. It deserves public and private support.

Wisdom in broadcasting to satellites does not need to be all deadly dull. There is a dangerously humorous aspect to the Russian contention that we have been raining potato bugs on east Prussia. The humor is obvious to us, but the danger lies in the near parallel between the accusation and the horrors of biological warfare.

Why should not this accusation bring from us an offer to donate free of charge X tons of DDT to potato growers of east Prussia? This chemical not only killed the bugs in Aroostock County, Maine, but it likewise destroyed other parasites and hindered the spread of most diseases the potato plant is afflicted with.

We have nothing but good wishes and good will for the people of east Germany. Why not express it in this lighthearted and practical way. Undertakings of this sort should be part and parcel of the measures to be undertaken under Senate Resolution 243.

Finally, we must have more faith in the results of reaching the Russian people themselves and must be ingenious and effective in the means we use. The Voice of America must have the same intensity of technical study that was given to radar, for instance, during World War II. A spirit of optimism with regard to the difficulties introduced by Russian jamming will surely lead to means for overcoming it. If it does not, then all the history of the successful application of science to a desperate human emergency ends in failure for the first time.

We must never forget that the Russian people do not want war. We must find not only old means but new means for letting them know that the American people do not want war. Day and night, month in and month out, year in and year out, this message must be beamed to them in some way.

Programs of the sort contemplated by Senate Resolution 243 constitute in my mind the bone and sinew of any total diplomacy. Our diplomacy is not total if it watches nation after nation taken over by subtle Communist propaganda without effective counteraction on our part and if that diplomacy only comes into play at a stage when it is too late to be effective and when, perhaps, the only remaining resort is to arms.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, if General Marshall, General Eisenhower, and Ambassador Dulles had prepared statements to deliver before the committee, I would also ask unanimous consent to have them printed at this point in the RECORD.

I urge upon the Senate the immediate and continuous consideration of the evidence being presented before the Thomas subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee. No hearings could be more timely. Indeed, as these eminent witnesses have pointed out, and as Ambassador Dulles has said, the decisions reached within the next few weeks by the Congress in this area of our foreign policy may determine the fate of our country and of the free world.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 22 OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 299) providing for the transfer of the Federal National Mortgage Association from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes, or so much time as he may desire, to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to take very much of the time of the Senate in discussing this reorganization plan this afternoon; but I am in favor of the reorganization plan, and I am opposed to the pending resolution of disapproval.

There are several things which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. The first is the fact that this reorganization plan is completely in conformance with the recommendation of the Hoover Commission and its report.

Second, on two different occasions the Senate itself has passed bills transferring "Fannie May" to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the Senate also recommend the abolishment of this agency? Will the Senator explain that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. In the early part of the Eightieth Congress there was a recommendation that "Fannie May" be abolished. However, a little later in the same Congress, when the situation became acute with reference to GI loans, the same Congress renewed "Fannie May," and passed a bill in the nature of an amendment transferring "Fannie May" to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the Hoover Commission recommend the abolishment of "Fannie May"?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; it did not.

Mr. FERGUSON. It seems to me we might think so, judging by the way the task force report reads.

Mr. SPARKMAN. One part of the report of the task force recommended the abolishment of "Fannie May" and the handling of the loans through the Home Loan Bank Board. However, the Hoover Commission itself recommended the transfer of "Fannie May" to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What I have just stated is correct.

Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the fact that back in, I believe it was, the Seventy-ninth Congress, the so-called Taft subcommittee recommended the transfer.

In the Eightieth Congress, the Joint Committee on Housing recommended the transfer; and on two different occasions the Senate itself passed a bill providing for the transfer. However, that proposal was not agreed to by the other branch of the Congress and was dropped in conference.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. Does not the Senator agree that at the times when it was recommended that "Fannie May" be transferred to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, most of the mortgage commitments of "Fannie May" were FHA, rather than VA?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I do not think that is true at all. I do not think that was true in 1948. It may have been true in 1945, in the earlier period.

Mr. CAIN. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But it was not true in 1948 and it was not true when the Joint Committee on Housing, of which the Senator from Washington was a member, made a unanimous recommendation to the effect that it be transferred to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. CAIN. Does the Senator from Alabama agree that today the ratio is about 6 to 1, in FNMA, in favor of VA mortgage payments?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Its primary purpose is handling——

Mr. CAIN. VA payments?

Mr. SPARKMAN. GI home mortgages; that is true.

Mr. CAIN. Is it not true that the Veterans' Administration in its mortgage operations has no connection of any kind with the Housing and Home Finance Agency?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has as much connection with it as it has with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I do not think there is any difference so far as the connection there is concerned.

Mr. CAIN. That is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I appreciate what the Senator from Washington is apparently arguing—the opposition of certain veterans and veterans' organizations to the transfer, based however, upon the fear that this may be the opening wedge for the transfer of the complete housing program from the Veterans' Administration. But I may say to the Senator from Washington and to the Senate that the subcommittee on housing, of which I am chairman, has definitely reached the conclusion not to recommend under any conditions the transfer of the veterans' housing program from the Veterans' Administration, and that this plan has no connection with it whatever. I may say that if I felt that this was a forerunner of the other, I would not support it. But I know definitely that it is not, and that it has no connection with it.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington does not wish to obstruct the comments being made by the Senator from Alabama, but he knows that everyone is interested in determining what benefits can be expected from the proposed transfer, when the committee which reported the plan to the Senate without recommendation said in its report that nothing more favorable in the future could be expected from the transfer than that which was actually taking place today.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I am trying to comment very briefly on that, because I do not want to prolong the discussion. But let me say first that when the Federal National Mortgage Association was originally created by an act of Congress, it was provided that it should be set up by the Housing Administrator. The Congress originally placed it in housing. It was the Housing Administrator who asked the RFC to handle this activity for Housing. Under the law as it stands today, the Housing Administrator can terminate FNMA. In other words, everything Congress has ever done about FNMA has shown its intent to tie it up directly with the housing program. Its function is not that of RFC, which is to lend money. Its function is to help the housing program. In order to do that the Congress has authorized FNMA to use $2,750,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing mortgages, as a secondary market.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. I desire to ask the Senator whether the mortgage market has ever been healthier than it is today under FNMA as a part of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Probably not; but I do not believe it was the activity of FNMA that made the market healthier. I am not critical of RFC, and I am not critical of FNMA. There have been some things which I think should have been handled differently from the way they were handled, but I say that as a whole they have done a very good job, and today they are doing a very good job. They are selling the mortgages now at the rate of about $19,000,000 a week. But it is not, today, so closely related to the housing program as it ought to be.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I should like to say that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Washington are largely in opposition to the reorganization plan because we cannot see any benefits to be derived from the transfer. Against that observation I should like to ask one last question, and I appreciate the willingness of the Senator to yield. We are told, and it appears to be a fact, that FNMA is now administered by agents of the RFC throughout the country, in the 31 branch offices, the heads of which in a sense wear two hats. They administer effectively their FNMA responsibilities, while doing their important work for the RFC. Does it not therefore follow that if a transfer is approved, an entirely new group of administrators and processors must be collected from somewhere and trained in order to provide, under Housing and Home Finance Agency, the same degree of effectiveness and efficiency we are presently getting under RFC.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Foley testified before the committee that the Budget Bureau had been working with his organization and with RFC for some time, to prepare a plan whereby that would be taken care of. As a matter of fact, people think of FNMA as being a great big organization. Here in Washington there are but 12 employees of FNMA, and nearly all the work is done by regular employees of RFC, who handle these activities. There is no reason why the same employees in Housing cannot do exactly the same thing, and we have throughout the country just as many housing offices—perhaps more—than we have RFC offices.

Mr. CAIN. But those of us who are opposing this plan understand that no reorganization plan should be adopted unless it provides a promise of a 25-percent increase in efficiency and reduction in administrative costs. Does the Senator from Alabama suggest to us that administrative costs will be reduced if the transfer is effected—not 25 percent, but will they be reduced by one single penny?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I must say the Senator has advanced a new thought to me. I did not know that the rule had been laid down anywhere that there had to be a 25-percent increase in efficiency and a 25-percent reduction in costs. I do know that reorganization is for the purpose of making the Government more efficient and for the purpose of providing for economy. I also know that the Hoover Commission itself pointed out, and Mr. Hoover recently in a speech said, that economies do not come as the result of the individual reorganization plans, they do not come, necessarily, immediately following reorganization. It is the increase in efficiency which brings about the economy; and I think that that is certainly true in the present case.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. According to the committee report, the administrative work of FNMA is being done by employees of RFC. Does the Senator from Alabama think that the agency to which it will be transferred will absorb those duties, and that it will necessitate a large increase in personnel in order to handle it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I do not think it will call for new personnel. As I pointed out a few moments ago, here in Washington there are only 12 employees in FNMA. There are a great many other employees throughout the country, employees of RFC, who handle the FNMA duties along with their other duties. I certainly understood that that same kind of arrangement would be worked out so far as the Housing and Home Finance Agency is concerned.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then does the Senator think it involves new and additional expense?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, not at all.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it a fact that the Hoover Commission was unanimous in making this recommendation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is my understanding, that it is in complete conformance with the Hoover Commission recommendation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In connection with the point just made so ably by the Senator, that increased efficiency will result, I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not true that, as now set up, the foreclosure of FNMA mortgages must take place in RFC, through the handling by the RFC staff, but that the physical properties, when taken after foreclosure, must then be reconveyed to another agency in Housing, and either rented or reconditioned or sold; and certainly handled and disposed of as a part of the housing program, thus making it necessary for the actual handling and liquidation of those properties to be under a completely different agency from that which, under the present law, must do the foreclosing and the acquiring of titles to those properties?

Mr. SPARKMAN. According to my understanding, the Senator is exactly correct. The Housing and Home Finance Agency handles the properties in those cases. The RFC or FNMA simply handles the mortgage financing part of it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator think that it is much more simple and much more effective to have the foreclosure and the reconditioning and the renting and the resale all in the same agency that does the repossessing under the foreclosure, and that simplification as well as economy, together with the housing of all this activity under one great agency, the Housing Agency, will result from the adoption of this reorganization plan?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly do, and I believe it was that which prompted the Hoover Commission to make its report. As I see it, the thing that we need to keep in mind is that FNMA belongs inherently to Housing in order to help in the development of the housing program, and not to the RFC and its lending functions.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation on this point?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. As the Senator well knows, under the present program FNMA acquires the mortgages by affording a secondary market for them, and in the case of Alaska loans it makes direct loans and acquires the mortgages from the original builders. In the case of the present operation, foreclosures, therefore, have to be by FNMA, which means that it is under the direction of RFC. At the same time, as the Senator knows, the insurance of those loans is through the Federal Housing Administration, so that after foreclosure is completed the title to the retaken houses, whether it arises under original loans made in the case of Alaska, or purchased loans, as in the case of ordinary operations, is taken not in the agency which insures the loan, but in a completely different one. Is not that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOLLAND. And that after the recapture of title in that way by a governmental agency, is it not true that it will be necessary for that governmental agency to negotiate the transfer of the title to a completely separate agency and through a completely separate process before the agency which is charged with the final liquidation of the loans can conduct and complete its business?

Mr. SPARKMAN. All of which goes to point up the fact that this is primarily a housing function, and it should be kept in one place. That is what the plan proposes to do.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator from Alabama will yield further, is it his position in connection with this specific point that a much simpler arrangement, a much more efficient arrangement, and, in the long run, a much more economical arrangement, will be placed in effect by having the foreclosure in the same agency which has to handle the liquidation and disposal of property?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is correct.

I should like to point out one other thing with reference to economy and efficiency in operation. Last October the Congress voted to FNMA additional authority to the extent of $1,000,000,000. It was our thought that that amount would last a year, but, instead, we were told in March that FNMA was running out of money, and in the month of March, if I recall correctly, there was more than $400,000,000 committed by FNMA. Everyone knows that we simply cannot supply money out of the Treasury of the United States that rapidly. I think that if at that time FNMA had been in the Housing Administration, a much more realistic policy would have been followed. It would have been geared to the housing program and would have been conducted in such a manner as to take care, in an orderly way, of the mortgages which needed a secondary market. Instead, it was converted into a primary market.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know how the GI's would have gotten loans to build houses?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will tell the Senator how they would have gotten them. A person who wanted to build a section 608 apartment house went to FNMA and made a commitment that in the future, 12 or 18 months from that time, when the apartment house was built, he would buy the mortgages. The result was that in a month's time $400,000,000 was used up, and the GI who wanted to build a small individual house in some rural town in Georgia, for instance, where there were no banking facilities and lending agencies available to him, found he could not finance the building of his home. It was the big multi-million-dollar project that was being financed through FNMA as a primary market and not as a secondary market.

Mr. GEORGE. Does not the Senator know that those houses were for GI occupancy?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. But it was impossible for the GI to finance his home except through FNMA.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know that when FNMA was originally established it was intended as a secondary market, and I know that in my own home town, for instance, many GI's came to me in the fall of 1947, when FNMA had run out of money and when it was not operating effectively, and they could not obtain loans. That was the reason why in 1948 we gave new life to FNMA by providing it with more money, so that the GI's could get their loans. But instead of operating it as a secondary market, those in charge made it virtually a primary market, and said to the people who were building great multi-million-dollar projects, "We will give you commitments which will not become effective for from 12 to 18 months." The result was that the small-town GI who was building his own individual home, or the man who wanted to build a dozen individual homes for GI's, was not able to get any help from FNMA because the funds had been committed for a year or 18 months in advance; and today there stand on the books of FNMA more than a billion dollars of outstanding commitments.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington considers the Senator from Alabama to be one of the best informed Members of this body on housing, but he has discovered his friend from Alabama in, I think, a serious mistake. The opinion seems to be that FNMA forecloses mortgages. FNMA does no such thing. If a mortgage gets into trouble, it is referred to the RFC or——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I may say that, of course, the Senator from Washington is correct; but I do not see any great variance in what I have said and what the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] said. It does not make any difference whether FNMA makes the foreclosure; it makes the determination if foreclosure is necessary. FNMA, of course, should not be holding the mortgage; it should be transferring mortgages and selling them on the open market as rapdily as possible. But we found in the portfolio more than a billion dollars worth of mortgages held. The result is that the Federal Government has $2,750,000,000 tied up in the revolving fund, and there is before us today a request for $250,000,000 additional.

I can tell the Senator how we can save some money in the fiscal year 1951. The Budget asks for $750,000,000 for FNMA. I am not certain that the agency needs that additional amount of money. I am confident that if we gear the operation of this secondary market to the housing program, instead of putting the revolving fund at $3,000,000,000 or $3,250,000,000, if we carry out the full amount budgeted for the present year, we can cut it down to $2,000,000,000, and thereby put back into the General Treasury of the United States a billion dollars now being used for FNMA. I think we can not only cut down the budget by $500,000,000, but we can return perhaps a billion dollars of the revolving fund to the Treasury.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me one further observation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAIN. In 1945 the Congress passed and the President signed the Reorganization Act. Section 2, subsection (c) of that act required—and this is something with which the Senator from Alabama did not appear to be familiar——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know what the requirement is.

Mr. CAIN. It required that there should be accomplished an over-all reduction of at least 25 percent of the administrative cost of the agency or agencies involved. I merely cite that because it appears to be a fact that the Senator from Alabama has at no time said that this proposed plan will result in the saving of a single penny, let alone 25 percent.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not understand that there is any requirement to the effect that the President must show it would save 25 percent, or any specific amount. In every plan which the President submits he makes a statement of his estimate of the budgetary saving. As former President Hoover has pointed out, in the case of many reorganization plans there would be no immediate savings in money, but the savings would come in increased efficiency in Government operation. I think that is largely true in this instance. I feel certain that we can save $500,000,000 on the 1951 budget by gearing this matter to the operation of our housing program, rather than operating it as a lending agency which makes loans for the purpose of earning a profit. I do not believe that is what it is intended to be. I believe it should be geared to the housing program and made to operate in cooperation with that program. I think the proposed transfer would bring that about.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired. All time for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

PROTOCOL PROLONGING THE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT REGARDING THE REGULATION OF PRODUCTION AND MARKETING OF SUGAR

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, there are on the executive calendar several minor treaties which have been reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. All of them are treaties which are renewals of present methods in which the Government is functioning, or they refer to treaties entered into to which we are a party as a member of the United Nations.

The first one is a treaty which calls for the renewal of the International Sugar Agreement. I ask that it be considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the protocol (Executive G, 81st Cong., 2d sess)., a protocol prolonging for 1 year after August 31, 1949, the International Agreement Regarding the Regulation of Production and Marketing of Sugar, signed at London on May 6, 1937, which was read the second time, as follows:

PROTOCOL

Whereas an International Agreement regarding the Regulation of the Production and Marketing of Sugar (hereinafter referred to as "the Agreement") was signed in London on 6th May, 1937;

And whereas by a Protocol signed in London on 22nd July, 1942, the Agreement was regarded as having come into force on 1st September, 1937, in respect of the Governments signatory of the Protocol;

And whereas it was provided in the said Protocol that the Agreement should continue in force between the said Governments for a period of two years after 31st August, 1942;

And whereas by further Protocols signed in London on 31st August, 1944, 31st August, 1945, 30th August, 1946, 29th August, 1947, and 31st August, 1948, it was agreed that, subject to the provisions of Article 2 of the said Protocols, the Agreement should continue in force between the Governments signatory thereof for periods of one year terminating on 31st August, 1945, 31st August, 1946, 31st August, 1947, 31st August, 1948, and 31st August, 1949, respectively;

Now, therefore, the Governments signatory of the present Protocol, considering that it is expedient that the Agreement should be prolonged for a further term as between themselves, subject, in view of the present situation, to the conditions stated below, have agreed as follows:—

ARTICLE 1

Subject to the provisions of Article 2 hereof, the Agreement shall continue in force between the Governments signatory of this Protocol for a period of one year after 31st of August, 1949.

ARTICLE 2

During the period specified in Article 1 above the provisions of Chapters III, IV, and V of the Agreement shall be inoperative.

ARTICLE 3

1. The Governments signatory of the present Protocol recognise that revision of the Agreement is necessary and should be undertaken as soon as the time appears opportune. Discussion of any such revision should take the existing Agreement as the starting point.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the purpose of renewing this treaty is merely to keep it alive. At the present time members of the Sugar Board are meeting in London attempting to bring about additional arrangements so that the treaty may become effective on a postwar status. The treaty was first entered into in 1937. It has been kept alive, although inactive, for the purpose of keeping the Sugar Board alive.

Mr. President, there is no opposition to the treaty and we think that we may have a report coming from the London conference now in session which will be constructive to the sugar industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The protocol is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the protocol will be reported to the Senate.

The protocol was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive G, Eighty-first Congress, second session, the protocol dated in London August 31, 1949, prolonging for 1 year after August 31, 1949, the international agreement regarding the regulation of production and marketing of sugar, signed at London on May 6, 1937.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification is agreed to, and the protocol is ratified.

PROTOCOL BRINGING UNDER INTERNATIONAL CONTROL DRUGS OUTSIDE THE SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION OF JULY 13, 1931, AS AMENDED

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senate now proceed with Executive H.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the protocol (Executive H, 81st Cong., 1st sess.), a protocol opened for signature at Paris on November 19, 1948, and signed on behalf of the United States of America on that date, bringing under international control drugs outside the scope of the convention signed at Geneva July 13, 1931, as amended by the protocol signed at Lake Success December 11, 1946, limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, which was read the second time, as follows:

PROTOCOL BRINGING UNDER INTERNATIONAL CONTROL DRUGS OUTSIDE THE SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION OF 13 JULY 1931 FOR LIMITING THE MANUFACTURE AND REGULATING THE DISTRIBUTION OF NARCOTIC DRUGS, AS AMENDED BY THE PROTOCOL SIGNED AT LAKE SUCCESS ON 11 DECEMBER 1946

Preamble

The States Parties to the Present Protocol,

Considering that the progress of modern pharmacology and chemistry has resulted in the discovery of drugs, particularly synthetic drugs, capable of producing addiction, but not covered by the Convention of 13 July 1931 for Limiting the Manufacture and Regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs, as amended by the Protocol signed at Lake Success on 11 December 1946,

Desiring to supplement the provisions of that Convention and to place these drugs, including their preparations and compounds containing these drugs, under control in order to limit by international agreement their manufacture to the world's legitimate requirements for medical and scientific purposes and to regulate their distribution,

Realizing the importance of the universal application of this international agreement and of its earliest possible entry into force,

Have resolved to conclude a Protocol for that purpose and have agreed upon the following provisions:

CHAPTER I. CONTROL

Article 1

1. Any State Party to the present Protocol which considers that a drug which is or may be used for medical or scientific purposes and to which the Convention of 13 July 1931 does not apply, is liable to the same kind of abuse and productive of the same kind of harmful effects as the drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, of the said Convention, shall send a notification to that effect, with all material information in its possession, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who shall transmit it immediately to the other States Parties to the present Protocol, to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs of the Economic and Social Council and to the World Health Organization.

2. If the World Health Organization finds that the drug in question is capable of producing addiction or of conversion into a product capable of producing addiction, this Organization shall decide whether the drug shall fall:

(a) Under the regime laid down in the 1931 Convention for the drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, group I, of that Convention; or

(b) Under the regime laid down in the 1931 Convention for the drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, group II, of that Convention.

3. Any decision or finding in accordance with the preceding paragraphs shall be notified without delay to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who shall transmit it immediately to all States Members of the United Nations, to non-member States Parties to this Protocol, to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs and the Permanent Central Board.

4. Upon receipt of the communications from the Secretary-General of the United Nations notifying a decision under paragraph 2 (a) or (b) above, the States Parties to this Protocol shall apply to the drug in question the appropriate regime laid down by the 1931 Convention.

Article 2

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs, upon receipt of the notification from the Secretary-General of the United Nations in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 1 of this Protocol, shall consider as soon as possible whether the measures applicable to drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, group I, of the 1931 Convention should provisionally apply to the drug in question, pending receipt of the decision or finding of the World Health Organization. If the Commission on Narcotic Drugs decides that such measures should provisionally apply, this decision shall be communicated without delay by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the States Parties to this Protocol, the World Health Organization and the Permanent Central Board. The said measures shall thereupon be applied provisionally to the drug in question.

Article 3

Any decision or finding taken under article 1 or article 2 of this Protocol may be revised in the light of further experience, in accordance with the procedure provided in this chapter.

CHAPTER II. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 4

The present Protocol does not apply to raw opium, medicinal opium, coca leaf or Indian hemp as defined in article 1 of the International Convention relating to Dangerous Drugs signed at Geneva on 19 February 1925, or to prepared opium as defined in chapter II of the International Opium Convention signed at The Hague on 23 January 1912.

2. Any such State may:

(c) Accept.

Acceptance shall be effected by the deposit of a formal instrument with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Article 7

A State which has signed without reservation as to acceptance, or accepted pursuant to article 5, shall become a Party to this Protocol upon its entry into force or upon the expiration of thirty days following the date of such signature or acceptance, if executed after its entry into force.

Article 8

Any State may, at the time of signature or the deposit of its formal instrument of acceptance or at any time thereafter, declare by notification addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the present Protocol shall extend to all or any of the territories for which it has international responsibility, and this Protocol shall extend to the territory or territories named in the notification as from the thirtieth day after the date of receipt of this notification by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Article 9

After the expiration of five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Protocol, any State Party to the present Protocol may, on its own behalf or on behalf of any of the territories for which it has international responsibility, denounce this Protocol by an instrument in writing deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

The denunciation, if received by the Secretary-General on or before the first day of July in any year, shall take effect on the first day of January in the succeeding year, and, if received after the first day of July, shall take effect as if it had been received on or before the first day of July in the succeeding year.

Acting Assistant Secretary General

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. This protocol provides for a continuation of a treaty to which we have been a party for years. It also provides that the jurisdiction over the treaty or the registration of the treaty be passed to the United Nations.

There is one additional provision which the Senate should know about. The protocol does add to the habit-forming drugs some of the new drugs which have been invented since the treaty went into force.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The protocol is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the protocol will be reported to the Senate.

The protocol was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive H, Eighty-first Congress, first session, the protocol opened for signature at Paris on November 19, 1948, and signed on behalf of the United States of America on that date, bringing under international control drugs outside the scope of the convention signed at Geneva July 13, 1931, as amended by the protocol signed at Lake Success December 11, 1946, limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification is agreed to, and the protocol is ratified.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the same can be said with respect to this treaty as was said with respect to the last one. It provides merely for a continuation of a long-standing agreement we have had. Now jurisdiction of the treaty passes to the United Nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The protocol is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the protocol will be reported to the Senate.

The protocol was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive B, Eighty-first Congress, second session, the protocol amending the International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic signed at Paris on May 18, 1904, and the International Convention for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic signed at Paris on May 4, 1910. The protocol was signed on behalf of the United States at Lake Success, New York, on May 4, 1949.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification is agreed to, and the Protocol is ratified.

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT WITH THE ORIENTAL REPUBLIC OF URUGUAY

The treaty (Executive D, 81st Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty of friendship, commerce, and economic development between the United States of America and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, together with a protocol, an additional protocol, and an exchange of notes relating thereto, signed at Montevideo on November 23, 1949, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. This treaty merely renews an older treaty and continues a custom we have had for some time in the past with Uruguay. I suggest that the treaty be ratified.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CORDON. The Senator from Oregon is familiar with the Republic of Uruguay, but not with the Oriental Republic of Uruguay. Will the Senator explain to the Senator from Oregon the reason for the use of the word "Oriental" in connection with the name?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I believe the official name of Uruguay is "Oriental Republic of Uruguay." We are thus being educated with respect to that name. I ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] if that is not true?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, it is true. Uruguay was at one time part of the River Plate provinces of the Kingdom of Spain, and in order to differentiate from the mainland around Buenos Aires, or the Province of Buenos Aires, Uruguay was called the Oriental province.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. It has no reference whatever to what we call the Orient. Uruguay is to the east of Argentina.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Is there any change whatsoever in the treaty as compared with the previous existing treaty between the United States and Uruguay?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The changes are perfunctory, if there are any, and they do not bring about any change which would in any way interfere with our trade relations.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, does the Senator regard it as essential that this treaty be voted on today?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Only to the extent that the treaty has been on the calendar for nearly a month, and the committee would like to clear up this business.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit one further inquiry, I hold in my hand for the first time a copy of Executive Report No. 5. I have not had the opportunity to read it or, at any rate, I have not taken the opportunity, although this treaty has been on the calendar for doubtless many weeks. I did not know it was coming up today. I should like, unless there is some special reason for objection to the delay, to have at least the opportunity of going through the report. I notice the report involves some seven pages, including a copy of the treaty, as I recall, and I should like, if it is not out of order, to suggest most respectfully that the treaty go over until the next call of the Executive Calendar.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I have no objection to the treaty going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty will go over.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator from Utah.

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION WITH IRELAND, WITH PROTOCOL RELATING THERETO

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the treaty (Executive H, 81st Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation with Ireland, together with a protocol relating thereto, signed at Dublin on January 21, 1950, which was read the second time, as follows:

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND IRELAND.

The United States of America and Ireland, desirous of strengthening the bonds of peace and friendship traditionally existing between them and of encouraging closer economic and cultural relations between their peoples, and being cognisant of the contributions which may be made toward these ends by arrangements establishing mutual rights and privileges and promoting mutually advantageous commercial intercourse, have resolved to conclude a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation based in general upon the principles of national and of most-favoured-nation treatment unconditionally accorded, and for that purpose have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

George A. Garrett,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Dublin; and,

The President of Ireland:

Seán MacBride,

Minister for External Affairs;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I.

1. Nationals of either Party shall be permitted to enter the territories of the other Party: (a) for the purpose of carrying on trade between the territories of the two Parties and for the purpose of engaging in related commercial activities, and to remain therein for such purposes, upon terms no less favourable than those accorded to nationals of any third country who are permitted entry for the purpose of carrying on trade between the territories of such other Party and the territories of such third country and of engaging in related commercial activities; and (b) for other purposes subject to compliance with the relevant laws and regulations applicable to the entry and sojourn of aliens.

2. Nationals of either Party, within the territories of the other Party, shall be permitted: (a) to travel therein freely, and to reside at places of their choice; (b) to enjoy liberty of conscience; (c) to hold both private and public religious services; (d) to bury their dead according to their religious customs in suitable and convenient places; and (e) to gather and to transmit material for dissemination to the public abroad, and otherwise to communicate with other persons inside and outside such territories by mail, telegraph and other means open to general public use.

3. The provisions of the present Article shall be subject to the right of either Party to apply measures that are necessary to maintain public order and necessary to protect the public health, morals and safety.

ARTICLE II.

1. Nationals of either Party within the territories of the other Party shall be free from unlawful molestations of every kind, and shall receive the most constant protection and security, in no case less than that required by international law.

2. If, within the territories of either Party, a national of the other Party is accused of crime and taken into custody, the diplomatic representative or nearest consular representative of his country shall on the demand of such national be immediately notified. Such national shall: (a) receive reasonable and humane treatment; (b) be formally and immediately informed of the accusations against him; (c) be brought to trial as promptly as is consistent with the proper preparation of his defense; and (d) enjoy all means reasonably necessary to his defense.

ARTICLE III.

1. Nationals of either Party shall, except as otherwise provided in paragraph 2 of the present Article, be exempt from compulsory service in the armed forces of the other Party and shall also be exempt from all contributions in money or in kind imposed in lieu thereof.

2. The foregoing paragraph shall not apply when both Parties are, through armed action against the same third country, in connection with which there is general compulsory service, concurrently conducting hostilities or enforcing measures in pursuance of obligations for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security. However, in this event, nationals of either Party in the territories of the other Party who have not lawfully declared their intention to acquire the nationality of the latter, shall be exempt from service in its armed forces if, within a reasonable period of time, they elect in lieu thereof to serve in the armed forces of the Party of which they are nationls; and the Parties will make the necessary arrangements for that purpose.

ARTICLE IV.

1. Nationals of either Party shall be accorded national treatment in the application of laws and regulations within the territories of the other Party that (a) establish a right of recovery for injury or death, or that (b) establish a pecuniary compensation, or other benefit or service, on account of disease, injury or death arising out of and in the course of employment or due to the nature of employment.

2. In addition to the rights and privileges provided in paragraph 1 of the present Article, nationals of either Party shall, within the territories of the other Party, be accorded national treatment in the application of laws and regulations establishing systems of compulsory insurance, under which benefits are paid without an individual test of financial need: (a) against loss of wages or earnings due to old age, unemployment, sickness or disability, or (b) against loss of financial support due to the death of father, husband or other person on whom such support had depended.

ARTICLE V.

Each Party shall at all times accord equitable treatment to the capital of nationals and companies of the other Party. Neither Party shall take unreasonable or discriminatory measures that would impair the legally acquired rights or interests of nationals and companies of the other Party in the enterprises which they have established or in the capital, skills, arts or technology which they have supplied. Neither Party shall deny appropriate opportunities and facilities for the investment of capital by nationals and companies of the other Party; nor shall either Party unreasonably impede nationals and companies of the other Party from obtaining on equitable terms the capital, skills and technology it needs for its economic development.

ARTICLE VI.

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, national treatment with respect to:

(a) engaging in commercial, manufacturing, processing and financial activities, subject to paragraph 4 of the present Article, and in publishing, scientific, educational, religious, philanthropic and professional activities, except the practice of law;

(b) obtaining and maintaining patents of invention, and rights in trade marks, trade names, trade labels, and industrial property of all kinds;

(c) having access to the courts of justice and to administrative tribunals and agencies, in all degrees of jurisdiction, both in pursuit and in defense of their rights; and

(d) employing attorneys, interpreters and other agents and employees of their choice.

2. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded within the territories of the other Party the right to organize, control and manage companies for engaging in commercial, manufacturing and processing activities, subject to paragraph 4 of the present Article, and in scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities. Companies, controlled by nationals and companies of either Party and created or organized under the applicable laws and regulations within the territories of the other Party for engaging in the afore-mentioned activities, shall be accorded national treatment therein with respect to such activities.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall further be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to:

(a) the matters referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the present Article; and

(b) engaging in the practice of law and in fields of economic and cultural activities in addition to those enumerated in subparagraph (a) of paragraph 1 of the present Article.

4. Taking cognizance of existing economic policies which Ireland considers necessary to furthering her essential interests, the Parties agree that Ireland may continue the application of measures that regulate, in a manner that departs from the treatment prescribed in paragraphs 1 (a) and 2 of he present Article, the establishment of manufacturing, processing and insurance enterprises and the acquisition of ownership interests in such enterprises. If after the expiration of four years from the date the present Treaty enters into force the United States of America considers that the application of such measures departs in an unjustifiable manner from the treatment prescribed in such paragraphs, the Parties shall consult with a view to seeking an adjustment. If differences of views are not adjusted by such consultation, the United States of America shall then have the right to terminate the present Treaty by giving 90 days' written notice.

ARTICLE VII.

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment within the territories of the other Party with respect to acquiring all kinds of property by testate or intestate succession or through judicial process. Should they because of their alienage be ineligible to continue to own any such property, they shall be allowed a reasonable period in which to dispose of it, in a normal manner at its market value. In the case of ships and shares therein, however, a specially limited period may be prescribed.

2. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment within the territories of the other Party with respect to acquiring, by purchase, lease or otherwise, and with respect to owning and disposing of, personal property of all kinds, both tangible and intangible. However, each Party may limit or prohibit, in a manner that does not impair rights and privileges secured by Article VI, paragraph 2, or by other provisions of the present Treaty, alien ownership of particular materials that are dangerous from the standpoint of public safety and alien ownership of interests in enterprises carrying on particular types of activities.

3. Except as provided in paragraph 1 of the present Article, the ownership of real property within the territories of each Party shall be subject to the applicable laws therein. Nationals and companies of either Party shall, however, be permitted to possess and occupy real property within the territories of the other Party, incidental to or necessary for the enjoyment of rights secured by the provisions of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE VIII.

1. The dwellings, offices, warehouses, factories and other premises of nationals and companies of either Party located within the territories of the other Party shall not be subject to unlawful entry or molestation. Official searches and examinations of such premises and their contents, when necessary, shall be made with careful regard for the convenience of the occupants and the conduct of business.

2. Property of nationals and companies of either Party shall receive the most constant protection and security within the territories of the other Party, in no case less than that required by international law. Such property shall not be taken without the prompt payment of just and effective compensation. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be permitted to withdraw from the territories of the other Party the whole or any portion of such compensation, and to this end shall be permitted to obtain exchange in the currency of their own country freely at a rate of exchange that is just and reasonable.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall in no case be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, less than national and most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to the matters set forth in the present Article. Moreover, enterprises in which nationals and companies of either Party have a substantial interest shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, not less than national and most-favoured-nation treatment in all matters relating to the taking of privately owned enterprises into public ownership and the placing of such enterprises under public control.

ARTICLE IX.

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall not be subjected to the payment of internal taxes, fees and charges imposed upon or applied to income, capital, transactions, activities or any other object, or to requirements with respect to the levy and collection thereof, within the territories of the other Party:

(a) more burdensome than those borne by nationals, residents and companies of any third country;

(b) in the case of persons resident or engaged in business within the territories of such other Party and of companies engaged in business therein, more burdensome than those borne by nationals and companies of such other Party, except as to taxes in connection with the acquisition of real property (including estates and interests therein).

2. In the case of companies of either Party engaged in business within the territories of the other Party, and in the case of nationals of either Party engaged in business within the territories of the other Party but not resident therein, such other Party shall not impose or apply any internal tax, fee or charge upon any income, capital or other basis in excess of that reasonably allocable or apportionable to its territories, nor grant deductions and exemptions less than those reasonably allocable or apportionable to its territories.

3. Each Party, however, reserves the right to: (a) extend specific advantages as to taxes, fees and charges to nationals, residents and companies of all foreign countries on the basis of reciprocity; (b) accord to nationals, residents and companies of a third country special advantages by virtue of an agreement with such country for the avoidance of double taxation or the mutual protection of revenue; and (c) accord to its nonresident nationals and to residents of contiguous countries more favourable exemptions of a personal nature than are accorded to other nonresident persons.

ARTICLE X.

Contracts entered into between nationals and companies of either Party and nationals and companies of the other Party, that provide for the settlement by arbitration of controversies, shall not be deemed unenforceable within the territories of such other Party merely on the grounds that the place designated for the arbitration proceedings is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such other Party. No award duly rendered pursuant to any such contract, and final and enforceable under the laws of the place where rendered, shall be deemed invalid or denied effective means of enforcement within the territories of either Party merely on the grounds that the place where such award was rendered is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such Party.

ARTICLE XI.

Commercial travellers representing nationals and companies of either Party engaged in business within the territories thereof shall, upon their entry into and departure from the territories of the other Party and during their sojourn therein, be accorded most-favoured-nation treatment in respect of the customs and other matters, including, subject to the exceptions in paragraph 3 of article IX, taxes and charges applicable to them, their samples and the taking of orders.

ARTICLE XII.

1. With respect to customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation or exportation, with respect to the method of levying such duties and charges, with respect to all rules and formalities in connection with importation and exportation, and with respect to all other matters relating to the customs, each Party shall accord most-favoured-nation treatment to products of the other Party, from whatever place and by whatever type of carrier arriving, and to articles destined for exportation to the territories of such other Party, by whatever route and by whatever type of carrier.

2. Neither Party shall impose any prohibition or restriction on the importation of any product of the other Party, or on the exportation of any article to the territories of the other Party, that:

(a) if imposed on sanitary or other customary grounds of a noncommercial nature or in the interest of preventing deceptive or unfair practices, arbitrarily discriminates in favour of the importation of the like product of, or the exportation of the like article to, any third country;

(b) if imposed on other grounds, does not apply equally to the importation of the like product of, or the exportation of the like article to, any third country; or

(c) if a quantitative regulation involving allotment to any third country with respect to an article in which such other Party has an important interest, fails to afford to the commerce of such other Party a share proportionate to the amount by quantity or value supplied by or to such other Party during a previous representative period, due consideration being given to any special factors affecting the trade in the article.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national and most-favoured-nation treatment by the other Party with respect to all matters relating to importation and exportation.

4. As used in the present Treaty the term "products of" means "articles the growth, produce or manufacture of". The provisions of the present Article shall not apply to advantages accorded by either Party:

(a) to products of its national fisheries;

(b) to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic; or

(c) by virtue of a customs union of which either Party, after consultation with the other Party, may become a member.

ARTICLE XIII.

1. Each Party shall promptly publish laws, regulations and administrative rulings of general application necessary to enable the other Party, as well as traders of both Parties, to become acquainted with provisions in relation to the classification or valuation of articles for customs purposes, to rates of duty, taxes or other charges, and to requirements, restrictions or prohibitions on imports or exports or on the transfer of payments therefor; and shall administer such laws, regulations and rulings in a uniform, impartial and reasonable manner.

2. Each Party shall provide some administrative or judicial procedure under which nationals and companies of the other Party, and importers of products of such other Party, shall be permitted to appeal against fines and penalties imposed upon them by the customs authorities, confiscations by such authorities and rulings of such authorities on questions of customs classification and valuation. Penalties imposed for infractions of the customs and shipping laws and regulations shall be merely nominal in cases resulting from clerical errors or when good faith can be demonstrated.

ARTICLE XIV.

1. Each Party undertakes (a) that enterprises owned or controlled by its Government, and that monopolies or agencies granted exclusive or special privileges within its territories, shall make their purchases and sales involving either imports or exports affecting the commerce of the other Party solely in accordance with commercial considerations, including price, quality, availability, marketability, transportation and other conditions of purchase or sale; and (b) that the nationals, companies and commerce of such other Party shall be afforded adequate opportunity, in accordance with customary business practice, to compete for participation in such purchases and sales.

2. Each Party shall accord to the nationals, companies and commerce of the other Party fair and equitable treatment, as compared with that accorded to the nationals, companies and commerce of any third country, with respect to: (a) the governmental purchase of supplies, (b) the awarding of concessions and other government contracts, and (c) the sale of any service sold by the Government or by any monopoly or agency granted exclusive or special privileges.

ARTICLE XV.

1. The two Parties agree that business practices which restrain competition, limit access to markets or foster monopolistic control, and which are engaged in or made effective by one or more private or public commercial enterprises or by combination, agreement or other arrangement among such enterprises may have harmful effects upon commerce between their respective territories. Accordingly, each Party agrees upon the request of the other Party to consult with respect to any such practices and to take such measures as it deems appropriate with a view to eliminating such harmful effects.

2. Rights and privileges with respect to commercial, manufacturing and processing activities accorded, by the provisions of the present Treaty, to privately owned and controlled enterprises of either Party within the territories of the other Party shall extend to rights and privileges of an economic nature granted to publicly owned or controlled enterprises of such other Party, in situations in which such publicly owned or controlled enterprises operate in fact in competition with privately owned and controlled enterprises. The preceding sentence shall not, however, apply to subsidies granted to publicly owned or controlled enterprises in connection with: (a) manufacturing or processing goods for government use, or supplying goods and services to the government for government use; or (b) supplying, at prices substantially below competitive prices, the needs of particular population groups for essential goods and services not otherwise practically obtainable by such groups.

3. No enterprise of either Party which is publicly owned or controlled shall, if it engages in commercial, manufacturing, processing, shipping or other business activities within the territories of the other Party, claim or enjoy, either for itself or for its property, immunity therein from taxation, suit, execution of judgment or other liability to which privately owned and controlled enterprises are subject therein.

ARTICLE XVI.

1. Products of either Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, national and most-favoured-nation treatment in all matters affecting internal taxation and sale, distribution, storage and use.

2. Articles produced by nationals and companies of either Party within the territories of the other Party, or by companies of the latter Party controlled by such nationals and companies, shall be accorded therein treatment no less favourable than that accorded to like Articles of national origin by whatever person or company produced, in all matters affecting exportation, taxation and sale, distribution, storage and use.

ARTICLE XVII.

1. The treatment prescribed in the present Article shall apply to all forms of control of financial transactions, including (a) limitations upon the availability of media necessary to effect such transactions, (b) rates of exchange, and (c) prohibitions, restrictions, delays, taxes, charges and penalties on such transactions; and shall apply whether a transaction takes place directly or through an intermediary in another country. As used in the present Article, the term "financial transactions" means all international payments and transfers of funds effected through the medium of currencies, securities, bank deposits, dealings in foreign exchange or other financial arrangements, regardless of the purpose or nature of such payments and transfers.

2. Financial transactions between the territories of the two Parties shall be accorded by each Party treatment no less favorable than that accorded to like transactions between the territories of that Party and the territories of any third country.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded by the other Party national and most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to financial transactions between the territories of the two Parties or between the territories of such other Party and of any third country.

4. In general, any control imposed by either Party over financial transactions shall be so administered as not to influence disadvantageously the competitive position of the commerce or investment of capital of the other Party in comparison with the commerce or the investment of capital of any third country.

5. If either Party applies exchange restrictions it shall promptly make reasonable provision for the withdrawal of compensation referred to in Article VIII, paragraph 2, of the present Treaty, the withdrawal of earnings, whether in the form of salaries, interest, dividends, commissions, royalties or otherwise, as well as of amounts for amortization of loans, and for capital withdrawals. Either Party applying exchange restrictions shall afford the other Party adequate opportunity at any time for consultation regarding such provision and other matters affecting withdrawals.

ARTICLE XVIII.

1. Between the territories of the two Parties there shall be freedom of commerce and navigation.

2. Vessels under the flag of either Party, and carrying the papers required by its law in proof of nationality, shall be deemed to be vessels of that Party both on the high seas and within the ports, places and waters of the other Party.

3. Vessels of either Party shall have liberty, on equal terms with vessels of the other Party and on equal terms with vessels of any third country, to come with their cargoes to all ports, places and waters of such other Party open to foreign commerce and navigation. Such vessels and cargoes shall in all respects be accorded national and most-favoured-nation treatment within the ports, places and waters of such other Party; but each Party may reserve exclusive rights and privileges to its own vessels with respect to the coasting trade, inland navigation and national fisheries.

4. Vessels of either Party shall be accorded national and most-favoured-nation treatment by the other Party with respect to the right to carry all articles that may be carried by vessel to or from the territories of such other Party; and such Articles shall be accorded treatment no less favourable than that accorded like articles carried in vessels of such other Party, with respect to: (a) duties and charges of all kinds, (b) the administration of the customs, and (c) bounties, drawbacks and other privileges of this nature.

5. Vessels of either Party that are in distress shall be permitted to take refuge in the nearest port or haven of the other Party, and shall receive friendly treatment and assistance.

6. The term "vessels", as used herein means all types of vessels, whether privately owned or operated, or publicly owned or operated; but this term does not, except with reference to paragraph 5 of the present Article, include fishing vessels or vessels of war.

ARTICLE XIX.

There shall be freedom of transit through the territories of each Party by the routes most convenient for international transit:

(a) for nationals of the other Party, together with their baggage;

(b) for other persons, together with their baggage, en route to or from the territories of such other Party; and

(c) for articles en route to or from the territories of such other Party.

Such persons and articles in transit shall be exempt from transit, customs and other duties, and from unreasonable charges and requirements; and shall be free from unnecessary delays and restrictions. They shall, however, be subject to measures referred to in paragraph 3 of Article I, and to non-discriminatory regulations necessary to prevent abuse of the transit privilege.

ARTICLE XX.

1. The present Treaty shall not preclude the application of measures:

(a) regulating the importation and exportation of gold and silver;

(b) relating to fissionable materials, to radio-active by-products of the utilization or processing thereof, and to materials that are the source of fissionable materials;

(c) regulating the production of and traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war, and traffic in other materials carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment;

(d) necessary to fulfil the obligations of a Party for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, or necessary to protect its essential security interests;

(e) necessary to fulfil the obligations of a Party as a neutral in time of war;

(f) denying the advantages of the present Treaty, except with respect to recognition of juridical status and access to the courts, to any company in the ownership or direction of which nationals of any third country or countries have directly or indirectly a controlling interest.

2. The provisions of the present Treaty relating to the treatment of goods shall not preclude action by either Party which is required or specifically permitted by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, dated at Geneva, on 30th October, 1947, or the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organisation during such time as such Party is a contracting party to the General Agreement or is a member of the International Trade Organisation. Similarly, the most-favoured-nation provisions of the present Treaty shall not apply to special advantages accorded by virtue of the aforesaid Agreement or Charter.

3. The most-favoured-nation provisions of the present Treaty relating to the treatment of goods shall not apply to advantages accorded: (a) by the United States of America or its Territories and possessions to one another, to the Republic of Cuba, to the Republic of the Philippines, to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or to the Panama Canal Zone; or (b) by Ireland to members of the British Commonwealth of Nations and their dependent territories. However, so long as the United States of America may be obligated by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade or the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organisation not to increase preferences, the advantages referred to in the present paragraph shall be no greater than those in force on the date of signature of the present Treaty, or provided for in Article 11, paragraph 3, of the trade agreement between Ireland and the United Kingdom signed April 25, 1938.

4. The present Treaty does not accord any rights to engage in political activities.

5. Nationals of either Party admitted into the territories of the other Party for limited purposes shall not enjoy rights to engage in gainful occupations in contravention of limitations expressly imposed, according to law, as a condition of their admittance.

ARTICLE XXI.

1. The term "national treatment" means treatment accorded within the territories of a Party upon terms no less favourable than the treatment accorded therein, in like situations, to nationals, companies, products, vessels or other objects, as the case may be of such Party.

2. The term "most-favoured-nation treatment" means treatment accorded within the territories of a Party upon terms no less favourable than the treatment accorded therein, in like situations, to nationals, companies, products, vessels or other objects, as the case may be, of any third country.

3. As used in the present Treaty, the term "companies" means corporations, partnerships, companies and other associations, whether or not with limited liability and whether or not for pecuniary profit. Companies created or organized under the applicable laws and regulations within the territories of either Party shall be deemed companies thereof and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other Party.

4. National treatment accorded under the provisions of the present Treaty to companies of Ireland shall, in any State, Territory or possession of the United States of America, be the treatment accorded therein to companies created or organized in other States, Territories and possessions of the United States of America.

ARTICLE XXII.

Except as may be otherwise provided, the territories to which the present Treaty extends shall comprise all areas of land and water under the jurisdiction or authority of either of the Parties, other than the Panama Canal Zone, and other than the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands except to the extent that the President of the United States of America shall by proclamation extend provisions of the Treaty to such Trust Territory.

ARTICLE XXIII.

Any dispute between the Parties as to the interpretation or application of the present Treaty, not satisfactorily adjusted by diplomacy, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice, unless the Parties agree to settlement by some other amicable means.

ARTICLE XXIV.

The present Treaty shall replace the following agreements concluded between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, insofar as the provisions thereof are in force between the United States of America and Ireland: convention of commerce and navigation, signed at London, July 3, 1815, as continued in force by the convention signed at London, August 6, 1827; declaration affording reciprocal protection to trade-marks signed at London, October 24, 1877; and convention relating to the tenure and disposition of real and personal property, signed at Washington, March 2, 1899, except Article III thereof. Either Party may, by giving one year's written notice to the other Party, terminate the aforesaid Article III as between the two Parties.

ARTICLE XXV.

1. The present Treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Dublin as soon as possible.

2. The present Treaty shall enter into force on the day of exchange of ratifications and, subject to the provisions of Article VI, paragraph 4, shall remain in force for ten years and thereafter until terminated in accordance with paragraph 3 of the present Article.

3. Either Party may, by giving one year's written notice to the other Party, terminate the present Treaty at the end of the initial ten-year period or at any time thereafter.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed hereunto their Seals.

PROTOCOL

At the time of signing the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the United States of America and Ireland, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries, duly authorised by their respective Governments, have further agreed on the following provisions, which shall be considered integral parts of the aforesaid Treaty:

1. The provisions of paragraph 1 (a) of Article I shall not be construed to affect the policy of Ireland of requiring that aliens intending to be gainfully employed in Ireland may be permitted entry only if the appropriate employment permits have been granted. However, in keeping with the terms of that subparagraph, the alien employment permits and registration systems of Ireland shall be applied in a liberal fashion with respect to persons occupying responsible positions in American undertakings carrying on trade between the two countries or possessing particular skills necessary for the efficient operation of such undertakings.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article I, paragraph 1 (a), either Party may extend to nationals of third countries special advantages, on the basis of reciprocity, as to requirements concerning travel documentation.

3. The exemption from compulsory military service referred to in paragraph 1, Article III, shall not apply to nationals of either Party who are also nationals of the other Party and who for the time being are within the jurisdiction of such other Party.

4. The term "access to the courts" is used in Article VI, paragraph 1 (c), without prejudice to the right of a court of either Party to order a company of the other, suing or applying to it, to give security for costs where such company fails to show that it has substantial available and sufficient assets within the jurisdiction of such court. Moreover, when a company of either Party is plaintiff in a court of the other, it may be required, in its writ of summons, to give its address, which must be that of its domicile or residence, and not merely that of its place of business.

5. It is understood that companies of either Party not engaged in activities within the territories of the other Party shall enjoy access to the courts therein, under Article VI, paragraph 1 (c), without any requirement of registration or domestication.

6. The provisions of Article VI, paragraph 3 (b), shall not apply to mining activities.

7. The provisions of Article VIII, paragraph 2, providing for the payment of compensation shall extend to interests held directly or indirectly by nationals and companies of either Party in property which is taken within the territories of the other Party.

8. Either Party, subject to any obligations it may have as a member of the International Monetary Fund, may deal with a stringency of foreign exchange by adopting all such measures of exchange control as may be necessary from time to time in a manner which departs from the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 4 of article XVII. However, such measures shall depart no more than necessary from the provisions of said paragraphs and shall be conformable with a policy designed to promote the maximum development of non-discriminatory foreign trade and to expedite the attainment both of a balance of payments position and of reserves of foreign exchange which will obviate the necessity of such measures. A Party may also, notwithstanding Article XII, paragraph 2 (b) and 2 (c), apply quantitative restrictions on imports that have effect equivalent to exchange restrictions applied pursuant to the preceding sentences of the present provision. A Party resorting to the present provision shall consult with the other Party at any time, upon request, as to the need for and application of restrictions thereunder, and shall give the other Party as much advance notice as practicable of prospective new or substantially increased resort thereto.

9. The provisions of Article XII, paragraph 2 (b) and 2 (c), shall not obligate either Party with respect to the application of quantitative restrictions on exports necessary to secure, during the post war transition period, the equitable distribution among the several consuming countries of goods in short supply.

10. The provisions of Article XIV, paragraph 2 (b) and 2 (c), and of Article XVIII, paragraph 4, shall not apply to postal services.

11. Notwithstanding any national treatment provision of the Treaty, Ireland may continue to apply: (a) the differential in the annual road tax in favour of automobiles assembled in Ireland, from parts of whatever origin; and (b) the rebate in the tax on leaf tobacco used in plants controlled by resident Irish nationals. Ireland shall afford opportunity to the United States of America to consult with regard to any proposed increase in the presently existing margin of differential in respect of either of the foregoing.

12. Conformable with the principle that treaty commitments are to be construed in the light of international law, the right of refuge of war vessels in time of war (Article XVIII) is subject to the generally recognised rules of neutrality. Moreover, nothing in Article XIX shall operate to confer at any time on the members of the armed forces, on active service or in uniform, of either Party, or on the warlike stores of either Party, rights of entry or transit to or through the territories of the other Party inconsistent with the recognised rules of international comity.

13. The provisions of Article XX, paragraph 3 (a), shall apply in the case of Puerto Rico regardless of any change that may take place in its political status.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Protocol and have affixed hereunto their Seals.

Done in duplicate, in the English language, at Dublin, this twenty-first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and fifty.

MINUTES OF INTERPRETATION CONCERNING TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND IRELAND, SIGNED AT DUBLIN, JANUARY 21, 1950.

The following notes record the common understanding of the representatives of the United States of America and Ireland with regard to certain questions of interpretation that arose during the course of negotiating the provisions of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the two countries, signed this day:—

Ad Article I, paragraph 2 (e)—

The word "material" is not limited to that intended for printed publication, but includes material for radio, photographic and other uses.

Ad Article I, paragraph 3—

This provision refers, inter alia, to provisions in the immigration laws prescribing grounds for excluding or expelling particular individuals.

Ad Article III, paragraph 1—

Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prejudice the right of either Party to bar from acquiring its citizenship persons who avail themselves of the exemption therein provided.

Ad Article VI—

The word "commercial", as used in this Article, does not extend to the fields of navigation, aviation, communications or public utilities. It relates primarily, though not exclusively, to the buying and selling of goods and activities incidental thereto.

Ad Article VI, paragraph 4—

With reference to the first sentence, it is understood that acquisition of ownership interests in manufacturing and processing enterprises will not be restricted to a greater degree than required by the Control of Manufactures Acts 1932 and 1934; and that these Acts will be applied in a liberal spirit.

Ad Article VII—

The provisions of this Article are to be construed without prejudice to those policies followed by the United States Alien Property Custodian in disposing of certain formerly enemy-owned enterprises which are designed to prevent such enterprises from returning to the ultimate control, directly or indirectly, of World War II enemies of the United States.

Ad article VII, paragraph 2—

The materials referred to include such things as firearms, explosives, poisons and habit-forming narcotics.

Ad Article VIII, paragraph 2—

The second sentence is not intended to require indemnification in cases such as confiscation of contraband and distraint for nonpayment of taxes or debt.

Ad Article XII, paragraph 2 (a)—

The word "sanitary" as used here has reference to the protection of human, animal or plant life or health.

Ad Article XIII, paragraph 1—

The term "administrative rulings of general application" has reference to such as are calculated to enable traders to have the information they legitimately need in order that they may plan their business with foresight. The term is not intended to apply to rulings having to do merely with the internal functioning of the public administration.

Ad Article XV, paragraph 3—

Nothing in this Treaty shall be construed to supersede any provision of the reciprocal arrangement between the United States and Ireland for relief from double income tax on shipping profits effected by an exchange of Notes signed August 24, 1933 and January 9, 1934.

Ad Article XVII, paragraph 3—

This paragraph refers to the treatment granted to nationals and companies of either Party under such exchange restrictions as may be enforced from time to time by the other Party conformable with the other provisions of the present Treaty.

Ad Article XVII, paragraph 5—

It is understood that the term "reasonable provision" allows either Party, during periods of exchange stringency, to apply exchange restrictions necessary to assure the availability of foreign exchange for payments of goods and services essential to the health and welfare of its people, and also allows consideration to be given to special needs for other exchange transactions.

Ad Article XXII—

Territories under the authority of either Party merely by reason of temporary military occupation are not included.

Ad Minutes of Interpretation.

These are designed to clarify mutual intent, and do not constitute commitments altering the terms of the Treaty.

DUBLIN, January 21, 1950.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, this is a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Ireland. The treaty should be ratified.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I shall not object to the treaty now under consideration. I want to make it perfectly clear, if I can at this time, however, that my request that the previous treaty go over is not intended at all to imply any opposition to it. It is simply to give me an opportunity to examine it. I want that made perfectly clear in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from Utah understands that entirely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the treaty will be reported to the Senate.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive H, Eighty-first Congress, second session, a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and Ireland, together with a protocol relating thereto, signed at Dublin on January 21, 1950.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification is agreed to, and the treaty is ratified.

The calendar of treaties has been concluded, with the exception of the one with Uruguay, which went over.

Are there any executive nominations to be considered?

Mr. MYERS. The nominations on the calendar have been passed over, Mr. President.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MYERS. I now move that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT AGAINST COMMUNISTS AND SUBVERSIVE GROUPS

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, earlier this afternoon, under a time limitation, I commenced the discussion of our situation in Korea. I was unable to complete that discussion. I ask unanimous consent to have the remarks I made earlier this afternoon appear with the remarks which I am about to make at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Mr. McCARTHY's entire speech is as follows:)

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, at this very moment GI's are consecrating the hills and the valleys of Korea with American blood. But all that blood is not staining the Korean hills and valleys. Some of it is deeply and permanently staining the hands of Washington politicians.

Some men of little minds and less morals are today using the Korean war as a profitable political diversion, a vehicle by which to build up battered reputations because of incompetence and worse.

The American people have long condemned war profiteers who promptly crowd the landscape the moment their Nation is at war. Today, Mr. President, war profiteers of a new and infinitely more debased type are cluttering the landscape in Washington. They are political war profiteers. Today they are going all-out in an effort to sell the American people the idea that in order to successfully fight communism abroad, we must give Communists and traitors at home complete unmolested freedom of action. They are hiding behind the word "unity," using it without meaning, but as a mere catch phrase to center the attention of the American people solely on the fighting front. They argue that if we expose Communists, fellow travelers, and traitors in our Government, that somehow this will injure our war effort. Actually, anyone who can add two and two must realize that if our war effort is to be successful, we must redouble our efforts to get rid of those who, either because of incompetence or because of loyalty to the Communist philosophy, have laid the groundwork and paved the way for disaster.

The pattern will become clearer as the casualty lists mount. Anyone who criticizes the murderous incompetence of those who are responsible for this disaster, anyone who places the finger upon dupes and traitors in Washington, because of whose acts young men are already dying, will be guilty of creating disunity.

Already this cry has reached fantastic pinnacles of moronic thinking. Take, for example the local Daily Worker, that is, the Washington Post. The other day this newspaper ran an editorial in effect accusing the University of California of injuring the war effort by discharging 137 teachers and other employees who refused to certify that they were not members of the Communist International conspiracy. This, Mr. President, would be laughable if it came merely from the Communist Party's mouthpiece, the New York Daily Worker, and its mockingbirds like the Washington Post. Unfortunately, a few of the Nation's respectable but misguided writers are being sold this same bill of goods, namely, that to have unity in our military effort the truth about Communists at home must be suppressed.

I should like to call the attention of those misguided individuals to three simple facts:

First. Highly placed Red counselors in the State Department are far more deadly than Red machine-gunners at Suwon. Those Red counselors, by blending treachery into policy, can enslave entire nations, while the Red machine-gunners at the most can kill only hundreds or thousands.

Second. If unity is to be purchased by coddling and protecting saboteurs and Communists, then the cost is far, far too high.

Third. We need not worry about having the American people unified behind any sensible anti-Communist program. The American people were unified against international communism long before the President decided to act against communism on the military front.

Unfortunately, so far his actions against communism are directed only to the military effort. In fact, it was only the unity of purpose of the American people that finally forced the President to disregard the advice of that group of Communists, fellow travelers, and dupes in our State Department—a group who make Benedict Arnold look like a piker.

The American people are unified, not behind the Achesons, Lattimores, and Jessups, who have been selling our allies into communistic slavery, but unified behind the kind of thinking represented by MacArthur.

Republican Members of the Senate, such as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and others have long urged that this Nation take steps to stem the flow of communism which was rolling across Asia and out into the Pacific. Mr. Truman has at a dangerously late date decided to follow the advice those men have been urging upon him for years. We welcome him even at what may be a disastrously late date.

However, we do not welcome the motley crowd that he is bringing with him to put into effect this program, the type of program against which they have dedicated themselves throughout their careers in the State Department. How can the Congress or the American people trust the shaping of this new program to men who have opposed it and who have either permitted or planned disaster to America in both the east and west?

One inescapable fact is that either Acheson has been wrong up until the Korean war started, or Truman is now wrong. Both cannot have been right. When Acheson sabotaged and vetoed the attempt of the Congress to fortify South Korea and to give aid to Chiang's anti-Communist forces on Formosa, either he was wrong then, or Truman is wrong now in extending the aid which Acheson has long opposed. Both cannot be right. Gentlemen, that follows as the night follows the day.

Either Acheson was wrong when he referred to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] that we aid the anti-Communist forces on Formosa as a "silly venture" or, if Acheson was then right, the President is now engaged in a "silly venture."

It is absolutely preposterous that a man who has fought and publicly castigated every anti-Communist group in the Far East should now be placed in a position of considerable power over this program to aid those very groups whom he has so vigorously and viciously opposed. What is more, it is an insult to the intelligence of our military men to ask them now to shape their plans to suit the Acheson crowd who have greatly endangered the success of the present military operations by sabotaging the efforts of the Congress to build up the defense of the anti-Communist forces on Formosa and Korea and to do with weapons and the native anti-Communists the task which because of State Department sabotage now is being done with American blood.

The 152,000,000 American people feel that Truman is right in joining those of us who have opposed the coddling of Communists in the East even though he joins up at a dangerously late date. Therefore, in the eyes of those 152,000,000 American people Acheson has been wrong and has no right to represent and speak for them.

Mr. President, it is time to serve notice upon the Communists, fellow travelers, and dupes that they are not going to be able to hide and protect themselves behind a war which would not have been necessary except for their acts.

The American people realize that we cannot invoke a moratorium on fighting Communists and traitors at home, any more than we can invoke a moratorium on fighting them abroad, without completely disastrous results.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator take the view that the common defense, provision for which is one of the purposes set forth in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, may consist quite appropriately in adequate defense within our borders against subversive influences, as well as in adequate defense against attack against our country from external sources?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think unquestionably that is so.

Frankly, Mr. President, I think the Communists within our borders have been more responsible for the success of communism abroad than Soviet Russia has been responsible for that success. I strongly feel, and I do not think there can be any question about it, that had it not been for the planners in our State Department, who went along 100 percent with Stalin in Poland and who went along 100 percent with him in Asia, the entire face of the world would have a different complexion, as of today.

I agree with the historian who once said:

> If this Nation is ever destroyed, it will not be destroyed by enemies from without, but by enemies from within.

Over the last few years, we have seen how dangerously true those words have been.

Mr. President, let us consider briefly what the Pied Pipers for Disaster have done to this Nation. Let us examine the facts and see if the blood that is being shed in Korea is upon the hands of the men who now shout that we must leave them alone or else we shall not have unity in the war effort.

Over a year ago the United States Congress—Democrats and Republicans alike—realizing the potential danger of the situation in the east, voted $75,000,000 to rearm our few remaining allies in that area. That was not a political matter at that time. There was almost a unanimous vote by every Democrat and Republican in both the Senate and the House of Representatives. That was done in the hope that in this way we could save the lives of American boys who today are dying. The President signed the bill. Apparently it had the wholehearted approval of the President. So, we had almost completely unanimous action on the part of the Nation's highest elected officials—the House, the Senate, and the President. That is where the crew of today's unity seekers suddenly stepped in. Because of them, not one cent of that money went to fortify South Korea; not one ounce of gunpowder, not a single bullet, went to Formosa.

Last year the Congress voted $10,500,000 specifically for the purpose of setting up a defense in South Korea, and a total of $27,600,000 to strengthen the anti-Communist defenses of the Philippines, Iran, and Korea. Again that action was practically unanimous on the part of both Republicans and Democrats. It was a realistic program. The Congress saw the Communists sending the latest type tanks, antitank weapons, airplanes, and artillery into North Korea.

Our intelligence agencies were warning of an invasion of South Korea. The Congress acted. The President agreed, and signed that bill. But again the State Department planners stepped in—and how much of that money was spent in Korea? How many antitank weapons, how many tanks, how many airplanes, how many artillery weapons were sent to Korea? The answer is that none were sent there. The only part of that $27,000,000 spent was $200 in connection with $52,000 worth of wire, which has not yet arrived in Korea.

Mr. President, the men who sabotaged the intent of the Congress are today screaming to high heaven that if they are exposed, if the bright light is diverted toward their acts, then our unity of effort is endangered.

Mr. President, in that connection I should like to call attention to what the great architect of our Far Eastern policy had to say, not 2 years or 5 years ago, but on the 17th day of July 1949, as quoted in Compass—Owen Lattimore, who had been advising the State Department—and this is a direct quotation:

> The problem in Korea is to allow Korea to fall, but not to let it appear that we pushed her.

That is the program that Acheson and his crowd accepted lock, stock, and barrel. That is the program they put into effect, until President Truman made the sudden change of policy 4 or 5 days ago.

If the program of Owen Lattimore—the program of allowing our friends to fall, but not making it appear that we were pushing them—had not been bought and put into effect by the State Department, the blood of American boys would not be consecrating the hills and valleys of Korea today.

Mr. President, today the same columnists who have always headed the smear brigade against those who would expose Communists and traitors at home, have now wrapped themselves in the American flag and are attempting to convince the American people—by some strange, twisted reasoning—that the best way to aid our fighting men is to protect the traitors who are responsible for sending them almost bare-handed against tanks in the mud of the valleys of Korea.

As Samuel Johnson said:

> Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel.

Mr. President, I think it is time for this Congress and for the 152,000,000 normal American people to serve notice that we can successfully fight a war abroad and at the same time can dispose of the traitorous filth and the Red vermin which have accumulated at home.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by our very able colleague, the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], at the thirty-first annual encampment of the New York State department, Veterans of Foreign Wars, on Monday afternoon, July 3, 1950, at Rochester, N. Y.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR IRVING M. IVES AT THE THIRTY-FIRST ANNUAL ENCAMPMENT OF THE NEW YORK STATE DEPARTMENT, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS, JULY 3, 1950, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Despite the momentous developments in Korea of the past few days, I wish to give assurance right now that I have no intention of inflicting upon you a lengthy and a detailed analysis of the very grave crisis with which we find ourselves confronted as a result of recent events in that part of the world. This I leave to far-eastern experts—if there are any. May they know—at long last—whereof they speak.

As a layman and as a veteran, however, I shall comment briefly on Korea, insofar as that vital topic pertains to and is a part of the over-all subject which I shall discuss with you today.

First of all, I would note that the President of the United States fully deserves the ringing expressions of support which he has received from the majority of American citizens for his courageous act in ordering America's air and sea and land forces to give cover and support to the South Korean armies. Led at last by Mr. Truman, our Nation has finally shown that it has the backbone to take a definite stand in Asia.

And no matter what the cost on our part, no matter what the toil or what the sacrifice, it is imperative that that stand be maintained and reinforced if we are to prevent the Communist aggressors from so effectively isolating our Nation that we shall be powerless to cope with them in a showdown.

United and resolute now, we cannot afford to weaken. Our very existence as a free and independent people hangs in the balance.

The President's statement on Korea last Monday was an historic one. But it was a very belated one.

Crying over spilt milk never recovered it. And past errors cannot solve present problems.

But we can learn from our mistakes of the past. And to survive as a world power we must learn from them. We must learn to hit communism and to hit it hard whenever it raises its ugly head and strikes at free peoples anywhere in the world.

As all of us know, insofar as Europe is concerned, partisan politics have played a negligible part in the conduct of our foreign policy. As a result, that policy has been strikingly successful.

In France and in Italy, the rising tides of international communism, which shortly after the war threatened to engulf these nations, have now receded. The Soviet attempt to oust the occupying powers of the west from Berlin was frustrated completely when the new famous Berlin airlift demonstrated our determination to remain in that city. The Communist threats to the territorial integrity of Greece, Turkey, and Iran were turned back largely as a result of an American policy which had the strong backing of both major political parties. Finally, a bipartisan American foreign policy resulted in the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty and the negotiation of the military assistance agreements which put teeth in that treaty.

These achievements are the genuine products of an absence of partisan politics in foreign affairs.

Turning toward Asia, however, where there has been a notable lack of bipartisanship and where partisan politics have so crippled American policy that in effect there has been no policy, what do we find? China securely locked behind the iron curtain; southern Korea—the last continental foothold of freedom in eastern Asia—in very grave jeopardy; Formosa secure only so long as United States naval vessels protect it; a Communist-inspired civil war in French Indochina; civil war in Burma; Communist-directed unrest and rebellion in Thailand, in Malaya, in Indonesia, and even in the Philippine Islands. In short, in Asia we are in what can only be termed an utter mess.

Partisan politics—rank, shameless, unforgivable partisan politics—have resulted in an American foreign policy with respect to Asia which as been blighted by weakness, indecision, vacillation and—most reprehensible of all—appeasement.

Must we in this country always have to learn the hard way?

We want no little men with umbrellas, and umbrella minds to boot, conducting our foreign affairs. We want no scraps of paper brought back from distant places and waved in our faces as naive assurance that we are secure from aggression.

Appeasement of aggressive totalitarianism is as wrong now as in 1939. Such appeasement can lead to only one of two results: Outright war or abject surrender. Neither is inevitable.

But to avoid war and to avoid surrender we need an Asiatic policy which is permanently strong, permanently definite, and permanently reliable. We need an honest confession of past errors, a frank recognition of present actualities, and a sound formulation of future courses of action.

And before we can have these things, we must have, once and for all, the removal of every shred of political partisanship from this vital area of our affairs.

This same atmosphere of political factionalism which has proved so disastrous to this country's position in Asia threatens to affect equally adversely another aspect of our national security.

And because this is an aspect of security which is often neglected in any consideration of over-all national preparedness, I should like to discuss it in some detail.

In this connection I read the following, which should be familiar to some of you:

"Resolved, That we go on record as being totally opposed to the employment or appointment of any individual in any governmental position against whom any justifiable suspicion as to his or her loyalty to the United States may exist; and further

"Resolved, That we demand that Congress exert every effort to rid our Government of personnel whose loyalty is questionable."

Those words were taken from a resolution adopted at the Fiftieth National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at Miami, Fla., last August.

As all of us well know, the Congress has been responding to the demand that it "rid our Government of personnel whose loyalty is questionable." Both the House of Representatives, largely through its Committee on Un-American Activities, and the Senate, acting through special subcommittees, have been and even now are conducting investigations of subversive activity within the Government.

Let me say here and now in this connection that every honest effort to clean up the Amerasia case and to track down every lead regarding subversive activities which has been brought to the attention of the Congress should be supported and continued—without equivocation and without compromise. These tasks must be completed. They must be completed thoroughly; they must be completed effectively; they must be completed to the satisfaction of the American people.

During the course of these investigations, however, the Members of the Congress have found that they have on their hands a real problem besides the one of exposing and rooting out Communists in the various agencies of the Government.

This particular problem concerns the method by which we can combat subversion without at the same time destroying certain traditions of our way of life which we can ill afford to destroy.

One of these traditions involves our Nation's long-established acceptance of the fundamental principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty. Another is that not every end justifies any means. These are concepts which are basic to our American heritage. They must, therefore, continue to flourish in all their vigor.

How, then, can we defend America without sacrificing the finest that is American? How, in other words, can we ambush and exterminate the enemy without being caught in our own cross-fire? It is, you will admit, a very ticklish and a very grave problem. It is also one which we must face and solve, one which we must face and solve now.

Happily we have already been successful in establishing several beachheads in this area. These take the form of proposals recently advanced both from within and without the Congress. All of them are designed to enable us to dislodge disloyal elements from the Government without trespassing on the rights of loyal, patriotic American citizens.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE last April introduced in the Senate a bill calling for the establishment of an investigating Commission which would conduct strictly confidential investigations of disloyalty in the Government. This Commission would be composed of 12 members, equally divided between Republicans and Democrats.

Another solution was offered recently by Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS of Utah and myself. Last month Senator THOMAS and I introduced in the Senate a bill which would provide for the creation of special investigating commissions to examine exceptional administrative problems in the executive branch of the Government. Such commissions would be seven-member bodies consisting of two Senators, two Representatives, and three private citizens to be chosen from a bipartisan panel appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. No more than four of the seven members would belong to either of the major political parties.

Both of these proposals are aimed to eliminate communism and corruption from our Government without imperiling in any way our democratic way of life.

The two objectives—the removal once and for all of the sinister and insidious threat to our internal security inherent in international communism and corrupt politics, and the preservation of the rights of the individual—long have been paramount goals of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

This traditional concern of our organization was most eloquently expressed on a recent occasion by Omar B. Ketchum, director of the national legislative service of the VFW.

Testifying last March before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, Mr. Ketchum made the following statement:

"For many years the Veterans of Foreign Wars has concerned itself with the danger to our democratic institutions and our way of life by the constant and continual pressure of the international Communist movement in this country. The Americanism and national security committees of our national conventions for years past have labored over the problem of how to properly defend ourselves from the inroads of this insidious movement and still retain, strong as ever, these fundamental concepts of our bill of rights."

The proposals which I reviewed briefly a moment ago are not, of course, the only ones which have been made in this connection. Others have been advanced—many others. It is reassuring that so much concern is being shown by so many Americans in the solution of this problem.

But the presence of Communists in our governmental agencies is an inevitable consequence of the presence of Communists in our midst.

And no matter how many proposals of how many different kinds are advanced to deal intelligently with this grave threat to our internal security, Communist infiltration into our State and Federal Governments will continue as long as there remains in our society a sufficiently large number of leftist-oriented people to serve as a source for that infiltration.

This fact puts the responsibility for the removal of this danger squarely up to you and me as individual citizens.

As the resolution adopted by the VFW last year at Miami, Fla., to which I earlier referred, and as the statement of Past Commander Ketchum which I just quoted both indicate, organizationally the Veterans of Foreign Wars long has been at the forefront of the attack on communism in this country.

It is, however, as individuals that we—you and I—can be most effective in choking off at the grass roots the pernicious influences of communism.

We can do this in a number of important ways. As voters we must exercise the greatest possible caution in the selection of our governmental officials. As members of our community we must be equally careful and equally selective in our sponsorship and support of civic organizations and civic undertakings. As citizens we must be diligent and thorough in noting and reporting to the proper authorities any evidence we may discover of subversion in public life.

Our greatest responsibility in this regard, however, is to the young people of our communities.

The evil which is communism breeds best among the young. They—our children and our neighbors' children—are the ones most easily enticed by the false glamor of radicalism in any form.

Our young people can be subverted in a great many apparently innocuous ways: By motion pictures they see; organizations they join; newspapers, periodicals and books they read; summer camps they attend; lectures they hear; company they keep—in ways almost without number. No activity in which our Nation's youth now participates can be considered immune from Communist influence, so persistent and so pervasive is that influence today.

This, then, is our particular obligation as individuals—to protect the youth of our communities. No greater challenge lies before us. No greater insurance of our Nation's freedom can be sought.

The war we are waging against communism is a two-front war—domestic and international. And if, at either front, if in Korea or if in our own neighborhood, we allow ourselves to become disunited or divided, we shall collapse as completely as the Third French Republic collapsed before the German invader in 1940.

The fall of France in 1940 is attributable to a good many causes: poor planning on the part of the French general staff, lack of air support for the French ground troops, the surprising ability of the German armored units to skirt the Maginot line, and others. But no single factor contributed more substantially to the defeat of France than the ceaseless and bitter wrangling and strife which enervated French national life during the prewar years.

In our all-out war against communism loyal Americans everywhere must close ranks and stay so. As we strive to fulfill this vital purpose, let there be among us no politics nor personal ambitions nor any other obstacles to block the way.

Both individually and as an organization, we, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, have a reputation for getting things done.

We now have what is perhaps the biggest job of all before us—the job of helping to lead the American people in a completely united assault on the internal and the external Communist menace to our Nation's existence.

Here, indeed, is an unprecedented opportunity to perform an indispensable task. Here, indeed, we can repeat as civilians the magnificent service which the members of our organization rendered our Nation when they were in uniform.

We have never failed in the past. I am confident we shall not fail now.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I should like to read a few portions of that speech, which impresses me very much indeed. I quote briefly the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] in the speech he made on that occasion:

Turning toward Asia, however, where there has been a notable lack of bipartisanship and where partisan politics have so crippled American policy that in effect there has been no policy, what do we find? China securely locked behind the iron curtain; southern Korea—the last continental foothold of freedom in eastern Asia—in very grave jeopardy; Formosa secure only so long as United States naval vessels protect it; a Communist-inspired civil war in French Indochina; civil war in Burma; Communist-directed unrest and rebellion in Thailand, in Malaya, in Indonesia, and even in the Philippine Islands. In short, in Asia we are in what can only be termed an utter mess.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator have in mind that, in connection with the importance of solving the problem of communism domestically, as distinguished from externally, that in event of international conflict in which our country is engaged, if Communists are in the State Department, in the War Department, or elsewhere, in which grave secrets of policy and of plans may exist, there will be a cankerous support within the midst of our country which may involve the disclosure to these people of our plans and thus create not only a national emergency but possibly even national disaster?

Mr. McCARTHY. I heartily agree with the Senator. As I said earlier this afternoon, I feel that the Red planners in the State Department are infinitely more dangerous than Red machine gunners at Suwon. The Red machine gunner can kill hundreds, perhaps thousands; but a Red planner within the State Department can sell out entire nations; and we have seen that done. And to think that we should now keep within the State Department, and put them largely in charge of this new program—and certainly it is a new program, a complete about face in Asia—the new program of now attempting to fight communism over there, this group who have fought that thing, lock, stock, and barrel, to put them in charge of this new program would be almost like unto having the Senator from Missouri in charge of the senatorial campaign of his opponent in Missouri.

As we know, the Acheson-Lattimore-Jessup group took a severe beating when the President made his about face. We know they were temporarily in confusion and consternation. But the forces are being regrouped and, just as certainly as we sit here, their task will now be to sabotage this program, even as they sabotaged—and the record is clear and no one can deny it—even as they sabotaged the program of the Congress when the Congress said, "We will vote $75,000,000," "We will vote $10.000.000," "We will vote $27,000,000 for the defense of Korea." Thinking of course that the money would be used for that purpose. The President signed the bill, and then the State Department got busy so that nothing but a bit of wire went to Korea. As the Senate will recall, when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] some time ago pointed out the necessity of giving some aid to the last sizable anti-Communist army in the East, namely, the army of Chiang Kai-shek, Dean Acheson, in his inimitable fashion, publicly labeled that as some sort of "silly venture." So we now have Acheson and his cohorts largely in charge of the planning of what he has several times labeled "a silly venture." If that venture is to succeed, then the President must put someone in charge who does not consider it to be quite so "silly" a venture.

Let me again quote from the speech by the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] delivered in New York.

He says:

We want no little men with umbrellas, and umbrella minds to boot, conducting our foreign affairs. We want no scraps of paper brought back from distant places and waved in our faces as naive assurance that we are secure from aggression.

Then, going on to another paragraph, he said:

But to avoid war and to avoid surrender we need an Asiatic policy which is permanently strong, permanently definite, and permanently reliable. We need an honest confession of past errors, a frank recognition of present actualities, and a sound formulation of future courses of action.

Then, later on, the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] said:

In this connection I read the following, which should be familiar to some of you:

"Resolved, That we go on record as being totally opposed to the employment or appointment of any individual in any governmental position against whom any justifiable suspicion as to his or her loyalty to the United States may exist; and further be it

"Resolved, That we demand that Congress exert every effort to rid our Government of personnel whose loyalty is questionable."

Then, one further paragraph, again quoting the Senator from New York:

Let me say here and now in this connection that every honest effort to clean up the Amerasia case and to track down every lead regarding subversive activities which had been brought to the attention of the Congress should be supported and continued—without equivocation and without compromise. These tasks must be completed. They must be completed thoroughly; they must be completed effectively; they must be completed to the satisfaction of the American people.

I may say, Mr. President, that I heartily agree with the Senator from New York in that statement, and I compliment him for having made that very, very excellent speech.

WHO'S A "FORMOSA-FIRSTER" NOW, FELLOWS?—ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks an article appearing in today's Washington News, entitled "Who's a 'Formosa-Firster' Now, Fellows?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO'S A "FORMOSA-FIRSTER" NOW, FELLOWS?—SENATOR TAFT IS ENJOYING A LAST LAUGH

(By James Daniel)

Six months ago Senator ROBERT A. TAFT was criticized for suggesting that the United States Navy should patrol the straits of Formosa to prevent a Red invasion of that island from the mainland of China.

The United States do-nothing policy toward Chinese communism was a departure from American foreign policy everywhere else in the world, the Ohio Republican said.

After he said his piece, Senator TAFT began collecting clippings of the harsh things that were said against him. On June 27, when President Truman ordered the United States Navy to guard Formosa, incidental to sending aid to South Korea to repel an invasion, Senator TAFT brought out his souvenirs.

HASN'T EXPLAINED

There was the sarcastic comment from Mr. Truman that he didn't know the Ohio Senator was a military expert. And State Secretary Dean Acheson had spoken of "this distinguished statesman" who is "often in error, but never in doubt."

There was the statement by Senator TOM CONNALLY, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that America had an impregnable line of defense in the Pacific, without Formosa.

Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) called Senator TAFT a "Formosa-firster" and praised Secretary Acheson for his "able enunciation of the administration's realistic Formosa position." ADA said if the "Formosa-firsters believe that propping up a dictatorship on an island outside our main defense line is more important to the United States than nurturing democracy where it has a chance to grow, we demand that they say so publicly." Maybe ADA should now direct the question to Truman instead of TAFT.

UP TO SCHOOLBOYS?

Some Washington newspapers editorially sided with Mr. Acheson against Senator TAFT. For instance:

The Washington Post said Mr. Acheson's reply to Senator TAFT, in a speech to the National Press Club, had "pierced the certitudes which Senator TAFT has imparted into his discussion on far eastern strategy." It said Mr. Acheson was "devastating in his refutation of the thesis that Senator TAFT shares with others that the conduct of our foreign policy should be standardized. A schoolboy, let alone a person of the eminence of Mr. Acheson, could have put up an intelligent case against American adventurism in Formosa." Inasmuch as Mr. Acheson isn't making that case now, perhaps the Post will have to depend on its schoolboys for argument.

The Washington Star called Mr. Acheson's answer to Senator TAFT "brilliant and far-reaching." The Star said it should be "required reading for all Americans who have let their emotions get the better of their heads" over China.

RED AND THE GRAY

To take Senator TAFT's advice on Formosa, the Star said, would be tantamount to what might have been if the British, after the War Between the States, had tried to turn back the tide of history by completely supporting a broken-down, refugee Confederate government in Bermuda.

To the Star's devoted southern readers, this analogy must have been something of a shock. In effect, the Star, which still calls the American Civil War by a euphemism, was asking its readers to accept the view that the China war was just another internal dispute. This time Chiang Kai-shek substituted for the defeated Robert E. Lee and Mao Tse-tung emerged in the role of victorious Abraham Lincoln.

The Communists have been peddling this view of years, with some slight success.

Some columnists were strongly for Mr. Acheson.

Doris Fleeson confided that the Truman doctrine is dead. That, she said, was the true significance of Secretary Acheson's speech.

CATEGORICAL

Miss Fleeson also said it could be "categorically disclosed that (General MacArthur) never considered Formosa as a 'critical' area—which, in military parlance, means one worth the use of force to retain."

Apparently Miss Fleeson failed to categorically disclose it to the general, for he has publicly taken the opposite position.

SPIRITUAL

Without directly alluding to Senator TAFT, columnist Tom Stokes said, "This (the present international contest) is a battle for men's minds and spirits and it can't be won by calling out the Navy and the marines wherever other people are trying to throw off ancient yokes and corrupt regimes."

Having premised his argument on spiritual, as opposed to material grounds, Mr. Stokes quickly disclosed that he is opposed to only one kind of material answer to communism—military force. "For," said he, "the best way to combat communism and Russian imperialism is by raising the economic level" through point 4 and related programs.

Mr. Stokes is a thoroughgoing economic determinist. Had he been alive when the Moors overran Constantinople and stormed the gates of Europe, he probably would have counseled the Pope, the princes, and the people of western Europe to combat Mohammedanism by building TVA's on the Euphrates. And Margaret Truman wouldn't be trying to crash opera today, because she would be in purdah.

MRS. ROOSEVELT, TOO

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt joined Mr. Stokes in viewing Senator TAFT's suggestion that the United States Navy not let the Communists take Formosa as a demand that we uphold Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's government.

"I cannot quite understand that attitude," said Mrs. Roosevelt. "We have given China both money and goods in the past. We also sent one of our top military advisers in the person of General Marshall to try to persuade the Nationalist Government to follow a policy that would give the people of China a feeling that they were all united in a common effort for reform and improvement.

"It is quite evident that all these questions in Asia are basically economic questions and that the people have to feel that a course is being followed that will raise their standard of living and give them something worthwhile to work for. This was not accomplished by the Chinese Nationalist Government. To draw us into the present civil war seems to me no helpful solution to the Chinese problems."

Mrs. Roosevelt is another economic determinist. Had her counsel prevailed in Europe when Mohammedanism seemed as much the wave of the future as Marxism does now, it is not improbable that the outstanding feminist of this generation would be dispensing her advice to the ladies and eunuchs of a seraglio.

LOGICAL LOWELL

To pass on to another columnist:

Lowell Mellett reached back to pre-World War II to cite Senator TAFT's opposition to President Roosevelt's sending troops to Iceland. Mr. Mellett contrasted Senator TAFT's unwillingness to defend Iceland then and his anxiety to defend Formosa now.

"So much for the logic of the Senator's position," Mr. Mellett wrote. "As for its practical aspects it may be true that 'there is not the slightest evidence that Russia will go to war with us because we interfere with a crossing to Formosa.' Russia could be happy to have us do just that. It would help intensify Chinese hatred of America, and help divert attention from Russia's encroachment on Chinese territory."

So much for the logic of Columnist Mellett's position.

SILLY SYMPHONY

The Chicago Journal of Commerce said Senator TAFT and former President Hoover had added their voices to the let's defend Formosa chorus. "To us," said the publication, "it is a silly symphony. The idea that Formosa is strategically vital has little merit."

The Journal of Commerce said it sought no return to Midwestern isolationism, but it saw no point in "traveling 7,000 miles in search of a quarrel."

Without consulting a table of distances, that is probably the length of the United States-to-Korea supply line, over which United States men and materials are traveling to defend this country, and a good part of the world, in a quarrel which American leaders were perilously slow to admit the existence of.

THEIR VIEW ALL ALONG

How have all the people and papers who damned Senator TAFT 6 months ago reacted since President Truman accepted Senator TAFT's advice?

Generally, by pretending that they were all in on this position from the beginning. Nobody has apologized to poor, dumb, old Bob.

There's been no apology from Harry Truman and no explanation from Dean Acheson. The Washington Post, with the wisdom of hindsight, hailed President Truman as having given the "free world the leadership of which yesterday it stood in desperate need."

"TWO DAYS

"It has almost seemed in the last 2 days as if the American people were crying for leadership to call a halt to the backsliding and to state the American position anew."

The Post editorial apeared June 28. From its language it is apparent that the inhabitants of the Post's ivory tower first became conscious that the American people were impatient of backsliding only 2 days before, i. e., June 26.

The Post utterly failed to mention that only 6 months ago it characterized Senator TAFT's suggestion to draw a line in Asia as "adventurism."

"KEY POINT" NOW

The Washington Star had the grace to admit that the decision to defend Formosa was a reversal of policy for President Truman and Secretary Acheson, but not to recall that the Star also was reversed.

Six months ago the Star said that Formosa had very doubtful strategic value. However, Star readers now are advised that "regardless of what may or may not happen to Generalissimo Chiang, Formosa will be one of the key points in the Asiatic defensive line of the United States and the free world as a whole."

The columnists have been falling in.

CONVENIENT FORGETTERY

Mrs. Roosevelt has avoided explaining her stand on Formosa apparently by conveniently forgetting it. She was "very glad when the United Nations called for joint cooperation against Korea." But she quarreled with two unnamed columnists who had suggested that the State Department was taken by surprise by the Korean invasion.

"My own feeling," said Mrs. Roosevelt from Paris, "is that we must have been aware of the activities which must have been going on in northern Korea. But being hopeful that possibly wiser counsel would prevail upon the influences which controlled them in North Korea, we naturally took no action which would have been called aggression."

Mrs. Roosevelt hoped the Soviets would join the other UN members and protect the freedom of South Korea as the UN Security Counsel has requested. They more than anybody else can bring pressure to bear on the Northern Korean armies.

Even as Mrs. Roosevelt hoped, the Russians flatly rejected a United States request to use their influence to end the Korean conflict.

MORE INSIDE DOPE

Doris Fleeson hurried back with more inside dope. This time, she had General MacArthur and other Americans on the scene warning that the Korean situation was deteriorating so fast it would be all over before the United Nations could act.

Miss Fleeson was even able to give the approximate hour when Truman tired of the picture Russia was creating for the world of an indecisive, outfoxed America. It happened between dinner time and 10 p. m. last Monday. By that hour, Miss Fleeson disclosed, "Russian insolence had dissolved the accepted policy of letting the dust settle in Korea."

Tom Stokes settled his personal problem of how to square himself with the new situation by writing a color piece, hitched to a year-old picture of a group of North Korean officials making a grim, familiar pilgrimage to Moscow.

TOM'S RECOLLECTIONS

The old photograph recalled many things to Mr. Stokes that apparently had not occurred to him before—Kaiser Wilhelm, the madman Adolf Hitler, the theatric Mussolini, the poker-faced Jap warlords and now the "dour Joe Stalin and his somber crowd, who plot their plots and push their dupes around the map, like gnomes of evil in a cave."

But Mr. Stokes also recalled that this century has produced "some of history's great idealists—Woodrow Wilson, Lord Cecil, Aristide Briand, Jan Smuts, Franklin D. Roosevelt" and now Harry Truman, "a leader who has dared to stand up and say 'enough' and to put spine into a United Nations that, until now, has been weak and wobbly."

Mr. Stokes had no realistic appraisal to offer of the national and international political pressures which forced Mr. Truman to act when he did (these had been touched on hastily by Miss Fleeson and at length by Marquis Childs). Nor had he any kind words for others in the country who helped put spine into our foreign policy.

But he praised Mr. Truman for his "great gamble" and said, "he has taken his stand—and so have we, come what may."

MELLETT IS ANGRY

Lowell Mellett held his fire until July 4. Then in an appeal for unity at the water's edge he savagely attacked Senator TAFT for his recent suggestion that Mr. Acheson was not the ideal person to administer the new foreign policy. Mr. Mellett also urged a "moratorium" on TAFT speeches and "muzzling" of those who are unsatisfied by the Tydings committee's handling of the Amerasia case.

The Star, rather unkindly, juxtaposed Mr. Mellett's piece with a column by Dottie Thompson, headed "Intelligentsia Act Like Imbeciles in a Crisis."

Bumptious HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, who is the mouthpiece for Americans for Democratic Action in the Senate, rescued that organization from its embarrassing position. Dashing to the forefront of the patriots, Mr. HUMPHREY declared, "The vast majority of Americans support the President and his action in the Korean crisis."

Now a "Korea Firster" of the fustest, Mr. HUMPHREY sagely gave the Senate "my considered judgment that we shall have a plague of these crises, a plague that will be directed and master-minded by the evil men in the Kremlin and in the Politburo."

INFREQUENT CALLING OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, in the light of the world-shaking events which confront us today, what I am about to say, the remarks which I have in mind at the moment, will probably sink into insignificance; but they do affect to a degree the internal functions of the United States Senate. I hope that, because they do, they will not only have the attention of Members of this body who are now present but that they will be carefully considered by Senators who are absent.

These remarks are the result of some considerable time spent on the calendar of the Senate—not too pleasant a duty, to say the least, but a duty which has some real importance in the functions of the legislative processes with respect to what is ordinarily considered minor legislation.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, that I may make a statement of but a sentence or two, by way of comment, at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield gladly to the Senator from Missouri, with the understanding that I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I desire to make but this very brief statement. I am sure some of us have observed—perhaps all of us—with much interest and with real appreciation the fine service that has been rendered by both the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], who, as I understand, have collaborated in connection with calendar matters, on behalf of the minority in the Senate. I take this opportunity of expressing at this point the appreciation of at least one Senator, in which expression I believe many other Senators will join, of the very fine work which has been done and the very important service which in my opinion has been rendered by these two Members of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. President, 6 months have now elapsed since the commencement of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

During that time there have been only four calls of the Consent Calendar. The last two calendar calls were held in June, namely, on June 8 and June 16. The other two were held respectively, on February 1 and on April 19.

A compilation has been made of calendar calls during this Congress and the Republican Eightieth Congress—that famous Eightieth Congress, about which we hear so much. A comparative analysis of such data, which I shall ask to have inserted at the conclusion of my remarks, discloses that while the Senate has been limited thus far during this session to only four calendar calls, there were a total of eight such calls during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, through the month of June 1949.

In the Eightieth Congress, first session, there had been 12 calendar calls by the end of June 1947. During the 5½ months of the second session of the Eightieth Congress, which adjourned sine die on June 19, 1948, there were a total of 16 calendar calls.

It is submitted that the figures which are quoted clearly establish the fact that the lack of frequency and the lack of regularity of calendar calls during this session have had no precedent in the postwar period. Moreover, this lack of frequency and of regularity of calendar calls would seem to violate both the spirit and the letter of our Senate rules with respect to that aspect of its legislative activity.

We find in rule VII, clause 3 of the Standing Rules of the Senate the requirement that—

On Mondays the calendar shall be called under rule VIII.

Rule VIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is no doubt familiar to all Senators, but in the interest of completeness of this presentation, it is set forth herein, as follows:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for 5 minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for concurrent and other resolutions, and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders. But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply (Jefferson's Manual, sec. XIV).

Mr. President, I ask that there be included in the RECORD at this point Senator Hoar's resolution on this subject presented on August 10, 1888.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Hoar submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

"Resolved, That after today, unless otherwise ordered, the morning hour shall terminate at the expiration of 2 hours after the meeting of the Senate" (Senate Journal 1266, 50–1, August 10, 1888).

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Due to the fact that procedure under rule VIII has at times proved somewhat cumbersome, it has become a not unusual practice to have Consent Calendar calls by unanimous-consent agreement rather than under this rule. In this connection, it is interesting to note the comments contained in an article by Robert C. Albright appearing in the Washington Post of Sunday, June 18. These comments high light the fact that nearly all of the major business coming before the Senate is now being done under unanimous-consent agreements fixing the time for voting.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. President, I ask that a copy of that article be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEIGHT OF UNANIMITY

The Senate, for the first time in modern history, is doing practically all of its business by unanimous consent.

Last week, "the world's most deliberative body" hung up a new record in recent years for the number of such agreements in one session.

Between January 3 and June 18, total consent agreements climbed to 15, and the session isn't over. Last year there were only 13, and 11 the year before, after a prior high of 13 in 1946.

The practice is now so much a part of the Senate procedure that leaders are almost powerless to move important legislation without unanimity in advance on a set time for a vote.

Senate Parliamentarian Charles L. Watkins, who entered the Senate Secretary's office in 1914, said consent agreements were a comparatively rarely used device in those days.

Such agreements usually merely limited debate on amendments. Under that arrangement, Senators found it necessary to stick to the floor pretty closely, seldom knowing when the final vote on the bill would come.

The recent trend, however, is to set a fixed time for finally disposing of legislation, providing plenty of advance notice on when the showdown will be. Once a consent agreement is reached, Senators generally disappear from the floor, attend to committee or office business. They even keep out-of-town engagements until the day and hour set for the vote.

Is that progress or retrogression in government?

"I wouldn't know," said Watkins. "My job is parliamentary law and precedents. This is just one of the trends."

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, nevertheless, it appears that calls of the Consent Calendar under rule VIII are by no means archaic. During the Eightieth Congress, there was a total of nine such calls.

During the first session of this Congress, the calendar was called under rule VIII on four occasions. However, calls under the rule have been entirely dispensed with so far during this session.

The point is made that, regardless of whether calendar matters should be disposed of under the rule or by unanimous consent agreement, there can be no legitimate excuse or justification for the condition in which we now find the Consent Calendar of Senate legislative business.

It is true that during June there were two Consent-Calendar calls, but the attention of the Senate is directed to the fact that both of these commenced at the point where the preceding calendar call had ended. Only once during this session has there been a consideration of all measures, from the beginning of the Consent Calendar.

It is believed that there are compelling reasons to justify—indeed, to require—more frequent, more regular, and more complete calls of the calendar, whether under rule VIII or by unanimous-consent procedures.

First. The nonaction or delay of action on measures which are initiated in the Senate results in fewer such measures being enacted into law, to the disadvantage of the Senate in a comparison of its record of legislative activity with that of the House. This follows from the fact that by such delay in the Senate, more House-initiated measures, with respect to which there are Senate companion or similar measures, are finally enacted than would otherwise be the case. We all know, for example, that when a House bill which is the opposite number of a Senate bill reaches our Consent Calendar, it is the usual thing to "postpone indefinitely" the Senate bill and it is the House measure which is passed on to the White House. In such case, it is the bill with the House number, not the bill with the Senate number that becomes law.

Second. A long and cluttered Consent Calendar must inevitably result in inadequate consideration of details that are contained in a great number of important measures which, in a shorter calendar, might be singled out more easily for attention on the part of individual Senators. To indulge the legislative process in such a manner is highly questionable, to say the least.

The importance of this becomes more clearly evident when it is observed that, of a total of 555 measures, not counting simple resolutions, that were passed by the Senate between January 3 and July 3, inclusive, of this year, 492 bills and resolutions, not counting simple resolutions, were passed by unanimous consent during the 4 days that calendar calls were scheduled.

Mr. President, on one of those days the Senate passed more than 200 bills. I submit that it is impossible for a body of this kind properly to consider in 1 day or a part of a day bills in excess of 200 in number.

More regularity and more frequency in Consent Calendar calls would undoubtedly result in greater effectiveness and efficiency in disposing of this workload. It is believed also that there would be an accompanying reduction in the over-all time spent in the handling of these matters.

Third. Probably the most unfortunate result has been that many important and worthy items of legislation now on the calendar—I think this is extremely important—no longer have good prospects of final enactment, or even the chance of House consideration during this Congress, only because they have been reached but once on the calendar and then objected to. Many of such measures had been objected to for further study only. Objection on others can be or has been overcome by agreement to amend in one way or another through agreement reached after the calendar call on which the bill was objected to. It seems highly unfair to penalize such legislation by a procedural procrastination for which there is little, if any, excuse or justification.

Mr. President, in the development of these remarks I have consulted with the other members of the Republican Calendar Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] and the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL]. They agree wholeheartedly that we should do something about the calendar procedure to the end that it will not serve at times as a bottleneck to the more important legislation of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be included at this point in my remarks a schedule of calls of the calendar for the Eightieth Congress, both sessions, and for the Eighty-first Congress, both sessions, to July 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the schedule was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friday, June 16, 1950.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I am glad to take this opportunity to say that I agree entirely and wholeheartedly with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] has said about the work of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], and the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] have done in connection with the calendar of the Senate. We on this side of the aisle have a great deal of confidence in their careful study and presentation of these matters, the business on the calendar. The Senator from New Jersey called attention to the Eightieth Congress. I agree with him that the record of the Eightieth Congress was good.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. And I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If my memory serves me aright, I think that on the calls of the calendar in the Eightieth Congress we did not go back to a date prior to that on which the calendar was last called. Except for that point, I agree with what the Senator has said. I believe there is some question as to how much value there is in going back more than several times during the year.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. The value lies in the fact, as I said before, that bills are on the calendar which are objected to sometimes merely for the purpose of giving Senators an opportunity for further study. If we do not go back on the calendar, the study which has been made in such instances never comes to light, and the bill dies. Such procedure is not in the interest of good legislation.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I gladly yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I think what the Senator from New Jersey has said is correct. On the other hand, we build up a body of bills which can be considered only with full debate, and the procedure involving them can be had only by motion of the majority leader.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. It would be easy enough to arrange a unanimous-consent agreement that on a certain day the Senate would take up bills from the beginning of the calendar to a certain date or calendar number. Mr. President, I plead with the leadership in the Senate, both the majority and the minority, to use their very best efforts to the end that the handling of the business of the calendar may be expedited in the future.

CLOTURE PETITION ON FEPC BILL

Mr. MYERS and Mr. DONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. I was about to move that the Senate recess, but I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. I have some remarks which will probably take 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator yield for 1 minute?

Mr. DONNELL. I am glad to yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to make a brief statement of my position on the cloture petition which is being circularized in the Senate with regard to the FEPC bill. I think it is well known that I favor the FEPC bill. I do not favor, Mr. President, signing a cloture petition in advance of a filibuster, because I think it is a misuse of the Senate's cloture rule. I think the cloture rule is on the books of the Senate as a device for stopping a filibuster once it has started. I am fully appreciative of the fact that my refusal to sign the cloture petition may be misunderstood.

However, I am a strict adherent, when it comes to carrying out the spirit and the intent of the rules of the Senate. I believe the time to circularize a cloture petition is after there has been evidence on the floor of the Senate that a filibuster is actually in progress. At the present time we are in the position of being asked to abuse the cloture rule of the Senate by signing a petition to stop debate on a measure in regard to which there is at the moment no filibuster in progress. Therefore, Mr. President, I refused to sign the petition today. I shall sign a cloture petition to get a vote on the FEPC bill if and when a filibuster actually starts on the floor of the Senate. I do not think those who are pressing the cloture petition are in a very sound position to say to me, as they have said to me today, "Well, you can be sure that there will be a filibuster." I shall cross that bridge when I come to it. When a filibuster starts, and only then, shall I sign a cloture petition.

Mr. President, while I am discussing this particular matter I should like to say that it is all an empty gesture anyway. We will not get a vote on the substance of the FEPC so long as the Wherry resolution constitutes the rule of the Senate in regard to the ending of a filibuster by means of cloture. I would much rather see the Senate proceed with the immediate issue and the handling of the filibuster problem by repealing the Wherry resolution and adopting a cloture rule which we know would work. I am not interested in advance of a campaign in making a great, grand political gesture to the minority groups of the country in regard to civil rights by taking up one issue, and perhaps on the basis of some cloture arrangement, go through the manipulations and gesture of coming to a vote on a part of the civil-rights program. I am for the civil-rights program. In my judgment, other Senators who are for the civil-rights program ought to be in favor of the repeal of the Wherry resolution and the adoption of a cloture rule which would really make it possible to apply cloture in the Senate and assure the passage of a civil-rights program.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, from day to day I have attempted to emphasize the importance, as I see it, of the passage by the Congress of a bill, S. 3463, which, if enacted into law, would make unlawful any strike or any lock-out by carrier arising out of or in connection with a dispute falling within the purview of the Railway Labor Act.

In the course of my observations, and as illustrative of the importance of the enactment of such a provision of law, I have from day to day reported something of the progress of the strike which is now under way against five of the midwestern and western railroads. At this late hour, Mr. President, I deem the matter of sufficient importance to trespass upon the patience of the Presiding Officer and the Members of the Senate who are theoretically in attendance to place in the RECORD some material showing the existing conditions growing out of the strike.

I hold in my hand an article appearing in this morning's Washington Post entitled "Truman Hope for Rail Strike End Reported."

I read from the article as follows:

CHICAGO, July 5.—President Truman was reported as hopeful of a break in the railroad strike, but it didn't come today.

A spokesman for the striking A. F. of L. Switchmen's Union said, "We met with the National (Railway) Mediation Board, but we made no appreciable progress."

Earlier today, Senator DARBY, Republican of Kansas, after a conference with the President in Washington, said he is hopeful the strike is near the end. He said Mr. Truman told him "everything possible is being done" and that the President is hopeful of developments which will be good news.

Some 4,000 switchmen walked out June 25 on five western and midwestern railroads, demanding a 40-hour work week at 48 hours pay. A Presidential fact-finding board had recommended a 40-hour week for them and for 75,000 other yard workers but at a wage increase of only 18 cents an hour.

Mr. President, we have the benefit of a ticker news service in the Senate, and I hold in my hand several ticker reports of today which I should like to read into the RECORD, as showing the progress in this matter. The first of these ticker reports is under date of today at 11:01 a. m. It reads as follows:

President Truman said he hopes striking switchmen on five western railroads will go back to work before he has to take drastic action.

The President said at his weekly news conference that the strike is not justified. He said it must be ended in order to move wheat crops and cattle in the midwest.

I digress, Mr. President, to emphasize the correctness of this statement by the President as to the situation with reference to the wheat crops and cattle in the midwest.

The ticker tape statement continues:

The President denied, however, that the strike, which began June 24, is crippling shipment of war goods destined for Korea. It is a domestic matter only, Mr. Truman said.

The President was asked whether he considers the strike serious enough for him to seek seizure of the roads in the courts or to go to Congress with a speech about it.

He replied that the delay to movement of wheat and cattle is reason enough for drastic action. But he declined to predict what course he will take if the strikers do not return to work.

Mr. Truman said the strike was brought about by a very small minority of switchmen and that the men ought to go back to work at once.

While not commenting on the proposal of a 40-hour week and an 18-cent hourly wage increase submitted by his fact-finding board, Mr. Truman did say that the board was a very able one. The union is reported to be asking for the 40-hour week, in contrast to the present 48 hours, and a 31-cent-an-hour wage increase.

The railroads involved are the Denver Rio Grande, Great Northern, Western Pacific, Chicago Great Western, and Rock Island.

The President also was asked whether the switchmen should return to work as a patriotic duty or primarily to carry out the provisions of the Railway Labor Act. Mr. Truman replied that they should return in compliance with the act. He said doing so is their patriotic duty.

Then, Mr. President, the second of the ticker tape articles to which attention is directed is a much shorter one, at 12:56 p. m. today:

President Truman created a three-man emergency board to investigate a dispute between the Pullman Co. and the Order of Railway Conductors.

I digress to call attention to the fact that this is not the dispute in which the switchmen are engaged, but is another dispute, one between the Pullman Co. and the Order of Railway Conductors. I continue reading:

The order said that the dispute, in the judgment of the National Mediation Board, "threatened substantially to interrupt interstate commerce to a degree such as to deprive the country of essential transportation service."

By saying that this is a different dispute, I do not mean to indicate what the points of disagreement are. They may be the same as those involved in the switchmen's strike; I do not know. The importance of this dispatch is that the President himself quotes the Mediation Board to the effect that another dispute, in addition to the one now being contested in the switchmen's strike, "threatened substantially to interrupt interstate commerce to a degree such as to deprive the country of essential transportation service."

Mr. President, to my mind this is a very striking illustration, coming from the lips of the Chief Executive of the Nation, of the importance of early enactment into law of a provision making unlawful a strike arising out of or in connection with a dispute falling within the purview of the Railway Labor Act.

The third of the items appearing upon the ticker tape of today is a little later in the afternoon, at 1:44 p. m., and reads:

Federal mediators, armed with President Truman's threat of drastic action, intensified efforts today to settle the 12-day-old switchmen's strike against five major railroads.

I pause to comment upon the fact that the strike has existed so many days, as is indicated in this ticker-tape dispatch. It was suggested in the course of the testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, by one of the eminent witnesses representing the views of labor, that it is inconceivable that a strike of general extent throughout the country would exist over a period of time which would constitute a grave national emergency. But here we have it, on five railroads, extending over approximately 21,000 miles of railroad, or, if we leave out the Great Northern, as to which the service has not been completely suspended, involving 12,000 miles upon the remaining four railroads. We find that that strike has already lasted since a week ago last Sunday.

Continuing, the dispatch says:

Francis O'Neill, member of the National Railway Mediation Board, said the President's statement in Washington earlier today throws an entirely new light on the situation.

O'Neill hinted he is expecting a telephone call from Washington concerning the settlement efforts. Asked if he expects a break soon, he said:

"You can't tell. Sometimes these things end in a hurry."

He said, however, that he has no immediate plans for a joint conference between union and railroad negotiators. Such a conference presumably would have to be held before any settlement could be reached.

O'Neill said he was trying to arrange separate talks with each side, but had not been able to contact President Arthur Glover of the union.

The final one of the ticker-tape references of today that I have seen—I know of none later—is at 1:45, from Duluth, and is of quite a reassuring nature, in view of what we have previously heard. This is with respect to the shipments of iron ore. I can see the look of interest on the face of the present Presiding Officer, the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], as I refer to this ticker tape. It reads:

DULUTH, MINN.—Shipment of Minnesota iron ore has been slowed only slightly by the A. F. of L. switchmen's strike, rail and mining officials report.

They said most of the tonnage usually carried by the Great Northern Railroad from the iron range to ore docks at Duluth and Superior, Wis., was diverted to other carriers.

I trust that we shall find that the views so expressed are borne out as the days go on.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there is at least room for very serious inquiry, as time passes, as to the effect of this strike in regard to iron ore.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Dallas Wall Street Journal of June 27, 1950, the headline of which reads:

Serious Iron Ore Shortage Threatened by Rail Switchmen's Strike on Western Roads. Mesabi Range Shipments Cut; Four Lines Lay Off About 40,000 Workers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this entire article be set forth in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SERIOUS IRON ORE SHORTAGE THREATENED BY RAIL SWITCHMEN'S STRIKE ON WESTERN ROADS—MESABI RANGE SHIPMENTS CUT; FOUR LINES LAY OFF ABOUT 40,000 WORKERS

CHICAGO.—Serious curtailments in iron ore shipments from the Mesabi range have been forced by the 2-day-old strike of 4,000 A. F. of L. switchmen against five western and midwestern railroads.

The Great Northern Railway Co., of St. Paul, which normally hauls about one-third the total tonnage at Lake Superior iron-ore mines, is understood to have been unable to continue freight service in the area. The road normally hauls about 900,000 gross tons of iron ore a week. Relatively little of this can be carried by other roads.

If the Great Northern's operations in Montana are halted by the strike, it also may affect seriously the movement of copper and zinc from Anaconda Copper Mining Co.'s refineries at Great Falls. The Great Northern is one of the principal roads serving these refineries. The copper refinery has an annual capacity of 150,000 tons and the electrolytic zinc plant at Great Falls has a yearly rated output of 165,000 tons, and another zinc plant at Anaconda a capacity of 75,000 tons.

The curtailments come in the face of very serious shortages of iron-ore inventories, according to the Lake Superior Iron Ore Association. The association declares that because of ice conditions, ore shipments on Lake Superior were delayed one month this year. As of June 19, according to the association, shipments were 11,340,000 gross tons behind the like 1949 period, while inventories to June 1 at furnaces on lower lake docks were 7,124,000 tons behind inventories on June 1, 1949.

At St. Paul, a spokesman for the railroad said the Great Northern still was operating some of its freight services in other areas and all its principal passenger services. The Great Northern is the only one of the five struck roads still operating. "We'll continue operating as long as we can," Charles Moore, assistant to the president, declared.

The Great Northern's 1,200 switchmen are represented by the striking Switchmen's Union of North America.

Meanwhile, the four other roads have laid off about 40,000 employees since Sunday.

The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., biggest of the struck roads, reported it laid off 21,000 of its 22,500 employees Sunday noon. The road hasn't operated a freight or passenger train on any of its 8,000 miles of road since the Imperial arrived in Chicago from Los Angeles at 4:35 p. m., Sunday.

The Chicago Great Western Railway Co. reported it laid off 3,500 of its 3,800 employees Sunday, when it curtailed all passenger and freight service. The other two roads also, curtailed all service on Sunday. They are the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Co. and the Western Pacific Railroad Co.

Other railroads which expect to gain some of the traffic lost by struck roads include the Burlington, Santa Fe, Gulf, Mobile & Ohio, Illinois Central, Milwaukee, North Western and other western and midwestern carriers.

The striking switchmen are seeking a 40-hour week with 48 hours' pay. In effect, that's a 31-cents-an-hour pay boost. The railroads are willing to grant a 40-hour week, but refuse to boost the switchmen's pay more than the 18 cents an hour recommended by a Presidential fact-finding board.

The striking switchmen represent a minority of switchmen employed on the country's railroads. Most switchmen belong to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. The brotherhood has been seeking a similar pay boost. So has the Order of Railway Conductors.

Federal Mediator Francis A. O'Neill, chairman of the National Railway Mediation Board, has asked members of all three unions to be available today for discussions. Mr. O'Neill may meet with the unions together or separately, but efforts are expected to be made today to end the old strike, as well as avert a strike for the same demands by the trainmen and conductors.

The five struck roads employ a total of about 64,500 persons. A spokesman for the railroads said the striking switchmen's union represents only 3,100 switchmen on these roads, rather than the 4,000 claimed by the union.

Eastern railroads reported that freight traffic from the West was coming through without difficulty, despite the strike of the five western roads. The freight was being diverted to other western carriers.

So far as passenger movement was concerned, the Pennsylvania and New York Central reported the dropping of the two through cars to the Pacific Coast which they alternately operate every day to Chicago. One of these cars goes to Los Angeles in the Golden State via the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and Southern Pacific. The other goes to San Francisco in the California Zephyr via the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, Denver & Rio Grande Western and Western Pacific.

No shortage of cars due to those being tied up in yards of struck roads is likely, a spokesman for the Rock Island said. He added: "We endeavored to get our cars on to operating lines before the strike. We are in the process of making a count now of the cars in our yards, but I doubt if it will be more than 50 percent of the cars we would normally have on our lines."

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I shall take the liberty of reading just a portion of the article, to make specific comment and to make specific emphasis with reference to it. The article, dated Chicago, in the issue of the Dallas Wall Street Journal of June 27, 1950, reads:

Serious curtailments in iron ore shipments from the Mesabi range have been forced by the 2-day-old strike of 4,000 A. F. of L. switchmen against five western and midwestern railroads.

I have in my hand a very interesting editorial from the Evening World Herald of Omaha, Nebr., appearing in the issue of June 30, 1950. It is entitled "A 'Model' No More," and deals with the National Railway Labor Act of 1926 and 1934. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be incorporated at this point of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A "MODEL" NO MORE

The National Railway Labor Act of 1926 and 1934 used to be held up as a model.

Under this act, the President first has the right to postpone any rail strike. Next, he is authorized to appoint a fact-finding board of three (usually made up of Federal or State judges and economists) to inquire into the dispute.

The theory of the act is that once the facts have been found by an impartial tribunal, and all the factors on both sides weighed, it should not be hard for reasonable men to come to an agreement. For years the theory worked well in practice. Railway labor disputes were generally settled on the basis of the recommendations of fact-finding boards.

Recently, however, this concept of the act has been rudely shattered. In a dispute over a union demand for extra firemen on Diesel engines, a fact-finding board found against the union. So the union simply rejected the findings in toto and went on strike. After 6 days, bowing to public opinion, the union called off that strike.

Now, in precisely the same circumstances, comes the strike of the Switchmen's Union of North America, an A. F. of L. affiliate.

The Switchmen's Union is a relatively small group. It represents only 5 percent of the switchmen employed by American railroads—the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen represents the remaining 95 percent. Rivalry between the two unions, and the yearning of the switchmen's leaders to show up the bigger BRT, is said to have had a good deal to do with what has been going on.

The Switchmen's Union demanded a cut in the workweek from 6 days to 5. It also demanded 6 days' pay for 5 days' work—a raise equivalent to 31 cents an hour.

The Presidential fact-finding board held that the cut to 5 days' work was justified, but it held that the 31-cent boost was not. Among other things, the board held, such an increase would give the switchmen an unfair pay advantage over other railroad employees. The board recommended an increase of 18 cents an hour.

Emulating the enginemen, the switchmen summarily rejected facts not to their liking, and last Sunday went out on strike. To avoid Government seizure, they did not strike all of the railroads involved but only five—the Rock Island, the Great Western, the Denver & Rio Grande, the Great Northern, and the Western Pacific.

All of the five roads are now shut down except the Great Northern. And on this road, even though only 60 employees belong to the switchmen's union, operations have been curtailed.

Omaha is directly affected. The Rock Island and the Great Western both run here. In the case of the Rock Island, the shut-down is especially serious, since it normally hauls much grain from Kansas to the Omaha market, and the grain run is now beginning. The Burlington is affected by th shut-downs of its western connections, the Denver & Rio Grande and the Western Pacific; some trains have been canceled.

The switchmen may give way to public opinion as the enginemen did, but the prospects for that are dim. A small union, glimpsing glory and new members, it seems inclined to push its luck. Moreover, the whole trend in railway labor relations is toward turmoil. There is talk of strikes by firemen, trainmen, and conductors, by the larger switchmen's group, by yardmasters, by Pullman conductors.

Believing that the Railway Labor Act has broken down, Senator DONNELL, of Missouri, has introduced a bill in Congress calling for compulsory arbitration of railway labor disputes. The unions are opposed to it. The railroads have endorsed it reluctantly.

Reluctant they may well be, for under such a law the railroads, in effect, will have turned over control of their operations to the United States Government.

Still, what else is there to do, when 4,000 switchmen, scattered over the country, can shut down vast transportation systems and cause damage that will run into the millions? Somehow the public must be protected against such irresponsible action.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I call attention specifically to a portion of the article. One paragraph reads:

The Switchmen's Union is a relatively small group.

I pause, Mr. President, to state again for the RECORD that it is the switchmen's union which is conducting the existing strike on the five railroads to which I have referred. Continuing, the editorial says:

It represents only 5 percent of the switchmen employed by American railroads—the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen represents the remaining 95 percent.

Mr. President, then I call attention to a most interesting sentence in this editorial:

Rivalry between the two unions and the yearning of the switchmen's leaders to show up the bigger BRT, is said to have had a good deal to do with what has been going on.

The public is not particularly concerned, I would say, as to which union it is which should have precedence over the other. Yet if this editorial writer is correct, the interest of the public seems to be disregarded because of the consideration of precedence one over the other.

Somewhat further on in the editorial are these observations:

Believing that the Railway Labor Act has broken down—

I pause to say that a reference will be made in a moment to the present speaker. I do not say that the Railway Labor Act has broken down. I think the Railway Labor Act has much to commend it, and I think it is still capable of much effectiveness. But I do think there is a defect in the railway labor law which is powerful in its impact on the Nation, and is a defect which can only be remedied, as I see it, by the enactment of legislation of the type of Senate bill 3463.

I repeat from this editorial:

Believing that the Railway Labor Act has broken down, Senator DONNELL, of Missouri, has introduced a bill in Congress calling for compulsory arbitration of railway-labor disputes. The unions are opposed to it. The railroads have endorsed it reluctantly.

Reluctant they may well be, for under such a law the railroads, in effect, will have turned over control of their operations to the United States Government.

Still, what else is there to do, when 4,000 switchmen, scattered over the country, can shut down vast transportation systems and cause damage that will run into the millions? Somehow the public must be protected against such irresponsible action.

I am not undertaking to agree with every observation in this editorial, with respect to my bill or with respect to my views. But I do say that the writer of the editorial in emphasizing the point that the public somehow must be protected against such irresponsible action has put his finger upon the vital point at this time in the railway industry.

Mr. President, I have in my hand also an article from this morning's New York Herald Tribune, which emphasizes the effect of the railway strike on the wheat situation. That comes quite closely home to both Senators from Minnesota, and to Senators particularly from Kansas, Nebraska and the Dakotas, and we even have some wheat in Missouri. The heading of the article is:

Rail strike slashes wheat shipments.

Then a further heading:

No progress reported in talks; Truman hopeful.

CHICAGO, July 5.—A strike of 4,000 A. F. of L. switchmen against five western railroads cut sharply into wheat and beef shipments today as conflicting statements on negotiations to end the strike were reported.

I desire to point out particularly that not only is wheat affected, but shipments of beef are affected, and the Senate will note in a moment a further statement in this article with respect to cattle. I continue to read:

Federal mediators here said "no progress" was made in the negotiations, but it was reported in Washington that President Truman is hopeful of a quick settlement.

Senator HARRY DARBY, Republican, of Kansas, said President Truman is "hopeful for developments soon" in the strike against the five roads. Senator DARBY visited Mr. Truman because Kansas wheat is now being threshed and 400,000 head—

Mark that figure, Mr. President—

400,000 head of cattle are ready for shipment.

Can there be any doubt as to the vital nature of this strike, as to the fact that it is—not using the word with any sense of punning—striking directly at the welfare of great areas of the country, if not the entire Nation?

Continuing, the article says:

Federal mediators met separately with each side in the dispute today after bringing them together with face-to-face bargaining yesterday for the first time since the strike started 11 days ago. Francis O'Neill, of the National (railway) Mediation Board, said there was no "indication of progress."

The union is demanding a 40-hour week with no cut in pay from the rate for 48 hours.

I mentioned on the floor a few days ago something about the Lorain tube mill tie-up in Ohio. I have in my hand an article from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of June 28. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be incorporated at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRAINMEN END LORAIN TUBE MILL TIE-UP

LORAIN, OHIO, June 27.—Striking members of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen of the Lake Terminal Railroad here began returning to work at 6 tonight but operations at the giant National Tube Co. plant here, which had made about 12,000 persons idle, continued to remain at a virtual standstill, company officials announced.

About 100 of the 350 rail unionists who stopped work on the 41-mile railroad late yesterday afternoon, which resulted in the lay-off of the steelworkers in this city's largest industrial plant, returned to work after it was announced that further negotiations on their 40-hour-week issue would be resumed tomorrow.

"The men started returning to work and all will be back on the job by tomorrow, while negotiations continue on the strike issue," said G. B. Weir, Lake Terminal superintendent here.

NOT IN A MOMENT'S NOTICE

Robert Urquhart, general superintendent of the National Tube plant, declared tonight that plant operations and the blast furnaces were down completely and that the coke plant was operating on a reduced schedule.

"A huge plant like this cannot close down and then get back into production in a moment's notice," Urquhart said. "It will take time, just how much I cannot say at present."

The strike came only 5 days before the mill was to have begun a 2-week general shut-down to give workers their annual vacation period.

Urquhart said he was not sure now what the status of the vacation shut-down was.

Tomorrow's meeting is scheduled for 10 a. m. in the Lake Terminal offices between D. T. Hastings, of Pittsburgh, vice president of the Lake Terminal; J. P. Cahill, of Cleveland, an official of the railroad union; J. K. Jones, of this city, the union chairman here, and Weir.

National Tube makes seamless pipe and billets. It is United States Steel's largest subsidiary. The weekly payroll at the plant is about $624,000. Although most of its employees live in Lorain, many are from Elyria and other nearby towns.

Lorain's total population now is 50,810.

The Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen members' strike was in protest to recent recommendations of a Presidential fact-finding board, according to Earl B. Welcome, deputy president of the railroad union.

The Board had recommended an 18-cent-an-hour wage boost on a 40-hour week for yard workers. The unions wanted 48-hours' pay for a 40-hour week.

Mr. DONNELL. The early portion of the article indicates the grave situation which had developed in this town of Lorain, Ohio.

Striking members of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen of the Lake Terminal Railroad here began returning to work at 6 tonight but—

I call attention to the word "but"— but operations at the giant National Tube Co. plant here, which had made about 12,000 persons idle, continued to remain at a virtual standstill, company officials announced.

Of course, the Lake Terminal Railroad is not one of those involved in this particular strike, that is to say it is not one of the five western or midwestern railroads. Then, I call attention to the fact that in the article from the Cleveland Plain Dealer, from which I have read, appears the following:

The B. of R. T. members' strike was in protest to recent recommendations of a Presidential fact-finding board, according to Earl B. Welcome, deputy president of the railroad union.

The board had recommended an 18-cents-an-hour wage boost on a 40-hour week for yard workers. The unions wanted 48 hours' pay for a 40-hour week.

The Presiding Officer will observe that this is the dispute which today prevails between the switchmen and the railroads.

Mr. President, I want to point out a few words here from Mr. Robert Urquhart, general superintendent of the National Tube plant at Lorain, Ohio, as those remarks are set forth in the article. I read from the article, as follows:

Robert Urquhart, general superintendent of the National Tube plant, declared tonight—

That was on June 27—

that plant operations and the blast furnaces were down completely and that the coke plant was operating on a reduced schedule.

Then comes this very interesting and important remark:

"A huge plant like this cannot close down and then get back into production in a moment's notice," Urquhart said. "It will take time; just how much, I cannot say at present."

Further down in the article appears the following:

National Tube makes seamless pipe and billets. It is United States Steel's largest subsidiary. The weekly payroll at the plant is about $624,000.

So, we see, Mr. President, something of the ramifications of this strike which is occurring upon the western and midwestern railroads, and the effect that this particular sympathetic action taken by the B. of R. T. has been having upon this great industry in the town of Lorain, the population of which is 50,810, according to this article.

However, the impact of the strike is not confined alone to the places I have mentioned. I hold in my hand an article that appeared in the Amarillo (Tex.) Times, in its issue of June 27, 1950. The heading of the article is: "Impact of rail strike felt here."

The article tells of the full impact of the switchmen's strike. I read from the article:

Full impact of the switchmen's strike against Rock Island Railroad was being felt in Amarillo Monday as an estimated 200 employees became idle.

Two hundred employees would not seem to be a very great number; but I call attention to this interesting statement, appearing near the conclusion of the article:

Only 12 members of the striking switchmen's union are employed in the Amarillo yards. But the dispute affects at least 600 Amarillo workers and their families.

In other words, only 2 percent of the persons affected in Amarillo are members of the striking switchmen's union, but the other 98 percent are affected, as indicated in the article.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article from the Amarillo Times be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPACT OF RAIL STRIKE FELT HERE

Full impact of the switchmen's strike against Rock Island Railroad was being felt in Amarillo Monday as an estimated 200 employees became idle.

Mechanics worked Monday, putting equipment in mothballs to wait out the strike, and are scheduled for lay off on Tuesday. Engines, and tank, freight and passenger cars were parked at the yards on Northeast Third Street after all operations of the railroad ceased.

The company ordered a shutdown following the strike of switchmen at 6 a. m. Sunday. The unionists are seeking to force a slash of their 48-hour workweek down to 40 hours, at no reduction in pay. The request amounts to demand for an 18-cent per hour wage boost.

Rail officials said Monday they have no knowledge of any picketing around Amarillo properties of the Rock Island, but described the current situation as one of potential picketing.

The shutdown order by Rock Island's president apparently precluded any need for placard bearers.

The 6 a. m. Sunday deadline found a relatively low amount of equipment in Amarillo. During the week prior to the strike, much equipment was moved out to larger terminal points.

A number of cold engines, a pair of Diesel locomotives, and various other items of rolling stock stood around the yards in orderly arrangement, however, waiting the result of negotiations which apparently have yet to begin.

The last train into Amarillo was the crack No. 51 from Memphis, Tenn., which arrived an hour after the strike deadline. Its passengers were sent on along other rail lines and by transfers to bus lines. The transfers and required rerouting were accomplished with little delay.

Most employees worked Sunday to put the equipment away in safe order before leaving their posts.

After Monday, only a few officials are to be on duty in Amarillo, their work concerned chiefly in looking after the lines' properties.

Only 12 members of the striking switchmen's union are employed in the Amarillo yards. But the dispute affects at least 600 Amarillo workers and their families.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Chicago Journal of Commerce in its issue of yesterday, July 5, contains an exceedingly important article which has the headline: "United States refocusing attention on new rail strike peril."

I call attention to the word "new" in the headline. The reference there is not to strike now in progress, but to a new strike.

The article reads in part as follows:

Federal mediators yesterday focused attention on the threatened strike after July 15 of 250,000 conductors, trainmen, and yardmasters—

In other words, a quarter of a million persons—indicating that hope is waning for quick settlement of the switchmen's strike against five western railroads.

No new conferences with representatives of the Switchmen's Union of North America were scheduled.

Some progress was reported in negotiations between carriers and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and the Order of Railway Conductors. Details were not disclosed.

Observers believe intention may be to seek settlement of the major dispute and to use it as a pattern for settling the switchmen's strike. Hope for heading off the July 15 strike is strengthened by the belief trainmen and conductors may be reluctant to create a national emergency at this time through a country-wide strike.

All unions in the disputes are seeking a reduction in the workweek to 40 hours with retention of 48-hour pay.

That is the controversy which is involved in the switchmen's strike, and it is the controversy in which the other great unions are interested, and as to which the prospective labor disturbance is ahead of us.

Mr. President, the Pensacola (Fla.) Journal, in its edition of June 30, 1950, carries an editorial entitled: "Railroad Shutdown."

The opening several sentences of the editorial read as follows:

A great portion of the country is beginning to suffer from another railroad strike which eventually will affect the Nation. Four thousand switchmen have quit, tying up four railroads and hampering another.

The writer of the editorial very aptly says:

The trouble about such strikes is that not only the union men themselves and the railroads suffer losses, but many persons and businesses not involved also suffer. As in the other railroad, steel, and coal strikes, thousands were thrown out of work because of them and many factories had to close. This is a terrible economic loss to the Nation and an unnecessary inconvenience to the public.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAILROAD SHUTDOWN

A great portion of the country is beginning to suffer from another railroad strike which eventually will affect the Nation. Four thousand switchmen have quit, tying up four railroads and hampering another.

The trouble about such strikes is that not only the union men themselves and the railroads suffer losses, but many persons and businesses not involved also suffer. As in the other railroad, steel, and coal strikes, thousands were thrown out of work because of them and many factories had to close. This is a terrible economic loss to the Nation and an unnecessary inconvenience to the public.

The switchman strike probably will result in little good which could not have been accomplished by negotiation and continued public service. The workers want to cut their work from 48 to 40 hours a week without a cut in their pay of $78.35 a week, which seems a little unreasonable.

An arbitration board favored the 40-hour week with an 18-cent-an-hour raise. The union plan called for a 31-cent-an-hour raise, or from $13.06 to $15.67 a shorter workweek and given them more than half the pay raise they asked, which seemed fair. The strike will probably cost them more than they gain if they gain anything at all over and above the arbitration award.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, finally, I hold in my hand an editorial from the Indianapolis News of June 27. The editorial is entitled "Another Rail Strike." I likewise ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER RAIL STRIKE

When 4,000 switchmen walked out Sunday to tie up four western railroads and throw 35,000 other employees out of work, it became clearer than ever that the Railway Labor Act is failing in its purpose. It no longer assures sound management-labor relations nor protects the public against disastrous stoppages of freight and passenger service.

In the last 4 years labor relations in the industry have steadily deteriorated; there have been three major strikes in that time—the most recent being the critical 6-day tie-up of four major lines by the firemen and enginemen.

As in most disagreements, both sides undoubtedly have had justified grievances. On the union's side, it must be granted that railroad management has never been noted for progressive attitudes or a receptiveness to new ideas.

On the other hand, the unions would have a hard time justifying—in the public's mind at least—their reported make-work demands. The most flagrant example of featherbedding in recent years, of course, was the firemen's insistence, in the face of two fact-finding boards' denials, that an extra man was needed on Diesel engines.

But regardless of who should accept the most blame, the public must be protected against future paralyzing strikes. Besides the present strike of switchmen, there is the uncomfortable prospect that the yardmasters and the conductors and trainmen may walk out next.

In fairness to the public and its dependence on this basic part of our national transportation system, a growing number of citizens believe compulsory arbitration should be adopted in railroad disputes.

The right to strike is a precious one, but is it justified when thousands, perhaps millions, of innocent persons are inconvenienced, when the health and business life of entire communities may be endangered?

A bill in Congress would amend the Railroad Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration. Both parties in a dispute would be bound by the recommendations of fact-finding boards, unless set aside by Federal courts.

This may not be the perfect answer to the present upheavals on the railroads, but at least it would protect the public interest. And that, after all, is the paramount issue.

Mr. DONNELL. The concluding two paragraphs of the editorial are, I think, of especial interest, in view of the pendency of Senate bill 3463. They read as follows:

A bill in Congress would amend the Railway Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration. Both parties in a dispute would be bound by the recommendations of fact-finding boards, unless set aside by Federal courts.

This may not be the perfect answer to the present upheavals on the railroads, but at least it would protect the public interest. And that, after all, is the paramount issue.

So, Mr. President, with this recital of conditions as nearly up to date as I am able to give the Senate this evening, I conclude these remarks.

Let me say only this, in final observation: All the strikes I have mentioned—the strike now in progress; the strikes which we are informed are likely to occur in the future; the strike which occurred about a month ago; the strike on the Missouri Pacific Railroad, lasting for 45 days—6 weeks and 3 days—the strike on the Wabash Railroad, and the other strikes I have mentioned, which threaten or which have threatened, are illustrations of the fact that, as is recited in the editorial to which I have just referred, the public interest, which is the paramount issue, needs protection.

Mr. President, I submit that Senate bill 3463, the measure now before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, would provide adequate protection for the public interest.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

CONSTRUCTION OF HOSPITAL, BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, in the Ninth District of Alabama, which I represent in Congress, there will be a demonstration on next Tuesday, July 11, of how we do things in the tradition of the South. On that date we will hold a good-will day to raise the funds needed to build in Birmingham a hospital for the exclusive use of Negro patients.

Heading this appeal will be a prominent industrialist who is a leading Methodist layman. His cochairman is a Jewish department-store owner. The hospital will be operated by the Catholic Sisters of Charity of Nazareth. Active coworkers in the fund-raising drive include a number of organized labor leaders of both the CIO and the A. F. of L., heads of practically all local industries, educators, ministers, physicians, public officials, and women civic leaders. Negro groups are also engaged in the fund-raising effort. I am proud to call the attention of the Congress and the entire Nation to this united effort which illustrates what many people outside the South fail to understand; that is, that we are working in a constructive way to take care of our own problems in the South without regard to racial or religious lines.

JOINT SESSION URGED

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, immediately after President Truman announced that the United Nations would fight in Korea, I issued a statement to the newspapers of the Third Iowa District in which I said:

In the decision that has been made with respect to Korea I am supporting President Truman. But approval of this decision in no way implies acceptance nor does it for a single moment condone the long succession of mistakes and vacillation that must be charged to President Truman and Dean Acheson, his Secretary of State.

I further stated that—

United States intervention in Korea, whether followed by full scale war or eventual cessation of hostilities, will be meaningless if the administration persists in its policy of financing and otherwise supporting governments which deny freedom to their own people.

Mr. Speaker, up to this time, President Truman, although making the decision that has thrown this country into a shooting war, has not seen fit to consult with Congress.

It is high time that the President come before a joint session of the House and Senate—before the elected representatives of the people—and set forth in at least broad outline the future policy of this Government with respect to foreign affairs.

With the great majority of Members of the House of Representatives I voted for the full appropriations requested by the Truman administration for our land, sea, and air forces. I believed the United States ought to be completely prepared in case of an emergency, and I further believed that maintenance of powerful striking forces would aid in containing the ambitions of Soviet Russia.

Congress did its part.

But what happened? Under the misnamed unification program, the fleet was put in mothballs, the proposed carrier program wrecked, Admiral Denfeld was made to walk the plank for opposing the decimation of the Navy, and not a single effective combat unit of the Marine Corps, specially trained for Pacific warfare, was beyond the continental limits of the United States.

As a result, the Seventh Fleet, belatedly rushed to Korean waters, had only one carrier and the Air Force, in the crucial first hours and days, had to fight alone, back and forth all the way from Japan and through seasonal heavy rain and fog.

Thus, on the day the blow fell in Korea, United States forces were completely impotent to meet even an initially minor act of aggression, much less to serve as a psychological deterrent to the ambitious war lords.

The American people are also entitled to know now, and not later, whether other so-called Allied nations are going to send ground forces into Korea and not just a few planes or naval vessels. And are any of these other nations going to help finance this war, or has the billions of dollars the United States expended on the British, French, Turks, and Italians been poured down assorted rat holes?

Not a single word has come from any source in Washington or elsewhere, to even indicate whether other members of the United Nations propose to send land troops to aid in the dirty end of the fighting.

If this is still a democracy, and the President therefore still accountable to the people, the time is here when the President should take the people into his confidence.

The time for determination is at hand. Have our huge gifts of money and materials amounted only to an "operation rat hole" and fair-weather friends or have we determined nations at our side, steadfast and ready to meet any eventuality?

I insist that President Truman appear before a joint session of Congress, and provide a forthright report to the Nation, not later than next Friday, July 14.

Tell us, Mr. President, who will stand with us to the end of the road.

THE SWITCHMEN'S STRIKE

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the switchmen's strike has ended on four of the five railroads on which it has been in effect. It continues on the Rock Island. The wholly unjustifiable nature of this strike is nowhere more clearly shown than in the statement by Arthur J. Glover, president of the union, that the strike will be continued on the Rock Island:

> To learn whether freemen in a free country can still bargain with their employers * * * without fear that big Government will team up with obstinate employers.

Now what does this mean in common ordinary language? It simply means that the strike is going to be continued just to show the power of the union.

It makes no difference to Mr. Glover that millions of bushels of wheat are being piled on the ground in Kansas and other States; that shipments of livestock have been held up; that business along the Rock Island lines is paralyzed; and that millions of dollars are being lost every day due to the breakdown of transportation. It makes no difference to Mr. Glover that this country is virtually at war and Americans are dying on the battlefields of Korea. To him the strike means just one thing: a chance to throw his weight around. Such an attitude of irresponsibility is a shocking thing and if continued by leaders of railroad labor will make compulsory arbitration and antistrike legislation inevitable if the public is to be protected.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, July 10, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

OATH OF OFFICE, MEMBERS AND DELEGATES

The oath of office required by the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States, and as provided by section 2 of the act of May 13, 1884 (23 Stat. 22), to be administered to Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, the text of which is carried in section 1757 of title XIX of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and being as follows:

> I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. SENATE

MONDAY, JULY 10, 1950

(Legislative day of Saturday, July 1, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all grace, Thou hast taught us that in quietness and in confidence shall be our strength. In bitter and baffling days, when the earth is full of thunder and the seas are dark with wrath, give us a courage that never quails, a faith that never wavers, a hope that never dims. Make us the kind of persons Thou canst trust as the instruments and channels of Thy saving grace.

Help us to heal the open sores of the world which hate and selfishness and misunderstanding have inflicted on the bleeding body of our common humanity. Upon all who in these tragic days administer the stewardship of the Nation's strength and service, we crave the divine guidance. Grant us this day and in all the days of difficult decision to come, light to guide us, courage to support us, love to unite us. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

COLUMBIA VALLEY ADMINISTRATION—RESOLUTION OF ETHAN ALLEN POMONA GRANGE, BENNINGTON, VT.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Ethan Allen Pomona Grange, of Bennington, Vt., protesting against the creation of a Columbia Valley Administration.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENNINGTON, VT., June 14, 1950.

Hon. RALPH E. FLANDERS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The following is a resolution passed by Ethan Allen Pomona Grange and voted to be brought to your attention:

"Whereas a proposal has been made to create a Columbia Valley Administration, the first move to create authorities in nine great river valleys; and

"Whereas if the CVA was to be established, it could lead to creation of a network of nine authorities blanketing the country. It would have all authority of the Federal Government and would be managed by a three-man board of directors from each region, to be appointed by the President and responsible only to him and not to Congress. The administration would be free from any State or local control and even from the jurisdiction of State courts; and

"Whereas the administration would establish the maximum size of farm units within each project for the reclamation of lands, no farm unit would contain more than 160 or less than 10 acres of irrigable land. It would have full power and authority over all navigable streams, land, forests, and other natural resources, if State laws conflicted with Federal control over local waters, the State law need not be complied with; and

"Whereas the extension of the regional idea to the entire country would mean the eventual disregarding of State lines and a new subdividing of the United States on a regional basis: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Ethan Allen Pomona Grange go on record as opposing any regional authority that will interfere with the Federal Government using its regularly established agencies, operating on a national basis, for activities properly belonging to the Federal Government in relation to natural resources, and any issue that in any way interferes or changes our democratic way of living."

Fraternally yours,

RACHEL MASON,
Secretary, Ethan Allen Pomona Grange.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES ON TRANSPORTATION—LETTER FROM PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OF NORTH DAKOTA, BISMARCK, N. DAK.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a letter from the Public Service Commission of North Dakota, signed by the president and all members, favoring the repeal of the excise taxes on transportation.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, July 8, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The House of Representatives has passed tax legislation which revises the excise taxes to a considerable degree but has made only a small reduction in the transportation tax on persons compared to some of the other reductions.

The excise taxes levied on the transportation of persons and property and communication services were wartime taxes designed to prevent the overburdening of these facilities during the war period and are not luxury taxes and should be eliminated before any reduction in luxury taxes is made. The taxes above-mentioned have placed an extra burden on those parts of the United States that are a long distance from centers of population because the tax applies on the ticket or freight bill, as the case may be, or upon the distance a message is transmitted, where the charges are placed against either long-distance telephone or telegraph service.

During the calendar year 1949 the railroads of the United States suffered a deficit of $649,000,000 in their passenger-train operations, which of course includes revenues from express, mail and other items of property carried on passenger trains as well as dining-car operations. One of the principal causes of this huge deficit is the 15 percent tax on passenger tickets.

It seems to us to be rather ridiculous for the United States Government to levy a 15 percent tax on passenger tickets and at the same time maintain an office in Washington, trying to promote passenger travel by common carriers.

It is the hope of the North Dakota Commission that the excise taxes above-mentioned can be completely eliminated.

The passenger deficit incurred by the railroads is now being carried by increased freight rates, and as a result, large organizations like meat packers are purchasing their own motor-carrier equipment because they can eliminate the transportation tax and avoid, to some degree, the high freight rates. With the diversion of high-class freight to private carriers, the tonnage remaining for the railroads is compelled to carry an additional burden and we here in the Northwest are particularly hard hit as we must ship our products long distances to our first primary market and the commodities we consume are likewise shipped in from distant manufacturing points.

In conclusion, we urge that you attempt to secure the outright repeal of taxes on passenger and property transportation, and communication services.

Yours very truly,

C. W. MCDONNELL,
President.
ERNEST D. NELSON,
ELMER W. CART, Commissioners.

RENEWAL OF FRANCHISE OF WISCONSIN CENTRAL AIRLINES—RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN CHAPTER, ASSOCIATION OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am always happy to receive resolutions from organizations in my State on important public affairs. This morning I was glad to hear from the Wisconsin Chapter of the Association of Postmasters. One of the resolutions which had been adopted at the annual chapter convention in La Crosse, held between June 25 and June 27, endorsed the renewal of the franchise of the Wisconsin Central Airlines—a matter now pending before the Civil Aeronautics Board.

I have previously commented in the Senate on the necessity of the CAB supporting this great airline's continuation. Now that America is up to her ears in the Korean crisis, the great State of Wisconsin will be making invaluable contributions once again to United States military strength. It would be unthinkable that the Badger State, which had so magnificent a record of contributions to our armed might in World Wars I and II, should be denied the continuation of this airline with its indispensable services to passengers, mail, and freight.

I believe that the CAB should with the promptest possible dispatch, therefore, renew the franchise as stated in this National Association of Postmasters, Wisconsin Chapter, resolution received this morning from Miss Margaret F. McGonigle, of Sun Prairie, secretary-treasurer of this fine organization. The president of the Wisconsin Chapter is Tilly E. Brennan, of Valders, Wis. Vice presidents are: Earl F. Moldenhauer, of Clintonville, Wis.; Edward E. Donovan, of Phillips; Reinold N. Duren, of Cazenovia; and Stella Blachowiak, of Beaver, Wis.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1950 POSTMASTERS CONVENTION,
La Crosse, Wis., June 27, 1950.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolution 14

Whereas the Wisconsin Central Airlines is providing direct air-mail service to the principal cities in this State; and

Whereas air mail to and from almost all other post offices in the State is advanced as a result of this feeder-line service; and

Whereas the present temporary operating certificate of the Wisconsin Central Airlines is scheduled to expire in October of this year: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wisconsin Central Airlines be granted a permanent certificate in order that the citizens of this great State may receive the benefits of this improved service on a permanent basis; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D. C., and to the Wisconsin Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

FREE MAILING PRIVILEGES TO CERTAIN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate because I am sending to the desk a short bill which I shall ask to have read. It has for its purpose the giving of free mailing privileges to the soldiers in Korea who are now engaged in fighting, the same as we have always done in time of actual combat. I introduce the bill and shall ask for its immediate consideration and passage to final disposition. I ask that the bill be read.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3876) to provide free postage for members of the Armed Forces of the United States in specified areas, introduced by Mr. TYDINGS, was received, read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any first-class letter mail matter admissible to the mails as ordinary mail matter which is sent by a member of the Armed Forces of the United States while on active duty or in the active service of the Armed Forces of the United States in Korea and such other areas as the President of the United States may hereafter designate as combat zones or theaters of military operations, to any person in the United States, including the Territories and possessions thereof, shall be transmitted in the mails free of postage, subject to such rules and regulations as the Postmater General may prescribe: Provided, That when specified by the sender letters weighing not to exceed 1 ounce shall be transmitted to destination by air mail, dependent upon air space availability therefor.

SEC. 2. The free mailing privileges above granted shall become effective upon the date of enactment of this act and shall continue until June 30, 1951, unless terminated at an earlier date by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by direction of the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland to give an explanation of the bill. I do not want to jump the gun, but I desire an explanation of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. The bill deals primarily with giving free postage rights to the troops in Korea and such other combat zones as the President may hereafter designate. It is the same general privilege which we extended to our armed forces during World War II. Of course, the men who are fighting in Korea and who will fight in Korea have no postage stamps in their pockets. They are always very anxious to communicate with their families and friends and their loved ones. It is not always possible to write letters under peaceful conditions when wearing the uniform. Some time, before the eve of a conflict, a battle, a man has a chance to drop a few lines to his wife or children or parents, knowing it might be the last letter he will ever write. It has always been the humane and democratic custom of our legislative bodies to give to the man who is about to go into action, or who is in the war zone, every chance in the world to write to those who are tied to him by blood or affection.

For the time being the bill applies only to Korea, but should any other zone become a combat zone, of course, the President could include it in that category. It is the same general provision that was made for the troops in World War II.

I hope I have explained the bill to the satisfaction of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wanted the RECORD to show the purpose of the bill. I reserve the right to object so I could ask the Senator from Maryland to give an explanation of the bill which has just been introduced, and for which request has been made for consideration though the bill has not even gone to committee. I desire to say that I am in complete accord with the provisions of the bill. It would do exactly what was done with respect to soldiers in the combat areas during World War II. At least that is my understanding as gained from the explanation made by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I am certainly for the bill, and I hope it will be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3876) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECURITY SURVEY COMMISSION

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I intend to introduce a bill and ask unanimous consent that I may make a short explanation of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a Commission to investigate and evaluate programs designed to assure the loyalty of Government employees and protect Government information from improper disclosure.

The proposed duties of the Commission, which would be composed of an equal number of members of both major parties and an equal number of private citizens and of officials representing the executive and legislative branches of the Government, are set forth in section 2 of the bill as follows:

The Commission shall make a full and complete study and investigation of the employees loyalty program in the executive branch, and of similar and related operations of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, and other agencies and boards designed to assure the loyalty of Government employees and protect Government information from improper disclosure. The Commission shall evaluate the effectiveness of such program and operations in safeguarding the national interest, and particularly in preventing the infiltration into the Government of subversive elements and disloyal individuals; and shall determine and recommend what steps should be taken to (1) coordinate and increase the effectiveness of such program and operations; (2) encourage superior personnel to enter and continue in Government service; and (3) safeguard the integrity and rights of Government personnel. The Commission shall restrict its work to a study of methods, operations, and needs, and shall not investigate the loyalty or personal conduct of any individual within the Government.

Mr. President, I believe that the American people are entitled to know how the methods and agencies established to provide for security within the Government are functioning and what steps should be taken to make them more effective.

I need not enumerate the convictions that have been secured in courts of law of disloyal persons who have entered Government employment and advanced to responsible positions, nor the evidence of subversive activities that has been brought out in congressional investigations, to indicate that we are confronted with a most serious problem at a time of grave potential danger.

We have passed through a decade of national emergency when these things have occurred. We know they happened in spite of the screening and investigation that were done by agencies charged with that responsibility. In 1947, the new employees loyalty program in the executive branch was set up, and increased appropriations were provided by the Eightieth Congress for this program. We believe it has provided improved procedures. We hope that it has kept undesirables out of the Government. Unfortunately, however, we are not sure that even our improved setup is adequate.

As the danger from those boring from within has grown more apparent, the American people have become greatly concerned and disturbed over the situation. They have not known quite what to believe. In these critical days, it is relatively easy to arouse public fear.

It is our duty to make certain that our program is right. Therefore, let us provide a commission of the best qualified men and women to make a study and report to Congress and the people of this land. Changes, if needed, should be recommended. If there is an adequate safeguard, the public would be happy to have such information.

It is essential that we fairly evaluate the machinery through which we propose to safeguard this vital phase of the national interest. It is imperative that we determine how we can achieve from now on the best possible results in keeping out subversive elements, security risks, and disloyal persons, while at the same time safeguarding the integrity and encouraging the overwhelming majority of fine, loyal, and competent persons in our Government.

I believe that such constructive determination can best be made by an independent, bipartisan commission modeled somewhat after the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch.

That is the purpose of this bill. The proposed commission would not take over any congressional investigation. It would not undertake to reach decisions as to policies, past or present, or to assume any administrative responsibility. It would not be created to cast reflections on any individual or any part of our Government or to investigate them, except in the sense of an objective study.

It would be a fact-finding body whose principal duty would be to give us a true picture of a highly important problem and to recommend both administrative and legislative actions to correct whatever mistakes or weaknesses there may be. It would tell us whether we have done what we ought to do to coordinate a necessary security and loyalty program, and, if not, what correction or improvements are desirable and necessary.

The establishment of a Security Survey Commission, as contemplated in this bill, would be reassuring to the American people. Its work would be in our common interest and would strengthen us at a most critical time in our history.

In other words, by this means we would try to make certain that at some future time we shall not be endeavoring to lock the barn door after the horse has been stolen.

The bill (S. 3887) to establish a commission to investigate and evaluate programs designed to assure the loyalty of Government employees and protect Government information from improper disclosure, introduced by Mr. THYE, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF EXCESSIVE WAR PROFITS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution to investigate excessive war profits made during World War II, with a view to limiting future war profits.

I think the Senate is familiar with the fact that in World War I, 72,000 new millionaires were created. This resolution provides that the Committee on Finance or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof shall make a full and complete study to see to it that in the present war, or in case it is continued in any other country besides Korea, there shall be no excessive profits, and that the amount of profit shall be limited to not to exceed 10 percent of the capital investment.

The resolution (S. Res. 306), submitted by Mr. LANGER, was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study with respect to the earnings of war contractors and others making excessive profits during World War II, for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and desirability, during any future wars in which the United States may be engaged, of limiting annual profits to amounts not in excess of 10 percent of capital investment. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study together with such legislation as it may deem necessary to carry out its recommendations.

Dak., is hereby amended to authorize reimbursement to local interests for such work as they may have done in providing interior drainage facilities at Mandan, subsequent to appropriation of funds for construction, as a part of the local flood protection project, insofar as such drainage facilities shall be approved by the Chief of Engineers and found to have been done in accordance with the authorized project: Provided further, That such payment shall not exceed the sum of $76,000'."

PLEA FOR INCREASED MILITARY AID TO WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement I issued on July 7 advocating increased military aid to the countries of western Europe.

There being no objection, Mr. LODGE's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On Friday, July 1, when the Senate unanimously passed the military-aid bill, I stated my opinion that the amount was too low, that we should raise our sights higher and that there could be no lasting peace until the free world had rebuilt its military strength to a point which would prevent Communist imperialism from being able to take the initiative at will at any place that it chose on the world-wide edge of the Soviet Empire.

I based this assertion on my belief that there could be no lasting peace until the initiative had been regained by the United States and that, therefore, at this particular moment, the rebuilding of military strength was vital to success along all the other lines of acitivity, whether economic or psychological.

I now renew my plea for increasing the amount of military aid to Europe and I make this added argument:

The most reliable expectation is that within 2 or 3 years the Communist imperialists of the Kremlin will, for the first time, be able to bomb our ports and industrial centers with atomic bombs. The most authoritative information further holds that the rulers of the Kremlin cannot do this now. If the defense of the west in the next 2 or 3 years grows only as fast as the present rate now contemplates, quick reinforcements to Europe would be required to prevent the Communists from overrunning Europe in a few days. The overrunning of Europe would not only be a tragedy for the Europeans; it would also mean that none of the free nations would be able to use Europe as a base from which to strike back after we had been bombed. Yet, if our port cities are hit, we will be unable to send reinforcements to Europe. All our retaliation (with the exception of carrier-based aviation) would then have to be conducted by planes based in the United States, which would greatly lessen the cargo space available for bombs because so much space would have to be used for fuel.

To avoid this dilemma, we should at once accelerate measures to put Europe in such a strong defensive posture that in 2 years it will be proof against aggression. The situation with regard to Europe is potentially a thousand times more portentous and dangerous than the situation in Korea. The point of the Soviet arrow is not aimed at Korea or at Formosa or at Indo-China or at Iran; it is aimed at western Germany. Yet none of the Atlantic Pact countries, including the United States, is at present doing all that it is capable of doing. We should at once appropriate at least $2,000,000,000 more for military assistance; postpone tax reduction; and do whatever else may be necessary.

Such a course is dictated by the requirements of lasting peace. It is also made necessary by the starkest considerations of self-defense, if aggression should, in spite of all our efforts, take place.

THE KOREAN CRISIS—STATEMENT OF JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the Jewish War Veterans of the United States recently submitted a statement to the President of the United States describing its membership's attitude toward the current struggle in Korea. I ask unanimous consent to insert this statement in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America wholeheartedly endorses and supports President Truman's prompt action in countering the Communist invasion of South Korea.

Communism has passed from hidden conspiracy to naked aggression. It has demonstrated that what it fails to accomplish by propaganda and political infiltration, it is prepared to achieve by force of arms. It has shown its readiness to openly break a peace it has secretly undermined since the cessation of hostilities in World War II. America's refusal to countenance the terror unleashed by communism in South Korea will bolster the structure of the United Nations and give new heart to freedom- and peace-loving people everywhere. The resolute action now being taken by Gen. Douglas MacArthur at the direction of the President will serve to stem the hysteria and confusion on which communism counts in its over-all strategy of conquest.

The world now knows that the United States, and with her the community of free nations, is determined to deny communism a Munich in the Far East.

For the American people the attack on South Korea points in vivid terms to the need for prompt strengthening of America's defenses against any conceivable assault upon our freedom and security, whether by enemies within our borders or would-be conquerors from beyond our shores.

The President's action proffers the surest hope of restoring peace to South Korea on a basis of justice and the right of a small people to determine its own political destiny.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FEPC LEGISLATION AND THE SITUATION IN KOREA

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, this morning Mr. A. Philip Randolph and Mr. Roy Wilkins, spokesmen for organizations advocating FEPC legislation issued a statement describing the vital relationship between that legislation and the situation in Korea. It is a good and sober statement. To my mind it is a very true statement. I ask unanimous consent to insert this statement into the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A. Philip Randolph and Roy Wilkins, spokesmen for organizations supporting FEPC, issued the following statement on Sunday:

"The invasion of Korea by Communist troops has presented the United States with a new set of urgencies. The urgencies are not only military and economic, but political and ideological. While military action is confined to Korea, the bloodless battle for men's minds rages throughout the rest of the world. In that battle the United States loses ground as each month passes without affirmative governmental action to close the gap between our professed ideals and our actual practices. The most glaring inconsistency is between our credo of equality among all men and the actual day-to-day discriminations against human beings because of their color, race, national origin, or religion. Not only is this discrimination humiliating to our own people, but it places America in an unfavorable light with the millions of Asiatics, Indonesians, Africans, and other colored peoples who have not yet had to choose between totalitarianism and democracy.

"There is much talk today of a great world-wide American campaign of truth. This campaign would be much easier, and much more productive, if the American Government—here and now—took a forthright stand against racial and religious discrimination in employment practices. The opportunity is here. The FEPC bill is to be brought up in the Senate for another attempt at passage.

"The Negro troops which were among the first to be thrown into the Korea battle assuredly have equality of opportunity with their white comrades—opportunity to fight for freedom, and opportunity to die. Equality of opportunity at home—opportunity for employment on the basis of ability and opportunity to live as first-class citizens—is not too much to ask for them, nor for any American. We ask Senators to keep this in mind as they vote on the filibuster and the bill which both political parties are committed to support."

INCREASE IN STRENGTH OF ARMED FORCES—STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEHMAN

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on July 8, in response to inquiries by members of the Press, I expressed views approving and urging an increase in the strength of our Armed Forces. I said that we must not only increase the size of our armed units, but that we must approve and make available such increased funds as are necessary to supply arms and equipment for our men and also for our allies and friends who, with us, are supporting the cause of democracy and freedom. I ask unanimous consent to insert the brief statement I made on July 8 at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEHMAN ON THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER TO INCREASE THE STRENGTH OF THE ARMED FORCES

In the present world situation it seems essential to increase the strength of the Armed Forces both for our own defense and the defense of other nations. However much we may regret that we are compelled to take such a step, I am confident that it was taken only after full consideration and on the advice of the President's military advisors to whose views in these days we must give the most serious weight.

I feel, however, that in addition to increasing the number of our men under arms we must also hasten to provide such funds as are needed to supply arms and other essentials for our own men and for our allies and friends who stand with us in these critical hours.

JUDGING NORTH KOREAN WAR GUILT—MURDER OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, very briefly I should like to call attention to a letter published in the New York Times of this morning, entitled "Judging Korean War Guilt," commenting upon a suggestion which I made in the Senate last week that it was time we notified the North Korean leaders of the Nuremberg precedent. This has special point, I think, today in view of the dispatch which has come from Tokyo, which reads:

Seven American soldiers, their hands bound behind their backs and bullet holes in their faces, were found in a see-saw Korean battle yesterday after a lost battalion had slugged its way from behind North Korean lines.

Obviously they did not shoot these American soldiers in the heads first in battle and then tie their hands. They were apparently tied up and then shot. I think it is high time that the North Koreans were notified of the Nuremberg precedent in international law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the New York Times may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDGING KOREAN WAR GUILT—NUREMBERG PRECEDENT FOR DEFINING CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY QUOTED

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Senator BRIEN MCMAHON'S proposal that the persons responsible for the attack on southern Korea be tried as war criminals under the Nuremberg precedent did not suggest any details of procedure other than that the names of the individuals "directly responsible for precipitating this conflict be sent to the United Nations." A proper procedural application by the United Nations of the principles of international law may yet strengthen the sanctions now being invoked and perhaps furnish a legal and moral deterrent for aggravating this unlawful invasion and aggression.

The crime for initiating the aggression has already been committed and the persons responsible for participating in its planning and preparation are readily identifiable. The more important problem, it seems to me, is to announce the standards of international law which are designed to limit and contain an aggression already launched.

The Nuremberg precedent provided that participating in the waging of aggressive wars and illegal invasions is a separate and distinct crime. Thus persons who did not participate in the planning and preparation to initiate wars of aggression may be held criminally responsible if, knowing that the war was aggressive, they substantially participate in its waging. The Nuremberg tribunal in the Ministries Case stated:

"We are not to be understood as holding that one who knows that a war of aggression has been initiated is to be relieved of criminal responsibility if he thereafter wages it. * * *"

LIMITED APPLICATION

Following World War II, the application of the concept of the waging of aggressive war, as a separate and distinct crime, was difficult, because of the requirement that there be proof of knowledge on the part of the participant that the war was aggressive. Consequently its application was necessarily limited to those who substantially participated in the planning and preparation for the aggressive war.

Today the situation is different. A competent international authority has already determined "that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace."

We now have an official declaration by the United Nations that the attack on South Korea was aggressive and criminal. Any person who hereafter substantially participates in the waging of the war and invasion of Southern Korea must be charged with knowledge of the fact that he is participating in the waging of an aggressive war and illegal invasion, regardless of whether he participated in the preparations for its initiation or not.

It would be most appropriate for the United Nations to adopt at this time a resolution to the effect that under existing law all persons holding high position who participate in the waging of aggressive war or unlawful invasions are criminally responsible therefor; that the attack on South Korea constitutes an unlawful invasion and an act of aggression; that all persons holding high position who continue to participate in the unlawful invasion and aggression against South Korea will be held responsible before an international tribunal.

SUPPLEMENTARY SANCTIONS

Such a declaration by the United Nations may perhaps plant a seed of hesitancy in the minds of the North Korean officials and their backers as to the advisability of continuing to wage war in the face of the Unitd Nations declaration. It would certainly supplement the military sanctions with the legal and moral sanctions of international law.

The impact of such a declaration would not be entirely lost on the Soviet legal mind. The published minutes of the International Conference on Military Tribunals disclose that the Soviet delegate attached great importance to the Allied declarations at Crimea and Moscow providing for the trial and punishment of Axis war criminals. In fact, we thought they overstressed the legal effect of those declarations.

THE PRESIDENT'S COURSE IN KOREA—STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have tried to get the floor to make a statement today, but instead of that, I ask that the material I have prepared be inserted in the RECORD at this point, together with a release I issued today regarding use of Allied ground troops in Korea.

There being no objection, the statement and release were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WILEY RECOMMENDS RESOLUTION OF CONGRESS INDICATING APPROVAL OF PRESIDENT'S ACTIONS IN KOREA

Mr. President, I rise to urge today that the administration submit to both Houses of the Congress a resolution indicating the approval by the Congress of actions taken by the President in drawing a defense line beyond which we will not permit Russian and Red satellite aggression to occur. Although it is 2 weeks since the outbreak of the Korean crisis, I believe that it is essential for the integrity of the Congress—the legislative branch—and for the sake of history, that we go on record indicating our agreement with the President's actions. In the House of Commons, Prime Minister Attlee submitted his actions to a vote of confidence which came almost unanimously.

I should like to make the following points why I feel this resolution is essential:

1. The fact that the President has used troops on an estimated 150 occasions in the past does not necessarily prove that executive action without congressional agreement is advisable in the present situation. As a matter of fact, no single military action taken by the executive branch at any time in American history has as many widespread implications as does the present. Although Korea is the only battlefield, thus far, countless new explosions may occur in Formosa, Indochina, Malaya, Iran, "Titoland," etc., and it is ridiculous that America should embark on so long a series of actions whose end result no man can foretell without our taking action here in the Congress.

2. I believe that by our approval we are not necessarily establishing a precedent for the executive to initiate action, getting congressional agreement later. On the contrary, our approval is entirely specific and is directed only to this one occasion at this one period in history.

3. The American people are seriously concerned about the fact that in recent decades the legislative branch has been giving up more and more of its authority and prerogatives to the executive branch. If we are to sit by silently while the President takes actions which might lead us into a third world war or into wholesale committal of American lives, then the people will wonder whether the legislative branch has continued strength and validity. It would be ridiculous for us to be fighting in Korea for the cause of freedom and popular rule at the same time the Congress gives up its own position as the voice of the people.

4. I do not believe that it is sufficient that the President should merely call in Members of the Senate and House for personal discussions at his office to advise of actions he has already taken. No one would call that true executive-legislative teamwork and cooperation because obviously we had no alternative but to agree to actions that were already being executed by our chiefs in the Far East. This situation should not go uncorrected indefinitely. We approve of those actions but it is up to the entire Congress to state specifically that it does so for the sake of history as I have mentioned and for the sake of the integrity of the legislative branch of government.

5. In view of the provisions of the United Nations Charter, it might be implied that the President has the power in case of aggression without the consent or approval or direction of Congress to put the Armed Forces of the United States into action, to repel aggression (though that is still a question in dispute) nevertheless if we are to proceed unitedly and obtain effective action to stop aggression, it would appear wise that a resolution authorizing the use of Armed Forces of this Government be adopted by the Congress, particularly in those cases where the aggression is outside the North and South American continents.

What I am driving at is this: In a case involving the utilization of Armed Forces where the activity is something more than what might be called a mere police operation, where the President is acting alone under his powers as Commander in Chief under the Constitution, an appropriate resolution should be adopted by the Congress authorizing the use of such force, and likewise, where under the jurisdiction of the United Nations the situation is something more than the mere utilization of police force, in such case I feel the Congress should also authorize the use of the military force of the United States.

Mr. President, I repeat it is definitely not too late for the administration to submit this resolution. Korea may be simply the opening step of a whole series of explosions which will come. I don't want the American people to feel that our men will be dying in Korea or any other place merely at the order of one single man—the Chief Executive. Even if Korea were the only battlefield I would say that this resolution is imperatively necessary. It is not too late to be sure, though it would have been helpful had such a resolution been submitted two Mondays ago, but better late than never. Let us act now to show the world that the Congress takes very seriously its obligations under the United States Constitution, that Congress takes seriously its obligation to serve as a check and balance on the executive branch and that Congress, which is the only voice of the American people, intends to show the people and the world that it is the people which rule rather than any single individual or group of individuals in elective or appointive office in the executive branch.

Mr. President, as of this morning I issued a release urging the United Nations to get down to cases and mobilize ground troops in support of American boys dying in Korea. I feel it is essential that the United Nations prove that not just American boys will be making the supreme sacrifice in the world-wide effort against aggression. I want to emphasize those phases of the release pointing up the need for vigilance and preparedness in the atomic age. I am not satisfied at all that our Defense Department in the Pentagon has snapped itself out of a Pearl-Harbor-like complacency. I insist that Mr. Johnson prove to the Congress that we are prepared and that we are vigilant against every possible threat.

RELEASE BY SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY, MEMBER, SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

WILEY URGES UNITED NATIONS TO REDOUBLE ITS EFFORTS TO GET ALLIED GROUND TROOPS FOR KOREAN CRISIS

I urge the United Nations to redouble its efforts to mobilize allied ground troops to support American forces in Korea. If the present situation continues the American people will get to feel that the United Nations is willing to fight to the last American.

We appreciate the moral help of half a hundred countries. We appreciate the handful of destroyers or cruisers or planes which they have turned over to us. But we are not going to let them think that they have fulfilled their commitments by these half-hearted, half-baked measures.

I believe that our diplomats at Lake Success and throughout the world have fumbled the ball in failing sufficiently to impress upon the UN and the peoples of the earth the need for real unity, real cooperation, and the fact that America cannot and will not carry the military ball all by itself. In fact, our State Department seems to have concentrated so exclusively on western European military defense that if further crises broke out elsewhere in Asia, or in Iran, once again it would be Uncle Sam who alone would be giving lives of his youngsters on the field of battle while the rest of the world sat in the grandstands cheering.

I appreciate the many excuses and alibis that will be offered—the fact that French troops are tied up in Indochina, British troops in Malaya, etc. But surely in this whole wide, free world there is the possibility of getting a non-American expeditionary force. Nationalist China must be considered separately because use of its troops might cause Red China to pour in its masses of infantry which we certainly don't want to happen.

KOREA IS A PEARL-HARBOR-LIKE SERIES OF BLUNDERS

The whole Korean situation thus far has been a series of atrocious failures and a monument (or a tombstone) to ineptness and bungling.

Korea is another grisly Pearl Harbor; only infinitely worse because our boys will be bogged down in muddy fox holes fighting their way back inch by inch for months to come.

I am not trying to cast blame where it does not belong. It is easy enough, of course, for anyone to second-guess and to be a Monday morning quarterback. But the United States expects more of its diplomatic and military chiefs than the ridiculous series of errors which have occurred such as:

1. We didn't have the trained men, the right equipment, or the right planes to handle the Korean situation.

2. Our so-called intelligence service was once more caught flat-footed.

3. Our State Department had been so intent on appeasing Russia that it made us withdraw from Korea and now we are going to have to fight our way back into Korea.

4. We are getting once more the ridiculous series of contradictory announcements of an off-again, on-again nature. On one day we are told that the draft will not be necessary; and on the very next day, selective service is invoked. On one day, we are told that the reservists will not be called; and on the very next day, it is possible reservists may be called.

Once again the lives of hundreds of thousands of parents and American young men are being completely jarred by this series of clumsy, ill-planned announcements which make every American unable to plan his future.

Our civil defense plans are a ghastly joke. Decentralization of industry, population and Government which I have urged so long is still barely out of the blueprint stage in somebody's official safe in Washington.

Once more we are getting optimistic announcements which are successively debunked by news of tragic defeats.

SECRETARY JOHNSON MUST REPORT TO CONGRESS

The American people have a right to demand from Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson a complete report (without breaking military security) as to the actual alertness and vigilance of the United States armed forces.

A. Alertness against attacks on American cities.

B. Alertness against attacks by Russian snorkel submarines or planes on our ships.

C. Alertness against Red satellite pushes or Russian Army pushes elsewhere in the world.

We are simply not going to take the assurance of our military that everything is all right, because we are pretty sure that everything is very definitely not all right.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has rendered favorable reports on the statehood bills for Alaska and Hawaii. The views of the minority on statehood for Alaska and Hawaii have not yet been quite completed. The minority views on the bill providing statehood for Hawaii will be available this afternoon. It was our desire to have both the majority report and the minority views printed in one document. The matter is of such great importance, however, Mr. President, and there is so much interest in whether or not these bills will be considered before adjournment that I am going to ask unanimous consent that the majority report with respect to statehood for Alaska, H. R. 331, may be printed at length in the body of the RECORD. I think it was the feeling of the majority of the committee, and that means a very large majority, that there is very little we can do in this international crisis in the Pacific which will be more beneficial than to pass the statehood bills. I am confident that these measures will be taken up by the Senate before adjournment, if there is to be an adjournment, which is by no means certain, in the present state of international affairs.

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii I regard to be a major aspect of American international policy, for the passage of these two measures will indicate better than almost anything else we can do that the policy of the United States is to foster and establish self-government by peoples everywhere without regard to distinctions of race or color. Accordingly, I shall continue to press for the early consideration of these bills.

Hawaii is the melting pot of the Pacific. What happens in Hawaii will be known immediately throughout the Pacific world. Denial of statehood to Hawaii would be capitalized by communistic propagandists everywhere.

The same is true with respect to Alaska. This Territory is only 3,500 miles from Korea, and only 50 miles from Siberia. It is a reservoir of undeveloped natural resources and in my opinion we should permit nothing to interfere with statehood for this Territory, not only on the ground of international policy for the promotion of self-government but also on the ground of economic development and national defense.

I am satisfied from the character of testimony which was presented by the supporters of statehood for both Alaska and Hawaii that the people of these two Territories will draft State constitutions which will preserve fundamental American principles and prevent the exploitation of minorities either politically or economically.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the majority report may be printed at length in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (No. 1929) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The purpose of H. R. 331 is to enable the Territory of Alaska to enter the Union as a State, on a free and equal basis with the present 48 States. The bill provides the machinery for accomplishment of this purpose by—

1. Authorizing the people of the Territory to elect delegates to a constitutional convention which would draft a proposed State constitution and submit it to the people of the Territory for ratification;

2. Setting forth specific provisions which must be a part of the State constitution, such as, for example, that it "shall be republican in form, shall make no distinction in political or civil rights on account of race or color," and shall provide that "no person who advocates or who aids or belongs to any party, organization, or association which advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the government of the State of Alaska or of the United States shall be qualified to hold any public office of trust or profit under the State constitution." It is also provided that in the proposed constitution the new State and its people disclaim all right and title, not only to any lands or other property of the United States which is not conveyed or confirmed to the State or its political subdivisions, but also "to any lands or other property (including fishing rights) the right or title to which may be held by any Indians, Eskimos, or Aleuts (hereinafter called natives), or is held by the United States in trust for said natives";

3. Providing for approval of the proposed State constitution by the Congress;

4. Providing for a generous grant of lands to the new State, to be selected by it, and for transfer to the State of the highly important Alaskan fisheries and wildlife, except those which are subject to international agreement or are included within the reserved native rights;

5. Establishing Alaska as a Federal judicial district, with a United States district court. State courts would be established by the State constitution.

By reason of the provision requiring that the State constitution "shall make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color," and the additional provision requiring a specific clause in the constitution to protect native rights, the bill extends an opportunity to the people of Alaska, through their elected delegates to the constitutional convention, to make clear that the natives are and shall continue to be citizens of the new State of Alaska, as they are now of the United States. Although the native population of Alaska constitutes a minority of the population, there are six such natives now holding office as respected and influential members of the Territorial legislature.

The right of the Federal Government to legislate with respect to natives is not impaired by the bill and cannot be impaired by the State constitution. Provision is made, however, that pending action by the people of Alaska, and the Congress of the United States under the act, no reservations are to be designated in the Territory under existing law, and that no act of Congress applicable to Indians but not now applying to natives of Alaska shall be made applicable to them "except by specific authorization of the Congress."

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

The Constitution of the United States provides in article IV, section 3:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

Since 1787, the Congress has exercised the authority conferred by the quoted section of the Constitution on 30 different occasions by providing for admission of the 35 States which have become a part of the Union since its formation by the Original Thirteen.

As to Alaska specifically, a bill to permit the Territory to become a State was introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress by Judge James Wickersham, then Alaskan Delegate. Since then proposed legislation for the same purpose has been before the succeeding Congresses intermittently. During the Eightieth Congress, extensive hearings on statehood for Alaska were conducted by the House Public Lands Committee in a number of centers in Alaska and in Washington.

The present bill, introduced by the present Delegate from Alaska, Hon. E. L. BARTLETT, was passed by the House on March 3, 1950, after full debate, by a vote of 186 to 146. The Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, to whom the bill was referred, held extensive hearings in Washington during April of this year, and then met in executive session over a period of more than 2 weeks to discuss specific provisions and work out amendments in accordance with facts brought out at the hearings.

Both opponents and proponents of the proposed legislation appeared in person before the committee and were given unlimited opportunity to present their views. In addition, hundreds of telegrams and letters were received and were carefully considered. The committee is of the opinion that the present bill, as amended, has the support of the great majority of Alaskans of all kinds. The amendments have been carefully considered to meet the objections to specific provisions in the bill as it passed the House and were drawn to deal with existing conditions in Alaska.

PRIMARY REASONS FOR STATEHOOD

The committee believes that statehood for Alaska is in the best interest both for the United States of America as a whole and for the people of the Territory in particular. Some of the primary bases for this conclusion are outlined below.

National defense: Alaska's highly strategic position in world affairs today is too well known to the Members of the Senate to require elaboration in this report. The committee will briefly point out that a mere 54 miles of the Bering Strait separate it from the Soviet territory. The peninsula is the ancient land bridge, anthropologists and archeologists believe, between Asia and the American Continent over which prehistoric man crossed. It is the only part of the American Continent which was invaded and actually occupied by enemy forces in World War II.

The international boundary is virtually on the shores of Big and Little Diomed Islands, the latter of which is a part of Alaska. The shortest, most direct air route between Soviet centers and inland cities of the United States, such as Detroit, Omaha, Denver, is across the narrow Arctic waters which wash Alaska's northern shores.

The strategic importance of Alaska can perhaps be summed up in the succinct words of America's air-power pioneer, Gen. Billy Mitchell: "He who holds Alaska holds the world."

From the point of view of military tactics, strictly speaking, statehood would work no immediate change in the military situation with respect to Alaska. Geography and climate will remain the same, obviously, and our Army, Navy, and Air Force will fight to defend Alaska as well under a Territorial status as under a statehood status. And there is no reason to believe that the loyal, patriotic citizens of Alaska, a very large proportion of whom were born in one of the States, would not fight equally hard and make equally great contributions and sacrifices if their homes were in a Territory rather than a State in the event of another war.

However, it is a military axiom that a populous area with a developed economy and a stable citizenry and political institutions is a bulwark against invasion, military, and psychologically.

The committee's views on the advantages of statehood to national defense are ably expressed in the following extract from the official report to the committee of Defense Secretary Louis Johnson:

"You asked in your letter of March 30 as to whether, from the point of view of national defense, it would be advantageous to extend statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, and you inquired specifically as to whether statehood would give greater strength to our military position in those areas than does the present Territorial type of local government. It is obvious that the more stable a local government can be, the more successful would be the control and defense of the area in case of sudden attack. There can be no question but that in the event of an attack any State would be immensely aided in the initial stages of the emergency by the effective use of the State and local instrumentalities of law and order. By the same token it would seem to me that, as persons in a position to assist the Federal garrisons which might exist in Hawaii or Alaska, the locally elected governors, sheriffs, and the locally selected constabulary and civil defense units all would be of tremendous value in cases of sudden peril. Therefore, my answer to your question is that statehood for Alaska and Hawaii would undoubtedly give a considerable added measure of strength to the overall defense of both areas in event of emergency."

The Defense Secretary's report is set forth in full below.

In reach of the 35 instances in which new States have been added to the Union, a marked expansion in population and economic development has followed forthwith. There is every reason to believe this historic process will be repeated in Alaska. As stated by the Secretary of the Interior in appearing personally before the committee:

"It is understandable that persons will not go to Alaska from the States in great numbers if they thereby relinquish the privilege of participating in national affairs through their representation in Congress and through their participation in Presidential elections, if they thereby remain subject to Federal taxation but lose their voice in making the laws under which the taxes are levied upon them."

Foreign policy: Americans traditionally have had a deep-rooted respect for world opinion. The founding fathers set forth in the Declaration of Independence that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to separation."

In accordance with this tradition, the committee gave serious consideration to the effect upon world opinion of the passage or failure of the statehood bill. Among others, it heard the Honorable John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, representing the Secretary of State. Mr. Hickerson said, in part:

"The Department of State has indicated in a recent letter to the chairman of this committee its general support for the admission of Alaska into the Union. You placed that letter into the record a moment ago, sir. The Department of State considers that the admission of Alaska would be another step in accord with the traditional policy of the United States toward the peoples of Territories under its administration who have not yet become fully self-governing. The admission of Alaska to the Union on a basis of full equality with the States presently in that Union would be an act in fulfillment of obligations assumed by the United States under the Charter of the United Nations.

"If I may, Mr. Chairman, I will refer briefly to the specific provisions of the United Nations Charter which bear upon this point. Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter is a declaration regarding non-self-governing Territories. Under that chapter, the United States, as the Government responsible for the administration of Alaska, accepted the obligation, among others 'to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions * * *.'

"The Department of State considers that favorable action by the Congress on the bill to provide statehood for Alaska would be in fulfillment of this obligation and would accordingly serve to support American foreign policy and to strengthen the position of the United States in international affairs. The Department of State would welcome the opportunity of conveying to the United Nations, on behalf of the Government and people of the United States, the information that the Territorial status of Alaska had terminated with the admission of Alaska into the United States as a State with full and equal rights and participation in the Union with other States."

The Secretary of the Interior also in his appearances before the committee vigorously urging passage of the measure stated:

"The people of Alaska are citizens of the United States. They are asking to become citizens of a State of the Union as well, just as people living in the continental United States are. This aspiration is a legitimate one. The United States as it exists today grew out of just such aspirations. In view of the historical precedents for admission to the Union of incorporated Territories, I would say that we have an obligation to admit Alaska, and that if we are to say 'no' to the request of the people of Alaska, we must have very good reasons to justify our action not only to them and to ourselves, but to the world. I have heard no reasons which have substance. The United States has spoken out loudly and firmly against colonialism in world councils, but surely to require a people qualified for the ultimate in self-government to continue in a dependent status is to foster colonialism."

In connection with the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of State, the committee wishes to state clearly that it is not contending that statehood for Alaska is a definite obligation of the United States under the United Nations Charter. The committee believes that the people of the United States have nobly and well fulfilled their fundamental obligations to the people of Alaska in promoting the general welfare and in fostering the high degree of economic, social, and political development which the Territory has attained.

However, it does believe, as the representatives of the Department of State set forth, that statehood would be a logical and merited development for Alaska—one of the only two remaining incorporated Territories which have not yet achieved the destiny of all of the other incorporated Territories; namely, statehood.

In development of this idea, the committee wishes to call particular attention to the legal study prepared by the Interior Department attorneys under the direction of the Secretary, and submitted to the committee by the Secretary at the request of the chairman. This memorandum of law is set forth in full as an appendix to this report (appendix 3).

Economic development: In addition to the advantages to national security and the furtherance of America's leadership in world affairs, statehood for Alaska is desirable for America's peacetime development and economic expansion. The region has the greatest reserves of untapped raw materials—minerals, forest and sea products—under the American flag. The attention of the Senate is directed to a series of short monographs on the subject of Alaska's natural wealth and industrial pontentialities prepared at the committee's request by the Department of the Interior, found in the appendix of the hearings, starting at page 504.

Alaska's gold and furs have been glamorized by Jack London, Rudyard Kipling, Robert W. Service, and other writers, but the Territory has far more valuable resources in her iron ore, coal, copper, lead and zinc, and even tin. Tin is, of course, a strategic mineral, imported at great cost in money and manpower during the war. Other strategic minerals found in Alaska are antimony, mercury, and chrome.

As to forest products, a memorandum from the Department of the Interior states:

"One of Alaska's more important industrial potentials is that of wood-dissolving pulp, a high-quality bleached pulp used in the manufacture of rayon, staple fiber, cellophane, plastics, and similar commercial products. The demand for this wood-dissolving pulp has been steadily increasing, and it has been estimated that, by 1955, the world shortage, taking into account planned additions to mill capacity elsewhere, will amount to 375,000 tons annually. Tests have shown that much of the forests of southeastern Alaska are particularly well suited for production of this pulp. The Tongass National Forest alone can sustain, on a perpetual-yield basis, the daily production of 3,000 tons of wood-dissolving pulp. The long-term market price of this product is expected to exceed $150 per ton. The low costs of timber in Alaska would make it possible for the industry there to compete successfully with other producing areas despite higher costs for transportation to established markets. The market for wood-dissolving pulp, it should be noted, is much more stable than that for paper-quality pulps."

Power sites and facilities for development of hydroelectric power, as well as coal reserves, are officially described as "tremendous."

Even the fisheries, the most nearly developed at present of all of Alaska's industries, are susceptible to still further expansion.

All of the foregoing is merely a sketch of some of the high lights of Alaska's industrial and agricultural potentialities. If the historic patterns established in the admission of each of the 35 States is followed in Alaska—and the committee can perceive of no valid reason why it should not be—statehood for Alaska should supply the needed stimulus for enterprise and private capital to make that area of vast riches one of the strongest segments of the American economy of tomorrow.

READINESS FOR STATEHOOD

In order accurately to assess the readiness of Alaska for statehood, a brief historical sketch both of the admission of States in general and of the political development of Alaska in particular is desirable.

The Constitution itself by the provision quoted above provides merely that Congress shall decide when and how new States shall be admitted. The pattern for the creation of new States was set by the First Congress in 1787 with enactment of the Northwest Ordinance, set forth in One Statute at page 51. This history-making act of the First Congress has proved a legislative cornerstone for the expansion and political development of the West. The ordinance incorporated the then remote, sparsely populated, noncontiguous Northwest Territories into the Federal Union, and provide for their government and the eventual statehood which each part of the area attained. In a long series of cases, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that an incorporated Territory is an "inchoate state", the ultimate destiny of which was statehood. (See the appendix 3.) The resources and strength, material and spiritual, of our American democracy today constitute unassailable proof of the wisdom of that policy.

Alaska and Hawaii are the only remaining incorporated Territories under the American flag which have not yet achieved the historic destiny of incorporated Territories, namely statehood. The present measure, and a similar bill for Hawaii, would complete the historic pattern.

Alaska was purchased by the United States from Russia, as is well known, under the terms of treaty of March 30, 1867 (15 Stat. 539), negotiated by Secretary of State William H. Seward. By the act of May 17, 1884 (23 Stat. 24), Alaska was constituted a civil and judicial district and a civil government was established with a Governor and district court system. This act made the general laws of Oregon applicable to the Territory.

The greatest and most important step in the history of civil government for Alaska was the approval of the Organic Act on August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 512). By it, Congress created the Territory of Alaska and conferred legislative powers upon the legislative assembly for the Territory. Section 3 of the act specifically provided that the Constitution of the United States, and all the laws thereof which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States.

Thus, the legal status of Alaska became that of an organized, incorporated Territory of the United States, as distinguished from the present legal status of Puerto Rico, Guam the Virgin Islands, and the former status of the Philippines before they were granted full and complete independence by the Congress of the United States.

Requirements for statehood: The traditionally accepted requirements for statehood can be stated almost as simply as the constitutional provision. An analysis of the history of the admission of incorporated Territories shows that these requirements appear to be—

1. That the inhabitants of the proposed new State are imbued with and are sympathetic toward the principles of democracy as exemplified in the American form of government and have proved their political maturity by having undergone a period of "tutelage" under incorporated Territorial government status.

2. That a majority of the electorate wish statehood.

3. That the proposed new State has sufficient population and resources to support State government and at the same time carry its share of the cost of the Federal Government.

This has been the historic pattern under which 35 States have been admitted and by which our Nation has grown to greatness.

By each of these historic standards, Alaska is ready and qualified for statehood now.

As to the first, no one has contended, in either the extensive hearings in Alaska nor those in Washington that the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants of the Territory are not loyal Americans in the sturdy frontiersman tradition. Their support of the armed forces under actual invasion conditions, conditions far more stringent than those experienced anywhere in any of the States, is unassailable proof of their loyalty, patriotism, and stability. Attention is directed to the statement of the Honorable Robert P. Patterson, Secretary of War, during the period (hearings, pp. 488–489).

The political maturity of its citizens is ably summed up in the official report of the Secretary of the Interior to the committee urging passage of H. R. 331. The Secretary's report is set forth in full at the end of this report, but the pertinent portion as to the political maturity of the inhabitants of Alaska is as follows:

"In October of 1946, the people of Alaska offered incontrovertible proof of their desire for statehood when a substantial majority voted in favor of that status at a plebiscite. This clear indication of their political aspirations had been readily predicted, for the people of Alaska, who adhere as completely to democratic traditions as their fellow citizens in the continental United States, are not content to remain indefinitely in a status that denies them the responsibilities and privileges of full participation in the political life of the Nation.

"The people of Alaska, however, do not merely desire statehood. They are fully prepared for it.

"Alaska has been a part of the United States for more than three-quarters of a century. Beginning in 1867, when the Territory was purchased, American pioneers moved in from the west to settle in this great Northwest extension of their country. In that early period there was no Territorial government and no Territorial law, and the Americans newly settled there conducted their affairs in accordance with the laws, social customs, and business practices of the continental States or Territories from which they had come. As early as 1872, prior to the gold rush, a number of Sitka citizens appealed for representation in the Congress. They assembled unofficially, and had even elected their Delegate at one time—all this when half of our continental West was still in Territorial status. It is abundantly clear, then, that Alaska was, and is, basically American in thought and tradition.

"Politically, Alaska is mature. It has had a popularly elected legislature since 1912. That its citizens are politically alert and articulate is evidenced by their long experience in the management of Territorial affairs and the sustained efforts they have made to advance their political status. The Territorial legislature has enacted many wise and farsighted laws, testifying not only to a knowledge of democratic processes, but also to full awareness of how best to utilize them. A full 6 years before the adoption of the nineteenth amendment, suffrage had been extended to the women of Alaska. Alaska was the first to pass 8-hour-day work laws; a regular workmen's compensation act; and social-security measures that took old-age assistance completely out of the undesirable realm of condescending charity. In the absence of specific requirements, if we were to judge a Territory's maturity by the caliber of its citizenry or by its ability to enact and enforce progressive and constructive legislation, the conclusion to be drawn in Alaska's case is obvious."

The Senate committee heard more than 40 witnesses who came from Alaska to support statehood, and has painstakingly studied the voluminous hearing of the House committee hearings conducted in Alaska during the Eightieth Congress. It is convinced that statehood is the wish of the majority of the citizens of Alaska, and that they are ready for it.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST STATEHOOD

The committee gave most careful consideration to the arguments and reasoning of opponents of statehood for Alaska. It was noted that no resident of the Territory appeared in opposition, but that the burden was carried by representatives of the fish-packing industry with headquarters in the States. Most of the opposition, however, was directed to certain specific provisions in H. R. 331 as it passed the House, and conscientious effort has been made to meet those that seemed to be meritorious to the committee. The chief arguments against the principle of statehood in Alaska appear to be:

1. That the Territory's estimated population in 1950 of 135,000 is too small for representation in Congress, or to support State government.

2. That its resources are insufficiently developed to permit it to support the financial burdens of statehood.

3. That it is noncontiguous, that is, that it is separated from the rest of the continental United States and hence remote from the political and economic centers of our national life.

As to the first, the committee is of the opinion that the statement of the Chief Executive of the United States, the President, is in accord with its own findings. The President's letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 5, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: I am highly gratified by the thorough and objective consideration which your committee is giving to H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, bills which would enable the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii to take their rightful place as members of the Union. As you know, I have long supported the objectives of these important bills which carry out the pledges made to the people of the two Territories. I sincerely hope that the Congress, during its present session, will enact legislation granting statehood to Alaska and Hawaii. The need is more urgent today that ever before. By such action, we will not only promote the welfare and development of the two Territories, but also greatly strengthen the security of our Nation as a whole.

It should not be forgotten that most of our present States achieved statehood at a relatively early period of their development. The stimulus of being admitted as full partners in the Union, and the challenge of managing their own affairs were among the most significant factors contributing to their growth and progress. Very few of our existing States, at the time of their admission to the Union, possessed potential resources, both human and natural, superior to those of Alaska and Hawaii. I am confident that Alaska and Hawaii, like our present States, will grow with statehood and because of statehood.

There is no necessity for me to repeat at this time the arguments for statehood. The many qualified witnesses who have appeared before your committee have, I am sure, presented convincing evidence both as to the need for and the tangible benefits to be derived from statehood. There is, however, one objection made by opponents of H. R. 331 and H. R. 49 which I believe requires further discussion because it goes beyond the question of statehood and raises a fundamental constitutional issue. I am referring to the objection that Alaska and Hawaii as States would be entitled to representation in the Senate of the United States disproportionate to their population.

The argument is not only entirely without merit, but also directly attacks a basic tenet of the constitutional system under which this Nation has grown and prospered. Without the provision of equal representation in the Senate of all States, both great and small, regardless of population, there probably would have been no United States. This was one of the great compromises which the Federalist says was a result "not of theory but of a spirit of amity, and that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable." There is no justification for denying statehood to Alaska and Hawaii on the basis of an issue which was resolved by the Constitutional Convention in 1787.

America justly takes pride in its record of fulfilling to the letter its obligations to foreign nations. We should be no less scrupulous in carrying out the promises made to our own citizens in Alaska and Hawaii. The case of statehood rests on both legal and moral grounds.

These are troubled times. I know of few better ways in which we can demonstrate to the world our deep faith in democracy and the principle of self-government than by admitting Alaska and Hawaii to the Union as the forty-ninth and fiftieth States.

Sincerely,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

FINANCIAL BURDENS OF STATEHOOD

Differing points of view as to the ability of the Territory to support State government were presented to the committee. Attention is directed to the testimony of Mrs. Mildred Hermann, secretary to the Alaska Statehood Commission, who went into the subject in great detail at the hearings (hearings, p. 109).

The committee, after giving this matter extended consideration, is satisfied that Alaska can assume all essential additional costs of statehood. There has been a prevalent idea that the Federal Government now bears the greater share of the cost of services which are the responsibility of State governments. This is not the case.

Alaska as a Territory has created and now supports all such services except in areas which are reserved to the Federal Government by limitations set forth in the organic act. The most important functions provided by the Federal Government are the courts and law enforcement system, protection and conservation of the fish and game, care and treatment of the insane, and the major share of the road construction and maintenance program.

The Territorial government has built up departments or boards of health, education, welfare, agriculture, labor, taxation, aviation, development, communications, highways and highway patrol, and includes offices of attorney general, treasurer, auditor, as well as a large number of additional regulatory boards and commissions. The current rate of expenditure for Territorial purposes as provided for by the 1949 legislature is approximately $9,200,000 per annum. This figure covers certain deficiency and nonrecurring expenditures. The current rate of collection of revenues is approximately $10,000,000 per annum.

The revenues of the Territorial government are derived from a series of taxes and excises which were revamped and greatly supplemented by the 1949 legislature. It includes a Territorial income tax amounting to 10 percent of the Federal levy, a general property tax, excise taxes on the production of salmon and other fishery products, miscellaneous business license taxes, and other excise taxes, including taxes on liquor and motor fuel. The income and general property taxes for Territorial purposes are new, the Territorial government having previously been financed entirely by a variety of excise and license taxes.

The committee believes that Alaska's ability to finance necessary or desirable public services is well within its economic ability. Resources and production are the foundations of the tax structure, and Alaska has both great natural resources and a high per capita rate of production. It should also be noted that there is no fixed or arbitrary level of expenditure which must be maintained by State governments. Expenditures should be "tailored to fit the cloth." There is no reason to believe that the people of Alaska through their elected representatives will fail to meet their obligations or be unable to do a businesslike job of making expenditures meet their revenues.

Noncontiguity: The argument that Alaska should be denied statehood because the peninsula happens to be noncontiguous to the rest of the continental United States appears to be almost wholly lacking in merit, either historically or factually. Historically, noncontiguity has never been a requirement nor followed as a precedent. California was admitted in 1850 when some 1,500 miles or more of plains and mountains and wilderness—a wilderness infested by hostile Indians—separated her from the nearest State of the United States. It is interesting to note that some of the very same arguments were used in the Thirty-first Congress in 1850 against the admission of California, and later Oregon, which was contiguous only to California, as are being used against the admission of Alaska.

Factually, in this day of radio, television, telegraph, and the airplane, Alaska is much nearer to Washington, D. C., in travel and communication time than were Boston and New York at the time of the formation of the Union. This fact is so self-evident as to require no elaboration. However, the following historical comparisons are of interest:

The fastest time by the famed Pony Express from the jumping-off place in the then sparsely populated and financially poor Territory of Nebraska to California was 9 days. This service, of course, was only for mail, at $5 a half ounce.

The best stagecoach time from the terminal in St. Joseph, Mo., to San Francisco, was 25 days.

The record for a sailing vessel in 1950 was established by the clipper Sea Witch which made the trip from New York around the Horn to San Francisco in 97 days.

Today, Juneau, capital of Alaska, is but 22 hours by air from Washington. Regular ship time between Seattle and Seward and Whittier, the Territory's principal ports is 5 to 7 days.

In addition, throughout the greater part of the year, automobiles and trucks can travel from the Northwestern States to Fairbanks, Alaska, in about 5 days.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

A section analysis of the bill, with citation of corresponding provisions found in the enabling acts of other States, is set forth in the appendix. However, the committee wishes to point out that the bill, as amended, in its opinion would be the most generous enabling act under which any State ever came into the Union.

As to lands, the State of Alaska would be authorized to choose more than 21,000,000 acres of the public domain in the Territory best adapted to development of community centers and the particular needs of Alaska. All the riches of the soil and the subsoil in the selected areas would be transferred to the new State, subject to the valid, existing rights of mining claim locators, homesteaders, use permittees, and holders of any other established interests. The committee is of the opinion that such a grant, with its power of selection, will be of great benefit to the State in meeting the financial obligations of statehood.

The new State would have the same control over the invaluable fisheries and wildlife within its borders as do other States of the Union, subject only to the limitations of international agreements, such as that affecting seals, and to native rights to fish and wildlife.

CONCLUSION

Decision one for Eighty-first Congress: The committee wishes to emphasize that its members, as Senators in the Eighty-first Congress, are keenly aware of the fact that the acts of one Congress do not bind another Congress, and that the hand of the founding fathers and of the 1787 Congress, reaching across 163 years of turbulent history, should not force the hand of the 1950 Congress. Neither do dicta of the judicial branch, even by the highest Court, control the policy decisions of the legislative branch.

The matter of enabling in 1950 the Territory of Alaska to become a State of the United States is within the sound discretion of the Eighty-first Congress.

However, the committee does believe that the past can be used as a useful guide for the present and future. Therefore, it feels justified in calling the attention of the Senate to the historic precedents, and in pointing out that refusal to pass the measure would be breaking the historic mold in which our Nation has expanded and grown great.

After thorough hearings and careful study, the committee has found that our fellow Americans in Alaska merit statehood, that they desire it and that they are ready, willing, and able to support it. The committee believes that statehood would be in the best interests of the United States as a whole and of the people of the Territory. It therefore earnestly recommends that the Senate take affirmative action on this measure which is a major plank in the platforms of both major parties.

EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT REPORTS

The favorable reports of the Department of the Interior, the Department of Defense, and the Department of State, as well as the recommendations of the Federal Reserve Board and the Judicial Conference Committee of the Chief Justice of the United States are set forth below.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: Reference is made to H. R. 331, a bill to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union, which was passed by the House of Representatives on March 3, 1950, and which is now pending before your committee.

I am wholeheartedly in favor of granting of statehood to Alaska and I strongly urge the enactment of H. R. 331, with the amendment hereinafter suggested.

In October of 1946 the people of Alaska offered incontrovertible proof of their desire for statehood when a substantial majority voted in favor of that status at a plebiscite. This clear indication of their political aspirations had been readily predicted, for the people of Alaska, who adhere as completely to democratic traditions as their fellow citizens in the continental United States, are not content to remain indefinitely in a status that denies them the responsibilities and privileges of full participation in the political life of the Nation.

The people of Alaska, however, do not merely desire statehood. They are fully prepared for it.

Alaska has been a part of the United States for more than three-quarters of a century. Beginning in 1867, when the Territory was purchased, American pioneers moved in from the West to settle in this great Northwest extension of their country. In that early period there was no Territorial government and no Territorial law, and the Americans newly settled there conducted their affairs in accordance with the laws, social customs, and business practices of the continental States and Territories from which they had come. As early as 1872, prior to the gold rush, a number of Sitka citizens appealed for representation in the Congress. They assembled unofficially, and had even elected their delegate at one time—all this when half of our continental West was still in Territorial status. It is abundantly clear then that Alaska was, and is, basically American in thought and tradition.

Politically, Alaska is mature. It has had a popularly elected legislature since 1912. That its citizens are politically alert and articulate is evidenced by their long experience in the management of Territorial affairs and the sustained efforts they have made to advance their political status. The Territorial legislature has enacted many wise and farsighted laws, testifying not only to a knowledge of democratic processes, but also to full awareness of how best to utilize them. A full 6 years before the adoption of the nineteenth amendment, suffrage had been extended to the women of Alaska. Alaska was the first to pass 8-hour day work laws; a regular workmen's compensation act; and social-security measures that took old-age assistance completely out of the undesirable realm of condescending charity. In the absence of specific requirements, if we were to judge a Territory's maturity by the caliber of its citizenry or by its ability to enact and enforce progressive and constructive legislation, the conclusion to be drawn in Alaska's case is obvious.

Alaska's estimated population of 94,000 is larger than that of at least 10 States at the time of their admission into the Union, and it is ample to support a State government. The total has been growing steadily since 1920, with an increase exceeding a thousand for every year since 1920. If Alaska became a State, the expansion of population that has invariably followed the creation of continental States would undoubtedly occur. The resources of Alaska can readily maintain a considerably increased population.

I do not share the feeling that has been sometimes expressed that statehood is economically impracticable for Alaska. It is true that at present the Federal Government bears the cost of many facilities and services which Alaska would have to assume as a State. But statehood would act as an incentive to the broadening of the tax base within Alaska and the tapping of additional sources of revenue. The people of Alaska have demonstrated their readiness to assume the financial burden that statehood will bring by recently enacting a local income-tax law, the first income-tax law in the Territory's history. I can think of no stronger answer to objections to statehood for Alaska based on the inevitability of an increased local financial burden than that its taxpayers have shown that they are prepared to meet the cost.

Alaska's noncontiguity to the continental United States has on occasion been cited as a bar to its admission to the Union. Modern transportation and communication have made the factor of distance an unimportant consideration. It is fair to say that developments in the field of aviation alone have made the establishment of a State government practicable even for so vast and distant an area. It should be added, moreover, that many phases of the government of Alaska which are now conducted long distance from Washington would be conducted within its own boundaries if it were a State.

In the light of all these considerations, I can see no valid reason for the denial of statehood to Alaska, and I urge, therefore, that the Congress speedily approve machinery which would enable the people of that area to form a constitution and be admitted into the Union.

Among other things, H. R. 331 contains provisions for the grant of public lands to the proposed State which would permit Alaska to enter into the Union on a basis similar to that on which the western continental States were admitted. Specifically, the bill provides for Federal grants which would allow Alaska over 41,000,000 acres for the support of its common schools, over 438,000 acres for the support of its agricultural college and school of mines, and 1,000,000 acres for other internal improvements. This is a greater amount of public lands than any other State has received upon its admission.

For the purpose of bringing about a division of the fish and wildlife activities now conducted by the United States in Alaska, along lines of demarcation conforming to the recognized distinctions between Federal and State functions, I recommend adoption of the following amendment to section 5 of the bill:

On page 9, lines 1 to 9, strike out the following:

"All the property of the United States situated in the Territory of Alaska used in connection with the conservation and protection of the fisheries and of the fur and game of Alaska is hereby transferred and conveyed to the State of Alaska. The State of Alaska shall possess and exercise the same jurisdiction and control over the fisheries and the fur and game of Alaska as are possessed and exercised by the several States within their respective territorial limits, including adjacent waters."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"All real and personal property of the United States situated in the Territory of Alaska which is used in connection with the conservation and protection of the fisheries and wildlife of Alaska, under the provisions of the Alaska game law of July 1, 1943 (57 Stat. 301; 48 U. S. C., secs. 192–211), as amended, and under the provisions of the Alaska commercial fisheries laws of June 26, 1906 (34 Stat. 478; 48 U. S. C., secs. 230–239 and 241–242), and June 6, 1924 (43 Stat. 465; 48 U. S. C., secs. 221–228), as supplemented and amended, is hereby transferred and conveyed to the State of Alaska: Provided, That such transfer shall not include lands withdrawn or otherwise set apart as refuges or reservations for the protection of wildlife nor facilities utilized in connection therewith, or in connection with general research activities relating to fisheries or wildlife. The State of Alaska shall possess and exercise the same jurisdiction and control over the fisheries and the wildlife of Alaska, except fur seals and sea otters, as are possessed and exercised by the several States within their territorial limits, including adjacent waters. At the close of each fiscal year, commencing with the year during which Alaska is admitted into the Union, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the State of Alaska 50 percent of the net proceeds, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, derived during such fiscal year from all sales of seal skins or sea otter skins made in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 26, 1944 (58 Stat. 100; 16 U. S. C., secs. 631a–631q), as supplemented and amended."

This proposed amendment would transfer to the State of Alaska the same jurisdiction and control over the fisheries and wildlife therein as are possessed and exercised by the existing States within their territorial limits and adjacent waters. Authority over matters affecting migratory birds would not be transferred, since this is a subject which is governed by Federal law throughout the Union. Similarly, authority over matters affecting fur seals and sea otters would be expressly excepted from the transfer to the proposed State. Both of these situations involve the discharge of international commitments undertaken by the United States through treaty or convention. Express mention of seals and sea otters is made in the amendment, because the habitat of these animals, unlike that of migratory birds, is largely confined to Alaska.

Under the language of the proposed amendment, the State of Alaska would obtain title to all real and personal property of the United States primarily used in the administration of the Alaska game law and the Alaska commercial fisheries laws. On the other hand, the United States would retain administrative jurisdiction over the Pribilof Islands, and over all other Federal lands and waters in Alaska which have been set aside as wildlife refuges or reservations pursuant to the fur seal and sea otter laws, the migratory bird laws, or other Federal statutes of general application. The United States would also retain general research facilities relating to fisheries or wildlife. Since the principal breeding grounds of the seals and sea otters are situated in Alaska, it seems only fair that the proposed State should receive a portion of the income derived from the administration of these resources. Accordingly, the amendment would grant to Alaska one-half of the net proceeds from sales of seal skins and sea otter skins by the United States.

Examination of the details of the bill reveals that a number of its provisions could be improved, not only from the standpoint of clarity, but also from that of consistency with the terms on which existing States were admitted into the Union and other established precedents. For instance, those provisions of paragraph "Second" of section 3 which are designed to maintain the status quo with respect to the taxation of native property in Alaska until such time as the Congress may deem fit to change that status, depart from the pattern of prior enabling acts by failing to enumerate all of the situations where tax exemptions are presently in effect. The maintenance of the authority of Congress over Indian affairs, as well as the safeguarding of the interests of the natives, plainly call for the application to Alaska at this time of the same principle of Federal supremacy in matters affecting the taxation of trust or restricted Indian property that has been followed in the continental United States. However, the legislative action needed to remedy this deficiency in the bill, together with certain others, could very well be deferred until a later date, since a substantial period of time must elapse between the enactment of the bill and the admission of the proposed State of Alaska into the Union, pursuant to its terms. During that interval, I plan to submit recommendations for the appropriate resolution of these subsidiary problems.

Alaska has formed a part of this Nation for over 80 years. It is time that the period of apprenticeship served by the people of Alaska be brought to a close. Statehood for Alaska, I am convinced, would link that area more closely to the continental United States in every respect. I also believe that Alaska, if granted full powers of statehood, would be in a position to expand promptly its own industrial, commercial, and agricultural development. Statehood would encourage the migration of new settlers, increasing Alaska's financial and human resources. Statehood would permit Alaska to foster and protect the development of its natural riches. Most important of all, statehood would give Alaska's people their rightful voice in the Federal Government, as well as in the management of their own affairs.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised me that the objective of this proposed legislation is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

OSCAR L. CHAPMAN,
Secretary of the Interior.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND
INSULAR AFFAIRS,
March 30, 1950.

Hon. LOUIS JOHNSON,
The Secretary of Defense,
The Pentagon, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you doubtless are aware, the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has before it two bills, H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, which would admit the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, respectively, into the Federal Union as States. In connection with its consideration of this proposed legislation, the committee requires authoritative information from the Department of Defense as to the advantages, if any, from a point of view of national defense, of extending statehood to these Territories. Specifically, would statehood for Alaska and Hawaii give greater strength to our military position in those areas than does the present Territorial organization of the local government?

Hearings on the Alaska bill are scheduled to start April 24 and those on Hawaii on May 1. Would you be good enough to have a qualified member of the Defense Department ready to give the committee factual information with respect to the relative advantages and disadvantages of statehood for the defense of each of these Territories at these hearings? If you deem it desirable, the Defense Department can be heard in executive session, and any statements made at the time will not be made public.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, April 18, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: This letter is further in response to your communication of March 30, 1950, in which you make reference to two bills, H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, which, if enacted, would admit the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, respectively, into the Federal Union as States. Because I understand that your committee intends on April 24 to commence hearings on H. R. 331, which concerns Alaska, and to hold hearings beginning May 1 on H. R. 49, the Hawaiian proposal, I address this letter to you for the purpose of expressing the concurrence of the Department of Defense in both proposals.

As you know, the administration has repeatedly expressed itself as favoring Hawaiian and Alaskan statehood and both proposals have again and again been introduced by the President. On January 4, in his State of the Union message, President Truman urged that the Congress during 1950 grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii. The enactment of H. R. 49 and H. R. 331 would, I believe, effectively accomplish this objective.

You asked in your letter of March 30 as to whether from the point of view of national defense, it would be advantageous to extend statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, and you inquired specifically as to whether statehood would give greater strength to our military position in those areas than does the present Territorial type of local government. It is obvious that the more stable a local government can be, the more successful would be the control and defense of the area in case of sudden attack. There can be no question but that in the event of an attack any State would be immensely aided in the initial stages of the emergency by the effective use of the State and local instrumentalities of law and order. By the same token it would seem to me that, as persons in a position to assist the Federal garrisons which might exist in Hawaii or Alaska, the locally elected governors, sheriffs, and the locally selected constabulary and civil-defense units all would be of tremendous value in cases of sudden peril. Therefore, my answer to your question is that statehood for Alaska and Hawaii would undoubtedly give a considerable added measure of strength to the overall defense of both areas in event of emergency.

I am not attempting in this letter to endorse the specific language of either of the bills under consideration, but I do wish strongly to support the principle of granting immediate statehood to both the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii as in the best interest of the United States and of all of its peoples both here and in the Territories.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND
INSULAR AFFAIRS,
April 7, 1950.

Hon. DEAN G. ACHESON,
The Secretary of State, State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you doubtless are aware, the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has before it two bills, H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, which would admit the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, respectively, into the Federal Union as States. In connection with its consideration of this proposed legislation, the committee requires authoritative information from the Department of State as to what effect, if any, extension of statehood of these Territories would have upon the foreign relations of the United States.

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii presents new and different problems from those that have been encountered up to the present in the admission of States, since both areas are noncontiguous to the United States. Also, in each there are large racial groups, comparatively, whose educational and cultural standards differ markedly from those of the United States and who have little familiarity with our traditions, our political institutions, and our responsibilities.

It is recalled that certain representatives of the Soviet Union are reported to have made references to the treaty by which Alaska was purchased and to have indicated some possible interest in the future return of the Territory to Russian sovereignty. It is noted that western Alaska and eastern Siberia are extremely close geographically.

Hearings on the Alaska bill are scheduled to open on April 24 and those on Hawaii on May 1. Would you be good enough to have a qualified officer of the State Department ready to give the committee factual information and the Department's views on the effects of the inclusion within the United States, politically speaking, of these strategic noncontiguous areas with their diverse population elements? If you deem it desirable, the State Department can be heard in executive session, and the facts and opinions presented will not be made public.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 20, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: This is to acknowledge your letter of April 7 addressed to Secretary Acheson informing him of the hearings on the Alaska and Hawaii bills which are scheduled to open on April 24 and May 1, respectively, and inviting the Department to have a qualified officer ready to give the committee factual information and the Department views on the possible effects of the inclusion of these Territories within the United States.

When similar proposals were before the Senate last year, you were good enough to invite the views of the Department, which were furnished to you in letters dated July 7 and June 29, 1949. The views of the Department remain as then stated. The Department perceives no objection to the provisions of these bills from the standpoint of the foreign policy of the United States and considers that the admission of these Territories to the Union would be in conformity with the traditional policy of the United States toward the peoples of Territories under its administration who have not yet become fully self-governing. It continues to feel that favorable action on these bills by the Congress would be an act in fulfillment of the obligation assumed by the United States in accepting the declaration regarding non-self-governing Territories set out in chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and would thus serve to support American foreign policy and strengthen the position of the United States in international affairs.

With reference to the final paragraph of your letter, the Department is glad to accept your invitation and will have a qualified officer ready to give the committee such factual information as the committee may wish to have, insofar as the Department of State is concerned.

Sincerely yours,
JACK K. MCFALL,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 7, 1949.

The Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: On June 13, 1949, you transmitted to the Department of State for its study and report a bill, S. 2036, to provide for the admission of the Territory of Alaska into the Union.

The Department has examined this bill carefully and, from the standpoint of the foreign policy of the United States, perceives no objection to the provisions contained therein.

Admission to the Union would fulfill the expressed aspiration of the people of Alaska. The outcome of a plebiscite held in Alaska 3 years ago on the question of proposed statehood resulted in a substantial majority of votes in favor of that status. Moreover, such action would be in conformity with the traditional policy of the United States toward the peoples of Territories under its administration who have not yet become fully self-governing.

The Department considers that action by the Congress in according statehood to Alaska would be an act of fulfillment of the obligation assumed by the United States in accepting the declaration regarding non-self-governing Territories set out in chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and would thus serve to support American foreign policy and strengthen the position of the United States in international affairs. We have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that the proposed legislation is in accord with the program of the President and that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,
ERNEST A. GROSS,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: It is understood that there are now pending before your committee bills providing for the admission to statehood of the Territory of Alaska (H. R. 331) and the Territory of Hawaii (H. R. 49) which passed the House of Representatives on March 3 and March 7, 1950, respectively.

When bills on this subject were previously under consideration by Congress, the Board of Governors recommended to your committee in January 1948 and again in May 1949, an amendment relating to membership in the Federal Reserve System of national banks located in any Territory which is admitted to statehood. This is a matter which affects the banking structure of the United States and is of direct interest to the Board and the Federal Reserve System. Accordingly, the Board wishes to renew its recommendation in connection with the Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood bills now pending.

The Federal Reserve Act contains in section 19 a provision which makes membership in the Federal Reserve System optional in the case of national banks which are located in Alaska, in dependencies and insular possessions, and in "any part of the United States outside the continental United States." This provision was enacted in 1913 when it was apparently the feeling of Congress that national banks in the Territories and dependencies were so distant and remote as to make it unnecessary to require them to be members of the Federal Reserve System. Because of this provision, membership in the system of national banks located in Alaska and Hawaii would continue to be optional if those Territories should become States in accordance with the provisions of the pending bills, H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, as those bills now read.

Since the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act in 1913, the tremendous progress of air transportation has brought both Alaska and Hawaii so close that today it cannot be said that the economic and banking structures of Alaska and Hawaii are unrelated to those of the United States proper. Travel and transportation to these Territories are now a matter of hours instead of weeks as was the case in 1913; and, consequently, the advantages and privileges of membership in the Federal Reserve System would now be much more readily available to banks in Alaska and Hawaii. Moreover, banking conditions in these Territories have changed considerably since the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act. The total deposits of Hawaiian banks are many times as great as they were in 1913; and their total resources today are more than those of all banks in some of the States of the Union. While there is only one national bank in Hawaii at the present time, that bank is larger than any bank in 23 of the existing States. At the present time, there are 4 national banks in Alaska with total deposits of over $30,000,000. None of the national banks in either Alaska or Hawaii is now a member of the Federal Reserve System.

It is the feeling of the Board, therefore, that if Congress should decide that the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii may now properly be admitted to statehood, national banks in the proposed States of Alaska and Hawaii should be subject to the same responsibilities and obligations as national banks located in any other State of the Union. The pending bills provide that, upon becoming States, Alaska and Hawaii shall be on an equal footing with the other States. It would seem logical that this equality should exist in the field of banking as well as in other respects and that, consequently, the proposed new States should be included in the Federal Reserve districts and that national banks in Alaska and Hawaii should be subject to the same requirements as other national banks.

Under present law, all national banks in the existing States of the Union are required to be members of the Federal Reserve System and, as such members, to be insured banks and to be governed by the many important statutory limitations and restrictions which by their terms are applicable to members and insured banks. These restrictions and limitations are not at present applicable to national banks in Alaska and Hawaii; and they would continue to be inapplicable if these Territories should become States in accordance with the provisions of the pending statehood bills unless the bills are appropriately amended.

In the Board's opinion, there is no sound reason why any national banks located in a new State of the Union, enjoying the prestige and privileges conferred by organization under the National Bank Act, including the right to act as depositories of Government funds, should be exempt in this manner from the obligations and responsibilities which must be assumed by national banks in other States.

The Board recommends, therefore, that there be included in these bills a section which would have the effect of requiring national banks in any Territory to become members of the Federal Reserve System upon the formal admission of such Territory as a State of the Union. A draft of a brief amendment which would have this effect is enclosed herewith.

When a bill providing statehood for the Territory of Hawaii was under consideration in 1948, the Board consulted with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Comptroller of the Currency regarding the amendment proposed by the Board. Both of these agencies advised that they concurred in the Board's opinion that national banks located in any Territory should be required to become members of the Federal Reserve System upon the admission of the Territory to statehood.

The Board hopes that this matter will receive favorable consideration by your committee. We have heretofore been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that the Bureau has no objection to the submission of this recommendation by the Board.

Very truly yours,
S. R. CARPENTER, Secretary.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H. R. 49 AND H. R. 331

Insert in the bill H. R. — a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. —. The first paragraph of section 2 of the Federal Reserve Act (U. S. C., title 12, secs. 222 and 223) is amended by striking out the last sentence thereof and inserting in lieu of such sentence the following: 'When any State is hereafter admitted to the Union the Federal Reserve districts shall be readjusted by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in such manner as to include each State. Every national bank in any State shall, upon commencing business or within 90 days after admission into the Union of the State in which it is located, become a member bank of the Federal Reserve System by subscribing and paying for stock in the Federal Reserve bank of its district in accordance with the provisions of this act and shall thereupon be an insured bank under section 12B of this Act, and failure to do so shall subject such bank to the penalty provided by the sixth paragraph of this section.'"

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 15, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: As chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee appointed by the Chief Justice to collaborate with Congress in the recent revision of title 28 of the United States Code, I have examined H. R. 331, the bill to provide statehood for Alaska, which passed the House of Representatives on March 3.

I find that the bill which was originally drawn prior to the revision of title 28 should be amended in a number of respects so as to conform with the present provisions of that title. I have accordingly prepared amendments to accomplish this, two copies of which I enclose, together with two copies of a memorandum which I think fully explains the suggested amendments and the reasons for them.

I am taking the liberty of submitting these to you at this time in order that they may be before your committee when it comes to consider the bill.

With kindest regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

ALBERT B. MARIS.

MEMORANDUM RE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO H. R. 331 (ALASKA STATEHOOD BILL)

I

The first amendment proposes to strike out all of section 10 of the bill and to insert a substitute section. The present section 10 provides that Alaska shall constitute a Federal judicial district with a district court consisting of one district judge and other appropriate officers. It is, of course, intended that the new United States District Court for the District of Alaska shall be a United States district court exactly on all fours with the present United States district courts in all the other States. All of these district courts are now provided for in title 28, United States Code, "Judiciary and Judicial Procedure," which title has been enacted into positive law by the act of June 25, 1948. It is, therefore, highly desirable that section 10 be amended so as to incorporate the provisions with respect to the new United States District Court for the District of Alaska directly into title 28 of the United States Code which is the place where they should appear in the permanent law. Otherwise the task of the revision staff of the House Committee on the Judiciary in incorporating the provisions of the act into the United States Code will be quite difficult and the purpose of enacting title 28 as positive law to that extent defeated.

As a matter of fact the present provisions of title 28 with respect to United States district courts, the holding of their terms, the appointment of clerks, deputy clerks, United States attorneys, and marshals, are quite adequate in every way to cover the new United States District Court for the District of Alaska if provision for that court is made by amendment of the appropriate sections of title 28. Likewise various sections of title 18, United States Code, which has also been enacted into positive law, will adequately take care of the provisions of section 10 with respect to Mount McKinley National Park.

The proposed amendment to section 10 accordingly substitutes for the present section the necessary amendments to title 28, United States Code, to provide for the setting up of Alaska as a Federal judicial district, for the holding of court at Anchorage, Fairbanks, Juneau, and Nome, and for the appointment of one district judge therein. The proposed new section 10 also amends various sections of titles 28 and 18, United States Code, where necessary to strike out references to the present District Court for the Territory of Alaska, which references will be wholly inappropriate after statehood since that court will then terminate its existence.

The final paragraph of the present section 10 of the bill with respect to the prior residence of persons appointed district judge, attorney, marshal, etc., is not presently the law with respect to the United States district court in any other State. Accordingly, while appropriate for a Territory, it would seem to be quite inappropriate in the case of a State which is represented by two Senators entitled to vote upon the confirmation of such officers. It is significant that by the Hawaii statehood bill, H. R. 49, a similar provision of the organic act of the Territory of Hawaii is being eliminated with respect to the United States District Court for the District of Hawaii after statehood. This provision accordingly is not included in the proposed amendment to section 10.

II

Section 12 refers to the "United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit" in three places. By the revision of title 28, United States Code, the name of the court has been changed to "United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit." Accordingly the amendment to section 12 proposes to strike out "Circuit" from the title of the court in the three places where it appears.

III

The amendment to section 13 proposes to make a similar correction in the title of the court of appeals and also to insert the word "court" where it has been inadvertently omitted in line 12, page 19.

APPENDIX 3

Set forth below is a memorandum of law on incorporation of Territories and its legal effects, as well as the legal obligations of the United States to such Territories under the United Nations Charter. This legal study was submitted to the committee by the Secretary of the Interior at the request of the chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
DIVISION OF TERRITORIES AND ISLAND POSSESSIONS,
Washington, May 10, 1950.

Memorandum to: The Secretary.

From: Chief counsel.

Subject: United States obligation to grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii.

In accordance with your request, there follows a discussion of the United States obligation to admit Alaska and Hawaii to the Union. The views incorporated in this memorandum have been submitted to the House Public Lands Committee at the time of its hearings on the two statehood bills; for the House committee, like the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, expressed an interest in the question. This memorandum has been cleared informally with Assistant Secretary of State Hickerson. The portion relating to our obligations under the United Nations Charter was prepared in the Department of State.

I. OBLIGATION ASSUMED BY THE UNITED STATES UNDER CHAPTER XI OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN RELATION TO STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII

The question has been raised whether the admission of Alaska and Hawaii to the Union would, having regard to the provisions of chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations, constitute a precedent requiring similar action in respect to other United States Territories and possessions.

Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations is a "Declaration Regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories." Under that chapter the United States, as a Government responsible for the administration of certain non-self-governing territories, accepted the obligation, among others, "to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement." As will be apparent from this language, this constitutes an obligation to develop self-government in the Territories, and possessions of the United States, but as will be equally apparent, it is not a commitment to develop such self-government in a specific manner or toward a specific goal, such as statehood. The Charter of the United Nations, in its provisions relation to non-self-governing territories, neither diminishes nor increases the powers of Congress to determine the constitutional status of United States Territories and possessions. Accordingly, the granting of statehood to Alaska and Hawaii would not obligate the United States to give a similar status to its remaining Territories or possessions in order to fulfill its obligations under the United Nations Charter but would leave this Government in future full freedom to deal with other situations or cases in accordance with the particular circumstances of each Territory.

II. OBLIGATIONS ASSUMED UNDER DOMESTIC LAW

Although the United States has assumed no international obligation to grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii or to any of the other non-self-governing areas under its administration, it has by implication promised the two Territories of Alaska and Hawaii that when they had shown that they were qualified to exercise the prerogatives and discharge the responsibilities of statehood, they would be advanced to that status on an equal footing with the other 48 States. The implied promise referred to arises from the action of the Congress in "incorporating" both Territories by the express extension to them of the Constitution and from the implications of incorporation.

The distinction between incorporated and unincorporated territories was first clearly drawn by the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Insular cases, De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 1) and Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244), in 1901, although the first incorporated Territory was created in 1787. The question before the Court was whether the constitutional requirement that duties, imposts, and excises be uniform "throughout the United States" had been extended to Puerto Rico so as to render invalid a provision of Puerto Rico's organic act establishing a schedule of customs duties on merchandise from Puerto Rico entering the continental United States. The Court decided that Puerto Rico was not a part of the United States for the purposes of the constitutional provision, because it had not been "incorporated." Subsequent decisions pointed out that "incorporation occurs when a territory is made a part of the United States, as distinguished from merely belonging to it," and that "incorporation is not to be assumed without express declaration, or an implication so strong as to exclude any other view" (Balzac v. People of Porto Rico (258 U. S. 298 (1922)).

It is settled that incorporation of a territory takes place when the Constitution is expressly extended to it. Section 5 of the Organic Act of Hawaii (act of April 30, 1900, 31 Stat. 141, 48 U. S. C., 1946 ed., sec. 495) provides: "The Constitution * * * shall have the same force and effect within the Territory of Hawaii as elsewhere in the United States," and identical language with respect to the application of the Constitution to Alaska is contained in section 3 of the Organic Act of Alaska (act of August 24, 1912, 37 Stat. 512, 48 U. S. C., 1946 ed., sec. 23). The incorporated status of both Alaska and Hawaii has been given judicial recognition (Nagle v. United States (191 Fed. 141 (1911)); Rassmussen v. United States (197 U. S. 516 (1905)); United States v. Farwell (76 F. Supp. 35 (1948)); cf. Hawaii v. Mankichi (190 U. S. 197 (1903)).

There are at least three reasons for the emphasis on clear evidence of intent to incorporate. One is that by incorporating a Territory the Congress subjects itself to certain limitations upon its power subsequently to legislate for that Territory which do not apply when it legislates for an unincorporated area. This was established by the Insular cases. For example, the Congress could not withdraw from the people of an incorporated Territory the right to a jury trial guaranteed by the Constitution, Rassmussen v. United States (197 U. S. 529 (1905)), but need not grant the right to the people of an unincorporated Territory, Balzac v. People of Porto Rico, supra; Dorr v. United States (195 U. S. 138 (1904)) (Philippine Islands). The second reason is that it is generally agreed that the act of incorporation is irrevocable, since the Constitution, once extended cannot be withdrawn. See the concurring opinions in Rassmussen v. United States, supra (pp. 530, 536); Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law (4th ed., 1931, p. 214). The third, and most important here, is that the act of incorporation has consistently been regarded as a commitment by the Congress ultimately to admit as a State the area incorporated. In the Balzac case, supra, the Supreme Court said that "incorporation has always been a step, and an important one, leading to statehood." In McAllister v. United States (141 U. S. 174, 188 (1891)). Territorial government was described as temporary and destined to be "superseded when the Territories becames States of the Union." In Ex parte Morgan (20 F. 298, 305 (1883)), a Territory is described as "an inchoate State." In O'Donoghue v. United States (289 U. S. 526, 537 (1933)), the Court said that "the outlying continental public domain, of which the United States was the proprietor, was, from the beginning, destined for admission as a State or States into the Union." Constitutional law treaties contain similar statements. There are repeated references to the fact that the ultimate political status of Territories is statehood in the congressional debates on the organic acts. To cite an example, in the case of Alaska, Congressman Wedemeyer, of Michigan, declared that, by the treaty with Russia itself, "Alaska was incorporated into the body of the United States and * * * those people had the promise of future statehood for the Territory." In an effort to avoid the well-understood consequence of incorporation, namely statehood, when the Hawaiian organic act was being debated, Congressman Hill offered the following amendment: "Nothing in this act shall be construed, taken, or held to imply a pledge or promise that the Territory of Hawaii will at any future time be admitted as a State or attached to any State." (33 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3864.) The amendment was defeated. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is replete with other evidence that Members of Congress were aware of the significance of proposed incorporation and considered it to be a first step in the direction of statehood.

The strongest possible argument that incorporation is a step toward statehood is historical precedent. All incorporated Territories except Alaska and Hawaii have become States. The first of a series of organic acts for incorporated Territories was the Northwest Ordinance of 1787. Besides providing the framework of government for the Northwest Territory, which was erected upon lands ceded to the Federal Government by the Thirteen Original States, the ordinance outlined a policy with respect to ultimate status for the Territory which was followed for Territories subsequently acquired. It provided that when the population in any of the districts into which the Territory was divided should reach 60,000, the district was to be admitted into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States. Organic legislation subsequently enacted for the Southwest Territory, Indian Territory, the Territory of Michigan, the Territory of Illinois, and the Territory of Orleans, among others, incorporated the territory to which they applied and made provision for ultimate statehood. One by one, all the incorporated Territories on the mainland have been admitted, as one or more States to the Union. The constitutional status of Alaska and Hawaii is identical to those of the mainland Territories, and there is no legal basis for treating them in any different way. Although the organic acts of Alaska and Hawaii do not refer in explicit terms to statehood, the fact that they extend the Constitution and thereby incorporate the areas into the Union is sufficient. Once an area has been incorporated into the Union, the only question which remains for determination is when it is to be advanced from the provisional status of a Territory to the permanent status of a State; the question whether it is to be admitted into the Union as a State is settled upon incorporation. It is for the Territory to make out a case that, at a particular time, it is qualified for statehood in terms of population, financial condition, and so on. These conditions go only to the time at which the pledge of ultimate statehood is to be redeemed. Until the incorporated Territory is admitted to statehood, its status as such a Territory must continue, assuming it to be sound constitutional doctrine, as I believe it is, that once the constitution is extended, it cannot be withdrawn. Thus Alaska and Hawaii differ in this respect from the unincorporated Territories. The Philippines were an unincorporated Territory, and consequently it was constitutionally possible to grant them their independence; had they been previously incorporated by extension of the Constitution, a serious constitutional question as to the propriety of independence would have arisen.

It is relevant to emphasize that admission of Alaska and Hawaii as States would not give the other areas presently subject to the administration of the United States a like claim to statehood as a matter of domestic law any more than it would provide a basis for a claim under the United Nations Charter. This is because Alaska and Hawaii are our only remaining incorporated Territories. Their admission would fulfill a long outstanding pledge and would complete a cycle originating with the Northwest Territory; it would not itself establish a precedent. Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are unincorporated territories. Puerto Rico's political status has been so described in the Insular cases and in the Balzac case cited above: the Virgin Islands are described in the Organic Act (49 State. 1807, 48 U. S. C., 1946 ed., sec. 1405a), as an "insular possession," which is shorthand for "unincorporated territory." Guam and American Samoa, by section 3 of the proposed organic acts pending before the Congress, are expressly declared to be "unincorporated" territories, specifically to preclude any claim on the part of either area to statehood as a right. No one of these areas can now identify its status wholly with that of Alaska or Hawaii for the purpose of bottoming a statehood claim. Should some future Congress determine it to be desirable to incorporate any one of these presently unincorporated territories, it may, of course, do so. If it does, however, that action will thereby give the area a claim to ultimate statehood which it does not now possess and which it cannot legally or morally derive from the action of Congress in admitting Alaska and Hawaii to statehood now. Each area must stand on its own merits in acquiring an incorporated status. When that hurdle is passed, then and then only has it a claim to statehood.

In summary, the admission of Alaska and Hawaii to the Union will not commit the United States to the admission of any other area under its administration in order to comply with its obligations under the United Nations Charter, nor will it provide a precedent for like treatment of the other territorial areas as a matter of domestic law. The nature of the status of Alaska and Hawaii as incorporated Territories affords them a claim to statehood on the basis of historical precedent in our treatment of every other incorporated territory, and at the same time distinguishes their case from that of every other territorial area presently under United States administration. The only question actually before Congress for determination is whether, as a matter of fact, Alaska and Hawaii are qualified for admission. Their eligibility as a matter of law was expressly recognized and established in 1912 and 1900, respectively, when they were incorporated into the Union.

IRWIN W. SILVERMAN,
Chief Counsel.

SEC. 2. As soon as practicable, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Comptroller of the Currency, acting as "The Reserve Bank Organization Committee," shall designate not less than eight nor more than twelve cities to be known as Federal reserve cities, and shall divide the continental United States, excluding Alaska, into districts, each district to contain only one of such Federal reserve cities. The determination of said organization committee shall not be subject to review except by the Federal Reserve Board when organized: Provided, That the districts shall be apportioned with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business and shall not necessarily be coterminous with any State or States. The districts thus created may be readjusted and new districts may from time to time be created by the Federal Reserve Board, not to exceed twelve in all. Such districts shall be known as Federal reserve districts and may be designated by number. [A majority of the organization committee shall constitute a quorum with authority to act.] When any State is hereafter admitted to the Union the Federal Reserve district shall be readjusted by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in such manner as to include such State. Every national bank in any State shall, upon commencing business or within ninety days after admission into the Union of the State in which it is located, become a member bank of the Federal Reserve System by subscribing and paying for stock in the Federal Reserve bank of its district in accordance with the provisions of this Act and shall thereupon be an insured bank under section 12B of this Act, and failure to do so shall subject such bank to the penalty provided by the sixth paragraph of this section.

UNITED NATIONS BANNER TO FLY AMONG VARIOUS NATIONAL FLAGS IN KOREA

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, last Friday, July 7, a historic decision was taken by the United Nations Security Council in its third great resolution passed in response to the invasion of Korea. This resolution recommended that all forces fighting against the Communist invaders be placed at the disposal of a unified command under the United States, and requested the United States to name the commander of all the forces engaged. Furthermore—and this is the point I wish to stress—it authorized that unified command to fly, together with the various national flags, the blue and white banner of the United Nations.

This of course is a purely symbolic action, Mr. President, and yet in my judgment it is an action of the highest importance. It signifies for all the world that our armed power, and that of the other nations who have joined us or may join us at a later date, is being used not merely to uphold the interest of any single nation or group of nations, but to uphold the world-wide principles of the United Nations Charter which have been so brutally violated by the Communist aggression.

By this action our commitment in the Korean battle is raised to a higher moral plane. The United States has been given the leadership, but that leadership is at the service of the free world. Under the direction of General MacArthur we can all be confident that the high mission which has been so largely entrusted to our own forces will be carried out in a manner which will do honor not only to the Stars and Stripes but to the flag of the United Nations as well.

I have made inquiries, Mr. President, concerning the implementation of this authority to use the United Nations emblem. I am informed that the flag handed to Ambassador Austin by Mr. Lie last week is now in Washington awaiting transportation to Korea, and that it is doubtful whether any UN flags exist in the battle area at the present moment, except the one flag entrusted to the UN Commission for Korea.

In view of what appears to me the tremendous symbolic meaning of this action, it seems to me very important that we act with speed to display the United Nations emblem in the battle area at the earliest possible moment. Wherever national emblems now appear—at command posts in the field, on naval vessels, or aircraft—the blue and white of the United Nations should immediately be raised beside them. I therefore suggest that whoever is charged with this matter on the ground should not wait for the arrival of the flag from Lake Success before putting the UN symbol into the field. We must immediately make it visibly plain to friend and enemy alike that the forces fighting and dying to defend Korea from ruthless aggression are acting not only for their own national interests but also on behalf of the organized opinion of all mankind.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the United Nations Security Council resolution to which I have referred, and the text of an editorial on this subject from the New York Times for Saturday, July 8, be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution and the editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UN COUNCIL'S RESOLUTION

The Security Council,

Having determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace,

Having recommended that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area.

1. Welcomes the prompt and vigorous support which Governments and peoples of the United Nations have given to its resolutions of 25 and 27 June, 1950, to assist the Republic of Korea in defending itself against armed attack and thus to restore international peace and security in the area;

2. Notes that members of the United Nations have transmitted to the United Nations offers of assistance for the Republic of Korea;

3. Recommends that all members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the aforesaid Security Council resolutions make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States;

4. Requests the United States to designate the commander of such forces;

5. Authorizes the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating;

6. Requests the United States to provide the Security Council with reports as appropriate on the course of action taken under the unified command.

[From the New York Times of July 8, 1950]

BANNER OF FREEDOM

Over the battlefields of Korea a new flag will fly tomorrow. The blue and white banner of the United Nations will take its place beside the starts and stripes at the head of the columns of young Americans who are fighting there in the cause of freedom. Units of other nations too are authorized to raise this standard as they take their place in the battle line. Thus for the first time in the long history of mankind's search for effective means of upholding international law and order, the identical flag of a great alliance will symbolize the solidarity of the forces now alined against aggression. Not only in the present and immediate test, but for the longer future, this first raising of an international flag upon the battlefield cannot fail to be momentous in its portent and its consequences.

In authorizing yesterday this historic action, the Security Council also provided for a unified command. The United States is requested to designate this commanding officer, and its choice, of course, will be General MacArthur. The same resolution of the Security Council recommends that all member nations place military forces at the disposal of this unified command for the purpose of checking the aggression launched by the North Korean Communists and restoring peace and order.

There has already been a gratifying response to the Security Council's first call for aid. This response may now be expected to take the concrete form of the dispatch of planes and ships and troops from many ports to the scene of action in Korea. Our own American determination in this matter was given additional proof when, almost at the same moment that the Security Council met at Lake Success, President Truman invoked the draft law as "a first step to build up to full operating strength the units of the Army, Navy and Air Force to be used in the Korean operation, to provide further maintenance and support therefor, and to replace units to be moved to Korea."

Thus, in two world capitals yesterday, governments and men who will no longer tolerate aggression rededicated themselves to the task to which they have put their hands.

Mr. LUCAS, Mr. KEFAUVER, and Mr. MCKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to admonish Senators that, beginning at 1 o'clock, the time is to be controlled until 4, and that if we are to conclude the morning business, it will have to be done without speeches.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Vice President for making that suggestion, because I have a motion which I desire to make before 1 o'clock, to take up Senate bill 1728. The unanimous consent request applied only to the insertion of matters in the RECORD. I hope that other Senators will not make long speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will undertake to enforce the request, though he has been somewhat liberal in regard to it until now.

TOWARD THE INDUSTRIAL ATOMIC FUTURE—ARTICLE BY DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the Congressional RECORD at the close of my remarks an article by David E. Lilienthal, former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, entitled "Toward the Industrial Atomic Future," appearing in the current issue of Collier's magazine.

In this article the former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission discusses the advisability of ending the Government monopoly over atomic energy for civilian purposes and giving private industry a free hand in such development. This proposal will be seriously questioned and will result in widespread debate as to the wisdom of such a program. There are many questions that will need to be answered to protect the interests of the Nation and the people of this country, whose money, to the extent of billions of dollars, made possible the discovery of the secrets of atmic energy.

Among the important questions involved is the protection of the country from the dangers of private monopoly control in the development and civilian application of atomic energy. It would seem at first glance that the ordinary industrial corporation in the United States which has not had the benefit of contractual association with the Government in the discovery and application of the secrets of atomic energy would have little opportunity to take part in its civilian development.

The great value of Mr. Lilienthal's article is that it high lights the need for developing the industrial uses of atomic energy. In future years the strength of our country, and perhaps our very survival, may depend upon whether or not we make sufficient progress in harnessing atomic power in the service of industrial progress. Mr. Lilienthal's proposals for achieving this objective may not be the final solution but they certainly require the most careful consideration.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOWARD THE INDUSTRIAL ATOMIC FUTURE

(By David E. Lilienthal)

The American people have been sold the biggest gold brick in our history. This brick is the notion that a few of our bright people discovered the secret formula of the atom, a secret we can keep by locking it in a vault. It is this gold brick that has misled and frightened many otherwise steady people into thinking that the atom is a weapon and nothing else, when the truth is that here is a great new field of knowledge that can be converted to the peaceful service of humankind. It is, largely, this emphasis on "the secret" that accounts for the continuation of the present airtight Government monopoly of the industrial atom, a strange and un-American course.

Such a frame of mind as this makes it tough to get back to common sense again, but I believe it can be done. In this article I propose to suggest ways we can develop the atom as we normally would any new industrial knowledge: through private industry and competition.

Several weeks ago (Collier's for June 17th) I criticized the idea of Government monopoly of information, experimentation, and development of the industrial atom. But it would smack of the demagogue if, as the first chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, I strongly condemned a course of public policy without being prepared to say what I think should be done about it. This is more emphatically true since I was among those who, back in 1945 and 1946, were unable to see any alternative to the course of Government monopoly. But on the basis of experience, experience we did not have in 1946, and in view of such new facts as the Russian atomic bomb, I am convinced that our monopoly course is no longer justified and should be drastically changed.

This does not mean abandoning secrecy about the military atom; on the contrary I believe that narrowing the area we try to keep secure will make military secrecy more effective.

We can free the atom for America's industrial genius and still maintain sensible military secrecy.

I believe in secrecy about atomic weapons, and particularly the status of their development. This is a clear necessity. But this necessity does not justify the enormous and all-embracing scope of Government monopoly of information, plants, materials, and know-how now provided for.

Government monopoly of an entire industrial potentiality is not the only way to protect and control information of military importance. Our Army, Navy, and Air Forces manage to protect secrets about their weapons and equipment without going to the extreme of establishing Government monopoly of the entire industry that produces those secret weapons.

The reasons for military secrecy as to atomic weapons are excellent ones. They are not, however, different in kind from those that apply to radar, or submarine design, or detectors of various kinds, or guided missiles, or bacteriological warfare agents.

We should, in my opinion, reshape our atomic military secrecy requirements to something more nearly resembling the limits that prevail in the Department of Defense as to all other branches of armament.

What is the best way for the people of the country to gain the full benefits of the industrial atom, and to secure those peaceful benefits as quickly as possible? This is the issue.

I believe, as do many Americans, that there are cases in which Government can do a particular job more appropriately than can private enterprise. In my opinion, one illustration is the development of our vast rivers for flood control, navigation, power, and irrigation. But the industrial atom is by no means such a case.

I assert that the present course of Government monopoly is not that best way. Government monopoly is an appropriate way to provide atomic weapons and other atomic military devices. It is not, however, the way to put the atom to work for mankind. It will not put the industrial atom into the mainstream of American industry and commerce, where it can flourish.

Only industry—as proprietor and manager and investor—can do the actual job of developing industry.

Would my proposal of private development, should it be adopted, make it impossible ever to have effective international control of atomic weapons? Does the position taken in this article mean I have abandoned my views about an international Atomic Development Authority which in 1946 my colleagues and I proposed?

International, not national or private, ownership and operation of such plants as those producing uranium 235 and plutonium were indeed an integral part of our Report on the International Control of Atomic Energy. That principle is embodied in the Baruch plan as well as the plan later approved by virtually all nations except Soviet Russia. My present proposal about the industrial atom would not bar an agreement for international control if, at some future time, the Atomic Development Authority idea were agreed upon by the nations of the world.

What needs to be done? How can American industry get the first shovels into the ground?

The broad beginning is for the country to believe that something can be done. We must stop resigning ourselves to a living denial of the things we stand for.

The transformation from Government monopoly to competitive development ought to be accomplished by a number of steps or stages. To wait until the whole change can be made in one gulp will be to wait too long.

The first definite step is to provide access to the realities of this atomic industry for a large number of Americans who are now outside the stockade.

This must be the starting point, otherwise only the inner circle will know enough to help design concrete and workable measures. That kind of help can come from the inner circle only to a limited extent. When you yourself are inside the fence, with the best of motives your zeal to admit others is not likely to be great. Moreover, it is difficult for men who are themselves well informed, at first hand and in working detail, to understand clearly why men without that intimate knowledge are handicapped, and unable to contribute much, if anything, of their own technical resourcefulness and imagination.

The opening move, therefore, should be a complete review by the American people of our basic assumptions relating to monopoly of information in the hands of the government and its agents, as it applies to the industrial side of the atom. I hope this article will precipitate such a review. Chairman BRIEN MCMAHON and the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy and the Atomic Energy Commission would probably welcome a fundamental reexamination of the whole industrial atomic-energy situation.

Secrecy as a part of Government monopoly is justified only as a means of keeping information from potential enemies. There is no sense in keeping information from our own people when it has become evident that other countries, including potential enemies, have it. We in this country are suspicious of secrecy, with good reasons. It has been used as a screen behind which officials can pompously hide blunders and ineptitude, and protect themselves from legitimate criticism. And it has been a way to caress the ego of the holder of the secret: "If you knew what I know."

Equally or more serious is the fact that, in a situation such as I am discussing, secrecy is hard on our own technical progress, our own headway; and its cost in dollars is staggering. Foy Kohler, an American who spent some years in our embassy in Moscow, reports that in Russia "it takes about two to do a single job—one to work and one to watch." Anyone who has seen the atomic enterprise from the inside will get a wry smile from this remark, though our ratio is certainly not that high. Not yet, anyway.

A mere reading of the sweeping words of the present law conveys some idea of the breadth and extent of the Government's hold. But the situation in practice is even worse than the words might indicate.

Under the Commission's wartime predecessor, the Manhattan District, everything about atomic energy, including the very existence of such an undertaking, was declared officially secret. It was classified or restricted information.

"Secret" was stamped on virtually everything, even on Manhattan District books and periodicals, of which identical copies were also available to the public on the shelves of almost every technical library in this country—and Russia. "Secret" stamps, creating a Government information monopoly, went on almost every last thing of an atomic industrial nature done during the war, even on some equipment that was well-known and commonplace. And I have seen intricate gadgets, stamped "secret" by the Manhattan District, that could have been purchased by anyone right off the shelf in hundreds of stores in this country—some of it as Army surplus.

So the Atomic Energy Commission on January 1, 1947, inherited a huge undertaking in which, for asserted military reasons, virtually everything, even of the most common or innocent character, was hush-hush. An ordinary screw driver of the kind you can buy at a dime store, used to tighten a screw in an assembly involving atomic materials, was treated as restricted data. Under the atomic energy law it cannot be handled, or even seen, by any person who has not been investigated by the FBI and cleared by the Commission.

This is palpable and costly nonsense. But as a matter of practical operation it is not untypical. Such a state of affairs does not serve to increase the respect men feel for their work; but this condition is well nigh inescapable as things now stand.

Take, for example, last summer's incredible congressional hearings on charges of incredible mismanagement of the atomic enterprise. The best managerial and technical brains of a great industry had to be away from their work day after day so they could explain to a Senator (under klieg lights and before television cameras) such things as how a chip of uranium got into one of their workmen's socks. For, under the monopoly law, that chip of uranium—out of tons and tons handled every month—is treated as restricted data.

Is it any wonder, then, that American industry looks upon the development of the industrial atom with such coolness? I have talked this over, at length and often, with scores of our ablest industrial executives and research directors. Almost to a man they asserted that what may be one of the greatest discoveries of modern times simply will not and cannot be fully developed by American industry under the strange, artificial, emotion-charged, and Government-dominated conditions that now exist. I agree with their position. All of us are losing a great opportunity each day these conditions continue.

The Commission is authorized to declassify, that is, remove a piece of information or equipment or material from this hush-hush category. But this can be done legally only upon a finding, by the Commission, that a data may be published (which means, open to the public generally) "without adversely affecting the common defense and security."

In practical operation this is ineffective and unworkable as a means of furthering, on a broad front, the great potentialities of the industrial atom by American business. Thousands of pieces of information have in fact been declassified by the diligence of the Commission, though largely in scientific rather than industrial or technological areas. But industrial men get little stimulus from such a patchwork, bit-by-bit approach to their possible interests, so remote from physical reality.

If the only way to crack the monopoly of information is this declassification process, it simply will not be cracked. The record to date is the best evidence of that fact.

The McMahon Act includes a provision that provides a clue to what, in my opinion, should become general policy as to dissemination of industrially useful information.

The law declares that the policy of the Commission should be that "the dissemination of scientific and technical information relating to atomic energy should be permitted and encouraged so as to provide that free interchange of ideas and criticism which is essential to scientific progress."

Here is a recognition by Congress of a salutary principle. It should be extended to industrial information.

Science was dealt with differently in this respect from engineering and industrial knowledge because the scientific community of the country was able to persuade Members of Congress that the real atomic secrets were in the area of what was called technical know-how, not in scientific knowledge.

This distinction, however, between science and technology, will not stand up. As almost every man with industrial development experience will agree, there are few tricks of know-how that cannot, independently, be approximated or duplicated by other competent men.

(I do not include in this present article my views as to the effect of Government monopoly on fundamental science and of the role of universities and research institutions, the discussion here being directed to the business side of the atom.)

So I would urge, as a basis for public discussion, that the revised law say in effect: Atomic military information is not different in kind from the information about the secret military aircraft that carries an atom bomb or the secret fighter plane that protects it.

But other changes in law or in practice will also have to be made before American industry can take hold of the industrial atom and begin to develop its potentialities in a competitive climate. Thus, it is essential, for example, that the scope of supervision now exercised by the Congress be confined (as under the Constitution it should be) to broad policy matters; and the spirit in which a great technical venture is dealt with by committees of Congress needs to be changed.

Assuming suitable changes in the law and in the attitude of the public and of the Congress, how can private industry get started?

First, as to the great factories producing uranium 235 and plutonium. For practical and temporary reasons I would recommend no immediate change in their ownership or operation, though immediately leasing them to the private concerns now operating them under contract has much to commend it.

But, without delay, other outstanding industrial concerns should be fully informed about the nature of these plants and their processes; they should be asked to prepare their ideas for improving processes and designs for future plants, or for replacing the present methods. Competition in new ways of producing these materials should be encouraged rather than forbidden, as is now the case.

The private companies operating these plants as contractors would welcome competitors in the field; for, as the General Electric Co. (one of the major operators) has put it, "The economy that does most to foster competition is the one that makes easiest the establishment and growth of business."

Private investment in such production plants is not out of the range of future possibility, though the amounts are huge. The Government would, of course, continue to receive that portion of the total output needed for the bomb program.

But a more important and creative opportunity lies in the designing and the building of atomic machines by private concerns, with their own funds. One is a machine, called a reactor, to produce electric power, which might also produce plutonium while it produces power. The second is a research reactor for the intense irradiation of metals, pharmaceuticals, glass, fibers, oils and so on; in short, a wide range of exploration for industry. The third is a reactor and plant to produce and process radioactive isotopes or tracers, already widely used in medicine, in industry, and agricultural research.

Private capital for investment in such machines, and for experimental and development work generally, would be available if the climate for private enterprise in this area were made reasonably healthful; that is, if it met the requirements of almost any pioneering business undertaking.

This will require changes in a good many provisions of law, in my opinion. But more important by far than particular legal changes is a complete change in the way we approach the industrial development of the atom—a change from the Soviet to the American style.

As to particular legal changes, I suggest they should include the following:

1. A firm, clear and unambiguous policy, the declared purpose of which is to get the industrial atom into the invigorating stream of American competition. This policy should be written into law, and lived up to in spirit.

2. A reasonable prospect that, if the financial risks are assumed (and these would not be inconsiderable), those who take the risks would stand to benefit if their investment of money and effort succeeded.

A change in the basic policy of atomic development would carry with it the necessity for a complete revision of the patent provisions of the present law, to make them conform (as they do not today) to the principles of the American industrial incentive system.

3. Section 7 of the McMahon Act contains an explicit invitation to the exercise of a political veto over scientific and industrial advance. This must be eliminated before we can hope for private development.

This astounding section provides that whenever any industrial, commercial or other nonmilitary use of fissionable (atomic) material or atomic energy has been sufficiently developed to be of practical value, the (Atomic Energy) Commission shall prepare a report to the President stating all the facts with respect to such (nonmilitary practical) use, the Commission's estimate of the social, political, economic, and international effects of such use, and the Commission's recommendations for necessary or desirable supplemental legislation. After the President has sent this report to Congress with his own recommendations, Congress has a period to debate whether this industrial, commercial, or other nonmilitary use . . . of practical value may proceed, or whether Congress should forbid it. This is one of the most appalling reversals of our way of doing things in this country of which I have any knowledge.

If such a veto of industrial advancement had been in the lawbooks when the locomotive was first developed, the outcry of its competitors, the stagecoach and the canal, might well have barred the progress of our railroads.

It may be that Congress intended that this industrial veto power was to apply only to developments in Government-owned facilities. But no prudent lawyer could assure an industrial concern that this is the correct interpretation. Hence, until this provision is repealed or clarified, no businessman is likely to invest his own money to begin experimentation with the industrial atom leading to a commercial application.

The precedent of this particular provision of the Atomic Energy Act ought to be buried fast and buried deep. If it were followed, and came to fasten itself upon us, it would spell the end of a dynamic America.

To these three conditions a fourth might be added:

(4) Consideration ought to be given to the granting of allowances, in corporate taxes, for concerns who pioneer with their own money in atomic research and development work that is now being carried on out of public funds. Other inducements, such as special depreciation allowances or the joint investment of private and public funds or matching of such funds, may appear desirable.

Atomic reactors, heretofore built for the Government with public funds or now under design, cost millions of dollars. Whether reactors need to cost nearly so much is one of the important things industrial competition will probably establish.

One such experimental reactor I have suggested for private investment would produce electric power, but is so designed that it will also produce plutonium as a byproduct. The builder of the reactor would use, or sell, the electricity. An example of an opportunity for such an operation is phosphate fertilizer production, using the electric furnace method, in the power-short Idaho-Utah region that is rich in phosphate ore. Aluminum production, which requires great amounts of electricity, preferably near the supply of bauxite, might prove to be another such example.

The important thing about the building of such a reactor—important for the country as well as industry—would be this: For the first time an atomic industrial machine would be built with the builder's own money.

The first breath of the tonic air of competition would blow through the atomic industry. With its own dollars—not the Government's—at stake, industry would assign its very best men to these tasks. The heat would be on. The industrial atom would really start to roll. This would not be wholly because of the pressure of costs and the desire for profits. The fun would be back in this particular venture, the wartime hang-over of "cost plus" would ease off; pioneering gumption and a sense for costs would return.

The second atomic machine I recommend as a beginer might well be built in the proximity of a metals center such as Pittsburgh or Detroit or Cleveland, or adjacent to a great pharmaceutical or chemical area such as Chicago or Detroit or St. Louis. It would not be for power generation, but for research and development to observe the effect of radiation on scores of industrial materials.

Here the industrial meaning and possibilities of radiation's power to change the very nature and structure of matter could be dug out, and worked over, and turned to useful ends.

But it would probably be from the process of designing and actually building and operating these reactors that the greatest benefits would flow. Industrial engineers and development men don't ordinarily learn things by reading a "declassified" document; they learn by trying things, trying them out themselves.

In the considerable job of actually creating these reactors, finding materials that will perform under these new conditions, getting the "bugs" and the high costs out of them, as well as in using them day by day, ideas would start rising all through American industry even as life stirs under the spring sun after the long dormancy of winter.

The building of these reactors by private industry would, of course, require substantial amounts of atomic materials. Reliable American companies ought to have a right to buy and to own such materials in any amount reasonable for research, development or power purposes. The law might specify as a ceiling the maximum percentage of the total supply of uranium which should be in private ownership, but certainly if that percentage is fixed conservatively that material will do at least as much for the national security if used for developing the industrial atom as would the same amount in atomic or superatomic bombs.

The Government, of course, should keep close track of all atomic materials owned privately. And, of course, the Government's right to take possession of any private atomic material at any time, paying compensation afterward and not as a precondition, ought to be made part of each sales transaction.

A third reactor that could be built by private business would resemble, in purpose, the machine now in operation at Oak Ridge, for the production of radioactive isotopes, or tracer atoms. In this machine almost any common article can be inserted—salt, steel, phosphorus, iodine, and so on—and when it comes out it is radioactive.

A large market demand for these radioactive tracer products has already been built up. They are being manufactured today by the Commission and sold to hundreds of the country's research laboratories and medical centers.

The Commission's forces have done a fine job in promoting the uses of these tracer isotopes, and in improving the technical side of the operations. Competition would be welcomed on all sides. The present Government price scale presents a problem, but not an insoluble one.

The main and most often-heard arguments against the position I am taking I do not find persuasive. Here they are:

First is the argument that we need Government monopoly as a means of protecting "the secret of the atom bomb." This argument is carried so far as to maintain that secrecy about weapons is impossible without Government monopoly of information over virtually the whole enterprise in all its industrial aspects. As I have already indicated, this argument does not persuade me, and particularly not since the Russians succeeded in making the atomic bomb.

There was a time when one could hope that the Russians might never be able to produce atomic materials suitable for an atomic bomb—that is, on a production, not on a laboratory, scale and of the requisite high purity.

But the Russians have made and tested an atomic bomb. We must assume that they had at their disposal adequate technical information. More important even than information, they must have men with the technical skills required to factory-produce atomic materials, as well as to produce a bomblike explosion.

The scientific and technical information furnished the Russians by the atom spy, Dr. Karl Fuchs, we know to be extensive and vital. Without men able to translate such information into industrial operations, however, this alone would not have been enough.

These new facts from Russia should certainly make all of us take a fresh look at our reasons for Government monopoly.

Everything considered, my conclusion is that the present scope of Government monopoly and secrecy hurts us more than it helps us.

Second among arguments against freeing the atom is the contention that only the Government can undertake the development of the industrial atom because private capital is not available for this purpose. Here is a genuine difficulty which can, I believe, be overcome by the steps I have suggested in this article.

Third is this argument: Atomic energy is an asset that belongs to all the people of the United States. The money of the whole people made the discoveries possible, built the plants and laboratories. The people carried the risk of failure, and they should be the ones to benefit, not private corporations. Furthermore, atomic energy is so overwhelmingly powerful a force for good that it should not be put in the hands of any private organization.

The Government alone is big enough and responsive enough to the whole people for so great a trust as this. Moreover, the hazards to human life and health in the use of atomic energy in industrial activities (such as power production) are considerable and still largely unknown. There is greater protection against these hazards in exclusive Government ownership than could reasonably be expected of private corporations. But the same rigid standards Government now prescribes, as proprietor, could be made effective without Government monopoly, and enforced through inspection.

What we all want is that the people should get the greatest possible benefits from atomic energy as quickly as possible. After considerable experience and observation, my own conclusion is that the people will benefit most and soonest by freeing the atom, not by fencing it in behind the walls of Government monopoly and by leaving its development in the hands of a limited number of corporations, contractors of the Government, with all outside competitors barred.

I am under no illusions that the change from Government monopoly can be made without difficulty or without loud outcry. For there is much emotion wrapped up in the atom, and there already are governmental vested interests that have staked out a claim. But I have confidence in the outcome. For free competition is right in character for a people who cherish their pioneering heritage and live in its spirit.

I believe we shall Americanize the atom.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1951

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as Senators know, on Saturday the Senate Appropriations Committee reported the general appropriation bill for 1951, and it is now before the Senate. I am wondering whether, by unanimous consent, the Senate can proceed to the consideration of that bill tomorrow morning, when the Senate convenes. It is a matter of the greatest importance, and it is a bill which ought to be passed as soon as possible. I hope that can be done.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator defer his request until we have concluded consideration of the Pike nomination this afternoon, that we may discuss the matter then?

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory.

FEDERAL FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE ACT

Mr. LUCAS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1728.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1728) to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, some time ago, as the Senate well knows, a motion was made by the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1728. That motion was before the Senate as I recall for about a week or ten days, during which time it was intermittently debated. At the end of that time, a petition for cloture on the motion to take up the measure was presented, and, under the rules of the Senate, it automatically came up for a vote 2 days thereafter.

Mr. President, I have again moved the consideration of this measure. It seems to me that in view of the length of debate which took place previously merely on the motion to take up the bill, it is absolutely unnecessary for the Senate to debate the motion at this time at any great length, before presenting a petition for cloture. Presumably the debate would cover the ground which was covered previously, and it seems to me that would be rather futile and useless, especially at a time when we are trying to expedite the business of the Senate.

I am therefore serving notice on Senators now that sometime today a petition for cloture on this motion will be filed. I am satisfied the motion will be debated, and that the only way in which we may finally get a chance to take up the bill for consideration is through the filing of a petition for cloture on the motion to consider the bill, and to present the petition today. I may say that the petition, which has been signed by 44 Members of the Senate, will come up automatically for a vote on Wednesday at 1 o'clock. That is all I care to say at the present time, Mr. President.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LUCAS. For what purpose, may I ask?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have a brief statement I desire to make.

IMPACT OF KOREAN SITUATION ON ADJOURNMENT PROSPECTS

Mr. LUCAS. Before yielding, I wanted to make a brief statement, if I may, on a somewhat different matter.

On last Thursday, Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] had the following to say:

Mr. President, I was very much disturbed yesterday to hear the majority leader announce his plans for a calendar for the Senate contemplating adjournment on August 1. I think it is a great mistake for the Senate of the United States to make plans for adjournment on August 1 because, in my opinion, the crisis which confronts America is so serious that the American people should be given assurance that the Senate fully appreciates the gravity of the situation and that the Senate will remain in session continuously until the crisis is over. The Senate should take out whatever few days may be necessary for the campaign in the latter part of October before the election, depending even then upon the condition of international affairs.

What I said on that day was as follows:

It is absolutely indispensable that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the appropriations bill as soon as possible, because there may be some differences between the House position and the Senate position, and consequently the conferees may have some trouble and may take some time before they can reach agreement.

However, barring unforeseen conditions in respect to the Korean situation, in the Far East, I am still working to the end that we may leave here around July 31. That is my hope, and I believe we can do it.

Mr. President, in all the statements which the Senator from Illinois has made with respect to the adjournment of Congress around the first of August he has always placed as a qualification the developments which may take place in Korea. That still stands. The Senator from Oregon failed to quote what I said with respect to that. Obviously, if conditions in Korea gravitate to the point where they become more serious than they are today, or if they should continue as they are at the present time, neither the Senator from Illinois nor any other Senator would desire Congress to adjourn.

The Senator from Oregon further stated:

Mr. President, I will go along with the majority leader and the majority party in advancing as rapidly as we can a calendar dealing with domestic issues, but I shall insist so far as my one vote in the Senate is concerned that we advance ahead of some of the bills as were mentioned by the majority leader yesterday, consideration of the defenses of the country, because I think they are in a very serious condition.

Mr. President, I should like to say a word or two with reference to any prospective bills dealing with the situation which exists in Korea. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] a moment ago rose upon the floor of the Senate and introduced a bill dealing with one aspect of the Korean situation and the Senate passed the bill without its having been referred to a committee. It was agreed to by the distinguished minority leader and all other Senators on the floor of the Senate.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] gave to the newspapermen in front of my desk, before the Senate convened today, the information that, insofar as he as chairman of the Appropriations Committee is concerned, all the money necessary, will be appropriated for the adequate and proper defense of this Nation. Obviously, any bill which may come before the Senate with any recommendations which the President of the United States may make with respect to the immediate consideration of our defenses, to the end that our armies may be better equipped, I am satisfied will be passed. Any proposed domestic legislation, of course, would be laid aside for the time being. At the moment the appropriation bill is the most important bill, and we must proceed with it, because appropriations involving the defense of the Nation are contained in that bill, as are the funds for the complete operation of the Government, both at home and abroad.

I simply wanted to make that statement to clear the record, because I was in Illinois last week and saw the statement made by my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. In all the statements I have made I have reiterated that the taking of a recess or an adjournment by Congress depends primarily upon the developments taking place in Korea.

I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

One of the observations made by the majority leader last week invited attention to the possibility of an adjournment sine die. I do not mean to say that that is the type of adjournment that will be taken, but I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader if he contemplates a recess subject to the call of the leadership on either side of the aisle.

Mr. LUCAS. I would say that in the event conditions around August 1, or immediately thereafter, are such that Members of the Senate believe it is advisable that the Senate should take a recess for 2 or 3 weeks, to return at the call of the distinguished Vice President, or upon concurrent resolution of the Congress, anything that will satisfy Members on both sides of the aisle will be satisfactory to the Senator from Illinois. In addition remember the President could call us back at any time. I do not want anything to be done that will place us in a misunderstandable position with our own people or with the people of the world. The Senator from Illinois, even though he is a candidate for reelection, will remain at his desk if international conditions are such as to demand his attention, regardless of the Senatorial election in Illinois.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I think it is well worth the consideration of the majority leader that in the event even a temporary recess is taken, or one contemplating returning the first of January, it be taken subject to the call of the leaders of both Houses. I have been very much interested in knowing whether the President expects to come before a joint meeting of the two Houses to give us a review of the situation, with a recommendation as to legislation that might be desirable, if it should become necessary before adjournment.

Mr. LUCAS. I would say in reply to the Senator's inquiry that at the meeting at the White House this morning there was no suggestion made as to any immediate legislation coming before the Senate or the House to implement operations which are under way at the present time. I do not say that such suggestions will not be made, but that question was not raised, and there was nothing agreed upon along that line this morning.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the majority leader contemplate calling the calendar some time during the consideration of the appropriation bill, or immediately after or before its consideration?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] is away, and I presume he is probably interested in more bills on the calendar than is any other chairman of a committee. Before he left I agreed with him that I would not call the calendar until his return, because I thought it was more or less useless, by reason of the large number of bills in which he is interested.

Mr. WHERRY. Possibly the calendar will not be called prior to Wednesday of this week. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. I think that is a fair conclusion.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the Committee on Public Works will report within the next 2 or 3 days what is known as the road bill which will affect every State in the Union and the possessions of the United States. If the committee reports the bill within the next 2 or 3 days, would it be possible that action can be taken on it within a reasonable length of time?

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad the Senator raised that question, because we have been discussing that bill in the Policy Committee. I hope the Senator's committee will report it. There may be a possibility of taking it up after the consideration of the appropriations bill.

NEED FOR NATIONAL UNITY IN THE IMPENDING CRISIS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, during this emergency period, the President of the United States has received overwhelming support from both Republicans and Democrats in Congress and throughout the Nation.

The critical months ahead would warrant the President's establishing a government of national unity for as long as the crisis lasts. This could be done by inviting Republicans, having the confidence of that party, into the Cabinet.

At the same time he should make clear that he was not going to use his position as Commander in Chief and leader of a united America to assist the partisan campaigns of members of his own political party in the congressional elections this year.

Such a policy would be of the highest statesmanship and a major contribution to the continuation of the national unity so desperately needed at this crucial hour.

If the American people are treated as adults they will respond as such. It is no time to spoon feed them or to hold back on the hard realities of the situation we face. I believe that the people of this Nation have been way ahead of the Government in recognizing the facts of life.

Communism is as destructive of human liberty in China or Korea as it is in the satellite states of eastern Europe. The rank and file of our citizens recognized this even when the Far Eastern Division of the State Department did not.

Urgent requests for aid to offset the North Korean build-up of tanks, artillery, and planes were made on several occasions by the government of the Republic of Korea and by our own mission to that nation. Until the invasion had started the cold, hard facts of the situation are that the additional equipment they needed was all on order or under consideration, and the only shipments made were some excess signal equipment, which represented a few hundred dollars out of the Korean share of the arms-implementation bill of 1949.

It, of course, does no good to cry over spilt milk, but it is urgently necessary that it not be spilt again in Asia or in Europe. Time is rapidly running out and neither the Nation nor the Congress will be tolerant of a too-little-and-too-late result. The life of this Republic and the whole free world is at stake.

The airfields we do not have to operate from in Korea could be supplied to a considerable extent by the carriers that are in "moth balls." They and their necessary escort vessels should be ordered demothed at once, not a week or a month from now. Needless to say that additional ships without the trained crews will not do the job.

The President's Air Policy Board and a joint congressional committee urged a 70-group program as the minimum Air Force needed for the security of this Nation. Last year Congress appropriated the funds for the 70 groups and the President froze the funds provided and set the limit at 48 groups. Our experience in World War II was that no planes saw combat that were designed subsequent to Pearl Harbor. It would be negligence of the first magnitude to get caught with a second-best Air Force. The Soviet Union will be impressed with the world's most powerful Air Force in being and will not be impressed with one on blueprints.

Our ground forces are not adequately manned or armed to meet the needs of the hour. Nor will we have the forces we need with draftees alone. Combat experienced reservists would help the morale of the inexperienced troops.

A substantial number of men will have to be secured to bring our Air Force, Army, and Navy up to their proper strength. Volunteers will not, in my opinion, provide in time what the security of the Nation requires. The people are entitled to know that the draft will have to be used and a considerable number of reservists called up. Giving it to them in little homeopathic doses is hardly doing credit to their intelligence.

The number of Americans who have to be called to the colors will depend, in part, on the share of the burden assumed by others. Of the United Nations members only the United States, Britain, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the Republic of China have offered any combat forces. Of the Asiatic nations only the Republic of China has expressed both the ability and willingness to send a combat force of troops and some airpower. China is the only United Nations member, outside of the United States, offering ground troops.

The Republic of China is a member of the United Nations and of the Security Council. Member states have been requested to send help and China promptly responded by offering to send 30,000 of her troops constituting three divisions. These were trained under the able Virginia Military Institute graduate and successful combat commander general, Sun Leh-jen.

It is important that the people of free Asia be well represented in the combined United Nations ground forces and that the whole burden not fall alone upon the limited number of Korean divisions, the troops of the United States or a few of our western allies.

Some say that the Soviet and Chinese Communists will resent such a combined force. The point is made that forces from Communist China may then come into Korea. My answer to that is that there are such forces already in Korea.

A second Bataan could result unless sufficient Allied troops can get to the scene early enough to hold southern Korea until our own build up take place. Forces of the Republic of China from Formosa could be landed by ship in 5 days and by plane in 1.

It is long past time when the State Department should discontinue its feud with the Government of the Republic of China. Without the vote of China in the Security Council none of the three resolutions passed by that United Nations agency would have been adopted.

Seven votes are essential. The Soviet Union was absent on each occasion. Yugoslavia followed the usual Communist line though she may well be the next victim of aggression and an urgent pleader for United Nations help. At the time all three votes were taken, India and Egypt abstained though India on the second resolution later announced her support but had it been necessary to hold up action 24 hours waiting for this approval, the battle of Korea might have been lost.

A subsequent amphibious landing on hostile shores will be very costly as Iwo Jima and Okinawa clearly demonstrated.

It has been reported that the State Department has not looked with approval upon the offer by the Republic of China. If a political decision in Washington by the same State Department clique who last December 23 in a policy memo wrote off Formosa as having "No strategic value" is the controlling factor, then those making such a political decision are assuming a heavy responsibility to this nation and our men who are now so hard pressed in Korea. The decision should be left to our responsible commander in the area.

It would be an important factor in the establishment of a system of international law and order if the burdens and responsibilities could, under the command of General MacArthur, be shared by the Asiatic and western members as full partners in this action to strike down lawless aggression of its fountain head.

Major decisions will soon be made in the Kremlin, if indeed they have not already been made. July and August are the critical months and whatever needs to be done should be done at once to put our defenses in order. Like insurance, it is costly but no prudent man should be without it. Far better to have it and not use it than to need it and not have it.

NOMINATION OF SUMNER T. PIKE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement of July 5 the Senate will proceed, in executive session, to consider the nomination of Sumner T. Pike, to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission. In accordance with the agreement the time from now until 4 o'clock is divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the confirmation of the nomination, to be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER].

The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Sumner T. Pike to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum if it is agreeable to the Senator from Connecticut that the time consumed in calling the quorum be charged equally to both sides.

Mr. McMAHON. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the call of the roll be rescinded, and that further proceedings under the roll call be abandoned.

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). Objection is heard. The Secretary will continue the call.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes to discuss the nomination of Sumner T. Pike. On June 19, 1950, the President of the United States nominated Mr. Sumner T. Pike to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission for a term of 4 years. At the same time he nominated three other Commissioners, Mr. Dean, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Smyth. The nominations of the three men I have just named were confirmed without any difficulty.

In the case of the nomination of Mr. Pike, it was necessary, because of request which was made, to hold a hearing. Under date of June 20 we had a very brief hearing, at which Commissioner Smyth testified to the good work that he knew had been done by Mr. Pike. He was joined in the statement he made by Commissioners Dean and Murray. No questions were asked of Commissioner Smyth; he was not cross-examined. We invited Mr. Pike to come to the meeting, but no questions bearing upon his fitness were asked of him, either in open or in closed session.

Mr. Pike, as I have indicated, was one of the original appointees to the Commission. At that time his nomination was confirmed by the Senate without a yea-and-nay vote, and without any opposition—at least, on the floor of the Senate—so far as I know. His nomination was confirmed on April 7, 1947.

Mr. President, three of my colleagues on the committee believe with me that the President's nomination of Mr. Pike should be confirmed by the Senate.

At this moment I am at a loss to know why objection is being made to confirmation of the nomination.

Therefore, I shall take my seat and shall await the onslaught, and then shall attempt to meet it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. As one who is not on the committee and has not been close to the atomic energy work, but as one who is vitally interested in this matter because of the present critical situation, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the joint committee whether before the nominations were made, the President conferred with the committee in regard to the relationship between the committee and the various Commissioners, and whether the committee's advice was sought, or whether the nominations were made without conferring at all with the committee.

Mr. McMAHON. I think I would be obliged to answer that question in this way: I had two or three conferences with the President's staff members. However, no advice from the committee as such was solicited or given.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield further, to permit me to ask another question?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I understand that ever since the Commission was created and ever since the joint congressional committee was established, the relationship between the committee and the commission has been very intimate; in fact, the committee and the commission meet together as frequently, sometimes, as once a week, I understand.

Mr. McMAHON. Sometimes they meet far more often than that, I may say.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

In other words, over a period of between 3 and 4 years there has been that intimate relationship, during which period it has been possible for members of the committee to size up the qualifications of the commissioners and for the members of the committee to determine whether they feel that for this vitally important work the various commissioners are qualified.

At the moment I do not know how I am going to vote in regard to confirmation of the nomination. I am troubled about it, because I recognize the need for the appointment of the full membership of the commission, which for some time has been lacking a chairman. I do not know why a chairman for the commission has not already been selected.

I understand that one reason why confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike has not been favored has been that it was believed that if his nomination to be a member of the commission for a period of 4 years were confirmed, he might be made chairman of the commission; and I understand that although there was no objection to confirmation of his nomination as a member of the commission, yet there was objection to him as chairman of the commission.

I think we must determine whether we are to work together in regard to this matter or whether there is to be a dispute regarding the most important commission existing today, so far as our national defense is concerned.

So far as I am concerned, I am inclined to recommend that this nomination be recommitted to the committee, with the urgent request that it be taken up with the Executive, to see whether the question of the selection of a chairman for the commission can be determined, so that the matter can be settled by joint action of the Congress and the Executive, not on the basis of differences of opinion.

Mr. McMAHON. I am inclined to say to the Senator from New Jersey that I do not believe Mr. Pike will be named as chairman of the commission.

Furthermore, it has been a matter of knowledge to the members of the joint committee, as well as to practically everyone else, that the terms of the Commissioners were expiring. I do not make the following statement by way of putting blame on any member of the committee, but simply state the fact that I did not receive from any member of the committee any complaint about Mr. Pike, nor did I receive any suggestion that his nomination would be opposed if it was submitted to the Senate.

I say to the Senator from New Jersey that I would suggest that he withhold—as he has said he is going to do—his judgment on this matter until he can hear what objections are made to confirmation of the nomination.

I can say to the Senator that I shall listen with interest, too, because outside of some very general information, I am not aware of any bill of particulars which has yet been filed against Mr. Pike, and I am interested in the bill of particulars.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Then I, too, shall await further developments, before commenting further

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. In this particular Commission, has the chairman any more power than any other member of the Commission has?

Mr. McMAHON. No; in one sense—a very real sense—he does not.

However, the chairman of any commission, by virtue of the fact that he is chairman of the commission, has greater prestige and authority, despite the fact that, mathematically, he has only one-fifth of the power, in the case of a 5-member commission. In other words, his vote is worth no more than that of any other member of the commission.

On the other hand, simply by reason of the fact that he is chairman, I think he is more powerful.

Mr. LANGER. There is no particular quirk in the law is there, which gives the Chairman of this Commission more power than that possessed by any other member of the Commission?

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct. I may add that the Chairman does receive additional compensation. However, his vote is not weighted; I suppose that is what the Senator from North Dakota has in mind.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the action of the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in recommending against confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike has caused a great deal of furor and confusion in the public press and has been the source of a vast amount of misinformation and misstatement in the course of speculation as to why recommendation was made by five of the nine members of the Senate section of the joint committee against confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

There are a great many specifications and details—and I speak only for myself—some of which are substantial, others of which taken by themselves are not of sufficient consequence to be, alone, a reason for opposing confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike, but which, when all of them are taken cumulatively, have led me to the decision that Mr. Pike should not be reappointed to the responsible position of member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

At the outset let me lay a few ghosts and spike a few devils which have been pursued by certain persons in connection with this matter

I say to you, Mr. President, first, that I have not asked a single Member of the Senate, either on the committee or off the committee, to oppose confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

I say to you, Mr. President, that so far as I know—other Members will have to speak for themselves—no Member of the Senate section of the Joint Committee, in charge of this matter, has gone to any other Member of the Senate and asked that Member to oppose confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

I say to you, Mr. President, in response to a series of current, utterly unfounded rumors, that there has been no agreement, so far as I know, or so far as I have any intimation of or suspicion of, between the Senators who are opposing confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike and any other group of Senators, conditioned upon anything, for votes one way or the other on the question of confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

It is, of course, distressing that speculation of that kind will run rampant through the public press, without any foundation whatever. But I presume that in cases of this kind there must be speculation and, depending upon the complexion of the individual's views regarding a public matter, that speculation will take emphasis on one side or the other. But in this matter, and speaking for myself, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Atomic Energy Act, the so-called McMahon Act, is almost unique, in fact, it is unique, although it has certain features of certain other acts. It is a unique statute and piece of legislation in our administrative history in this country. By that act there was created a commission to handle a vast, new, and mysterious force with unlimited power and unlimited processes both in the military field and, we hope, in the peacetime field. Because of its potential power and its potential possibility, rather unique powers were given to this Commission and unique responsibilities.

Moreover, in the act itself, in the basic law, there was created a Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, which had two fields of action. One was to secure information constantly and continuously and currently about the development and the unfolding of this great, new force. It was to inform itself about this new, great, and experimental field of atomic energy, which was our sole and exclusive possession, we thought, until we found out about Dr. Fuchs. Nevertheless, the joint committee and most of the members of the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy have been continuously serving from the time the special Senate committee was created 4 years ago, through the joint committee's activities, down to the present time, not only in the intimate exploration of atomic energy and of our progress and of where we were going, but they have also been in receipt of constant information and reports on all phases of atomic energy. So that the members of the Senate section have in fact been in intimate touch with this whole matter—in intimate touch with the Commissioners, in intimate touch with the installation, in intimate touch with the day-by-day progress and development, and in many instances, Mr. President, the lack of progress and the lack of development.

I call attention to the fact that the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has been constantly on this committee; that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] was a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy until there was a change of the political complexion of the Senate, and he, being the last appointed, was the first to go off the committee, when there was a change in the balance. But he is back now. The Senator from Connecticut, as the author of the bill, was a member of the Senate's special committee and constantly a member of the joint committee. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] has been a member of the joint committee and of the special committee from the inception of both. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] likewise was a member of the Senate special committee which had charge of the original act, and has been a member constantly of the Joint Committee. Other Senators who have served on the committee continuously include the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY) and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who was a member of the original special committee, for a time was not on the joint committee, but, beginning with the Eighty-first Congress, he again became a member of the Joint Committee. I say, Mr. President, that the charges of a political attitude and of partisanship so far as this commission is concerned, seem to me to be entirely without foundation. At least from my observation and from my own personal contact, they have been entirely without foundation.

I have said before that, of the original commissioners, I only knew the political position of two of them. As to the other three, I did not know. I do not know today what the political party affiliation is, for instance, of Mr. Murray, who has just been appointed to the Commission. I do not know, and I have never inquired, as to the political party affiliation of Dr. Smyth; I do not know what it is. I understand and have been told that Mr. Pike is a Republican but question of his party affiliation has never come up in committee meetings. So far as I know, the question of the party political affiliations of any member has never come up in the Republican section of the committee. I do not know what Mr. Dean's politics is. I have been told that he is a Democrat. I do not know. I have never inquired. It has never been a prime basis for my decision as to a commissioner, in determining his qualifications or the things he can do.

I desire to call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that there have been nine persons nominated to the Atomic Energy Commission since it has been established. Mr. Pike is the only one as to whom a formal objection on the part of the Committee has been made; that is, as to whom objection has been made to the confirmation of his nomination.

I am perfectly mindful of the dispute of last year in connection with Mr. Lilienthal, but there was no adverse position taken by the Commission in connection with Mr. Lilienthal. The five original members appointed by the President were confirmed. The three present Commissioners, Dr. Smyth, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Dean, have very recently been confirmed without opposition. So, Mr. President, I think it is high time that we lay the ghost that, merely because somebody is appointed to the Atomic Energy Commission, per se the head of political opposition is being raised. It simply is not so.

I have no opposition to Mr. Pike, nor do I favor him in any way, because of any political affiliation he has. My opposition to Mr. Pike—and it is distressing to have to say it—is because I conceive the Atomic Energy Commission to be one of the most powerful of commissions, and that it should be one of the most impartial and most ably administered commissions in the entire United States Government. I feel that, because of an accumulation of reasons, Mr. Pike does not measure up to what I believe to be the minimum qualification for a Commissioner with the power which the Atomic Energy Commission has.

Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that the Atomic Energy Commission is spending a billion dollars a year of the taxpayers' money. It is in a pioneering field that needs bold and sensible administrative judgment, as well as other kinds of judgment. I feel that Mr. Pike does not meet the qualifications demanded of that position.

Now for some reasons, Mr. President. In the first place, much has been made of the fact that there was a so-called hearing in connection with Mr. Pike and that no one made any charges against him. I invite attention to the fact that the committee has been holding constant hearings for 3½ years, not only weekly, but, as the chairman said a moment ago, sometimes several times a week. The commissioners and their subordinates and their programs came before the committee. We have had an unusual opportunity to observe, to evaluate, and to conclude as to the efficiency and the propriety of the individuals who are operating the commission. I do not expect everyone to agree with me, but I do say that as a result of those constant hearings I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Pike is inadequate, under all the circumstances, for the job of commissioner.

I have been asked this question: "Do you think Mr. Pike is a Red?" Of course not. I think he is a patriotic American citizen. I say that because it has been insinuated that there may be some mysterious thing about Mr. Pike's patriotism. I want to lay that ghost, because I am convinced that he is patriotic. I do not think there is the slightest Red tinge about Mr. Pike. I think there is a reticence on the part of Mr. Pike vigorously to clean out of the Atomic Energy Commission those whose views are a little pink; but I do not apply that to Mr. Pike himself.

I have been asked, "Do you think Mr. Pike is dishonest?" No, I do not think he is dishonest. I think he is mistaken, and I think he has a bad memory on occasions, but I do not question his personal honesty.

So far as his memory is concerned, I shall touch on it in a little while, but in the few minutes I have remaining I should like to specify as follows:

In my judgment, cumulatively, as a result of 3½ years of observation, I have been drawn unavoidably to the conclusion that Mr. Pike does not devote the serious and constructive attention to his job that I believe he should devote to it. We all recall last year when there was an investigation of the Atomic Energy Commission. We all recall that one of the most important—in my judgment, at least—phases of that investigation was that the Atomic Energy Commission, in what I believe to be clear violation of the Atomic Energy Act, admitted more than 4,000 persons to have access to restricted data without prior investigation by the FBI. Mr. Pike supported that policy. We all remember that last year Mr. Pike supported the policy of sending radioactive isotopes for industrial and, in fact, nonmilitary uses, to a foreign government. We know that Mr. Pike, in the face of united joint committee action and recommendation, put through the venture of the building of a $10,000,000 gas-pipe line into Oak Ridge, when the evidence adduced not only by our committee but by others, showed it was not essential.

There is another matter which I had not intended to bring up in the debate on the floor of the Senate, but on which Mr. Pike saw fit to break the seal of classification and secrecy on last Saturday and gave it to the public. I therefore believe I am justified in mentioning it. It is with reference to what he refers to as the Cyril Smith incident of a year or so ago. Inasmuch as he has broken the seal on that incident, inasmuch as he has seen fit to bring it up, although, so far as I know, no one had charged him publicly with reference to it, I think, in fairness and in all honesty, the matter should be explored a little bit.

The history of the matter is this: On either August 11 or August 12, 1948, as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, I learned on one of those two dates that a Dr. Cyril Smith, a scientist, had been sent to London two weeks previously, on authorization from the Commission, with a directive to discuss and to reveal to the British certain vital information going to the weapons phase of our atomic energy program, which, in my judgment, is specifically guarded against and forbidden by the Atomic Energy Act. I saw a copy of the directive of Dr. Smith. I am speaking of Dr. Cyril Smith, not of Dr. Smyth, a member of the Commission. I may say that Dr. Smith was operating under instructions, and not on his own volition. He was a servant of the Commission and was doing what he was authorized to do.

I found that Mr. Pike, who was in Washington and was Acting Chairman at the time, had, as Acting Chairman, in a most peculiar and mysterious way, apparently authorized these instructions to Dr. Smith. Whether Mr. Pike, as Acting Chairman, knew what he was doing, I do not know. If he did not know what he was doing, he should be charged with dereliction. If he did know what he was doing, he should be charged with violating the clear mandate of the Atomic Energy Act.

At all events, Dr. Smith was in London and had been there for 2 weeks before I knew about it. When I found out about it I immediately acted as rapidly as I could. I got in touch with the then Secretary of Defense, Mr. Forrestal, and told him that I knew of this particular situation and that I thought some of the most vital of our weapon secrets were about to be disclosed in full to the British; that I was greatly concerned about it; and I asked the Secretary of Defense if I could see him with reference to it, because if it was as vital as I thought it was, it went to the question of our military defense and the disclosure of our most sacred and secret possessions, so far as atomic weapons were concerned.

The Secretary of Defense said he thought it was very important that we discuss it. So I invited the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who was also a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to go to a special appointment with the Secretary of Defense. At that time there were also present Dr. Vannevar Bush and Mr. Carpenter, chairman of the military liaison committee established under the act.

I outlined the information which I had and said I thought it was vital. I said I did not know whether during the 2 weeks Dr. Smith had revealed the information which he had been authorized and directed to reveal. It was agreed at the meeting that it was military information, that it was vital, and that it did not come under the purview of any exchange of information, agreement, or agenda that we had with the British. The Secretary of Defense said that he would see what he could do about it.

Meanwhile, Admiral Lewis L. Strauss, who was the member of the Commission from whom I got the information the day before, and who had, I am thoroughly convinced, discussed the matter with Mr. Pike before he talked to me about it, because when he told me about it he said he had discussed the matter with Mr. Pike, communicated with Commissioner Pike and convinced him that as acting chairman the order should be rescinded. This was also, I am sure, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense and others. A telephone call was put in across the Atlantic. Dr. Smith was reached by phone. Fortunately, he said he had not got around to discussing that phase of the information he was supposed to disclose. His orders were countermanded.

In the Washington Evening Star on Saturday there appeared an article under the byline of Martin S. Hayden, which is presumably an interview with Mr. Pike. In it Mr. Pike makes some rather serious accusations against Admiral Strauss, and alleges that he twisted the facts. I am sorry to see that statement, because so far as I know there has never been any dispute between Admiral Strauss and Mr. Pike. I will say, Mr. President, that at no time up to this date has Admiral Strauss ever suggested that I or anyone else, so far as I know, oppose Mr. Pike's confirmation, or his reappointment. So far as I know, he has taken no steps to block the nomination. However, in the interview, as reported in the Star, Mr. Pike is quoted as saying: "the 'Cyril Smith incident' was created and 'badly distorted by Admiral Lewis T. Strauss.'"

It is my opinion, Mr. President, that this is an utter and complete misconception, because I was in intimate touch with this matter, and I personally talked with Mr. Pike on the telephone on the day, I think it was, the telephone call was put in to Dr. Smith in England to stop further disclosure of information. Mr. Pike was acting chairman at that time. I will say that when the pressure was put on Mr. Pike he reversed his field and did join with Dr. Barker and Admiral Strauss in recalling the authority which had originally been issued under his authority as acting chairman.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Can the Senator tell us what the authority was?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The authority was a directive written within the commission itself and given to Dr. Smith immediately before he left for London to discuss atomic science with the British atomic energy experts. I do not have a copy of the letter with me. So far as I know, our committee does not have a copy in its files. However, I have seen a copy of it. It was over a year ago, and I cannot trust my memory to say exactly what was contained in the memorandum, except to say that there were several categories of information which Dr. Smith was authorized and directed to discuss with the British, and he was authorized to disclose our information in these categories to the British. Among them was the question of the metallurgy of plutonium, which is the metallurgy of explosives of an atomic bomb.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Who signed the directive?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not have before me a copy of the directive, and I would hesitate to say at this time. I am of the opinion that the letter or the directive was signed either by Mr. Pike or was issued by the authority.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. McMAHON. I think the Senator is inadvertently mistaken. The letter was authorized by the general manager, Mr. Wilson, under authority granted to him by the commission to outline to the men who were going to England the specific subjects to discuss under the so-called modus vivendi which existed between the British and ourselves.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was this trip prior to the so-called Blair House conference which was mentioned in the press in relation to the disclosure of certain secrets to the British?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the Senator talks about "disclosure of certain secrets to the British." I believe that to be a misnomer as applied to that conference.

Mr. FERGUSON. I meant that merely by way of description.

Mr. McMAHON. It is a misnomer if it is applied to the conference I attended. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that this so-called Smith incident was under date of August 10 or 12 of 1948. Therefore it was during the lifetime of the modus vivendi, which went into effect between the British and ourselves approximately on February 1, 1948.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. If the Senator from Michigan is referring to what is popularly called the Blair House conference, the incident I am talking about was long before the Blair House conference.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield once more, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Did the modus vivendi contemplate the disclosure of military aspects of fissionable material?

Mr. McMAHON. No. As the Senator knows, because he took a deep interest in the negotiations which led up to the modus vivendi being concluded, there were nine areas of information which it was agreed would be the subject of cooperation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Military information was not included.

Mr. McMAHON. From that modus vivendi military information was excluded. I make no point that this exchange of plutonium information came within the limitations of the modus vivendi.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Was not the granting of the authority a complete violation of the Atomic Energy Act?

Mr. McMAHON. I think that the authority to Dr. Smith, which was given to him by the general manager, should not have been given to him. I will say to the Senator that I am glad the authority was stopped when it was stopped.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I remember the distinguished Senator's temper and his shock when he learned about the matter. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. At the time the letter was written, was Mr. Pike the acting chairman of the Commission?

Mr. McMAHON. I shall have to look that up and give the answer before the conclusion of the debate. I say that because when the Chairman of the Joint Committee [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] entered into the proceedings with Commissioner Strauss and Commissioner Pike, they were the only two Commissioners who were in town. I do not know who was acting as chairman on the day when the instructions were signed. I do not know the date of the instructions.

Mr. MILLIKIN. May we accept it tentatively that since there were only two in town, Commissioner Pike was the Acting Chairman?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think we can do that, because Admiral Gingrich, who was the head of security at that time, came across the letter of instructions to Dr. Smith in the course of business. So I think that would be an unfair assumption, but I shall look it up.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would it not also be an unfair assumption that the two members who were in town would be ignorant of the instructions given to Dr. Smith?

Mr. McMAHON. At least it appears as a matter of record that neither Mr. Pike nor Admiral Strauss was aware of these specific instructions until Admiral Gingrich called it to Admiral Strauss' attention.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Who, then, took the liberty of writing a letter of that kind?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It was the general manager who signed the letter of instructions to Dr. Smith, a letter of instructions which, as I understand, he signed under the authority of the Commission, granted to him, to outline, within the limitations of the nine specific areas covered by the modus vivendi, the specific things about which they were to talk.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would the Senator say that the two Commissioners who were in town would be so negligent of their duty that they would not study a letter of such grave import before it was sent?

Mr. McMAHON. I would say that it was regrettable that the general manager approved the letter of authority, which included so broad a power as that which was given to Dr. Smith. I would hesitate to accuse Admiral Strauss or Mr. Pike of being negligent, or having delegated authority to the general manager under his general instructions as to what was to be included.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It is clear that at least so far as Admiral Strauss was concerned, he took effective steps to remedy the blunder.

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would the Senator say that the so-called modus vivendi had any legal authority to override the Atomic Energy Act?

Mr. McMAHON. No, and that is why this exchange of information on the metallurgy of plutonium should not have been had. There can be no question about that.

Mr. MILLIKIN. So, to summarize the Senator's position, am I correct in saying that he highly deplores what was done, leaving some reservation as to "who dun it"?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not know as to whether I wish to adopt the Senator's suggestion of "highly deplores."

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator may use his own characterization.

Mr. McMAHON. I say a mistake was made.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would the Senator say that it was incredible mismanagement?

Mr. McMAHON. As the Senator has pointed out, I think very correctly, if mismanagement is incredible, then it cannot be mismanagement.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I suggest to the Senator that when anyone does anything which would take some other country into the heart of our atomic energy procedures and secrets, to the extent we still had them, he is doing something that is worse than deplorable. I could find many harsher adjectives to apply to it.

Mr. McMAHON. I am happy the Senator added the phrase "to the extent that we still had them," because, as the Senator knows, when Dr. Klaus Fuchs was admitted into this country in 1943——

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think in 1947 he came here and took a post-graduate course in our secrets.

Mr. McMAHON. He came back here to declassify the things he had originated in his own head, and the things he had developed in the Manhattan district, when he was cleared by Gen. Leslie Groves on a certificate from Scotland Yard.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I say to the Senator that that was the first round.

Mr. McMAHON. And I say to the Senator that that was the round that counted, and the only round that counted.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I say that was the first round. Absolving no one after that from responsibility for security, the gentleman came here in 1947 and took a post-graduate course in the innermost secrets of the whole business, including our advanced research.

Mr. McMAHON. I say the Senator is mistaken, on the record. He did no such thing, and the record of the hearings before our committee will prove to the Senator that he took no such course.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Let us produce the record—if there is nothing secret about it. Since Fuchs has confessed everything he learned here, why should we keep it secret?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question, if the Senator will not make it long.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan is not on the committee, and there are many other Senators now on the floor who are not on the committee. I am sure we are all anxious to get the facts in order that we may intelligently vote at 4 o'clock.

I am wondering whether or not the Senator can advise us as to when Mr. Pike first saw the letter which contained instructions to give away or to discuss the secrets of the atomic weapon. If he did not see it when it was written or taken to England, how was it that he did not see it? What is his explanation?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The information I obtained at the time, although I have not the documents to verify it, was that this document, among others, was submitted to Mr. Pike, as acting chairman, at the time it was given to Dr. Smith. My further information is that Mr. Pike later said he did not realize what was in the letter, and that it really, to that extent, was news to him. When the matter was called to his attention, I think on the day I had my meeting with the Secretary of Defense and others, when I found out about it—and when what had been done was called to his attention, I will say that he then joined with Admiral Strauss and Dr. Barker in a telephonic communication to England to countermand the authority.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does the Senator not agree that if the joint committee, at that time headed by the Senator from Iowa, had not been on their toes and had not taken the matter up immediately with the then Secretary of National Defense, Mr. Forrestal, and if he immediately had not moved into action on the situation—had so much as 24 hours more gone by—the metallurgy of plutonium might have been disclosed to the British at that time? And, as the Senator has pointed out, this particular part of the atomic program deals primarily with weapon development.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think the Senator is substantially correct. Whether it would have been 24 hours more or 2 days more, I do not know, but 2 weeks had already gone by with Dr. Smith in London authorized to discuss this very thing. Dr. Smith claims—and I do not mean to doubt his word—that he did not get around to the discussion of that issue.

Mr. LANGER. If the Senator will yield, what is the name of the general manager who signed the letter?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Wilson. I cannot say that the general manager did sign the letter. It is the opinion of the joint committee, of which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] is chairman, that Mr. Wilson did sign the letter. It is my recollection that I was informed that the letter signed by the general manager had been submitted to Mr. Pike as chairman. Mr. Pike disclaims that. That is a matter of dispute, and I do not know how it can be proved.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield, but my time is limited.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was a matter of such importance as the modus vivendi not passed upon by the Commission? Was it left to the manager, Mr. Wilson, or did the Commission pass upon the modus vivendi?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The modus vivendi, as I recall—and I shall stand corrected if my memory is wrong—was authorized by the Commission, and passed upon. The point involved here is that the directions to Dr. Smith went away beyond the modus vivendi and into fields specifically prohibited so far as the Atomic Energy Act is concerned.

Mr. President, I am of the opinion that the Atomic Energy Commission authorized certain departments to discuss fields of information within the modus vivendi, but not to go outside of it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief point there?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from Colorado has already brought out this point, but I think it is very important. The modus vivendi was not a treaty ratified by the Senate. Therefore the modus vivendi as such could not and did not supersede the basic Atomic Energy Act, and anything that was done in violation of the law did not get clearance for the individual who so acted merely by acting under the modus vivendi.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think that is correct.

Mr. President, there are other Senators who desire to speak and I have occupied more time than I intended, but I want to call attention to the fact that of the nine Senate members of the Joint Committeee on Atomic Energy six members have been the most consistent in their attendance upon committee meetings of the joint committee and otherwise. Those six members are the present chairman of the joint committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], since he has returned on the joint committee, and I may include myself in that historical background as the sixth. I think the record will show that those six members have been more faithful and more continuous in their attendance and in their examination into this matter throughout the 3½ years of the life of the Commission and of the joint committee than the others; and of those six members, five voted against Mr. Pike's confirmation. Five of the six members who have had more of this information given to them because they have been in attendance at more committee meetings to receive it than the other members of the Commission, voted against Mr. Pike's confirmation. I think that is very significant.

Let me call another thing to the attention of the Senate. There has been some talk of politics. But when Mr. Pike's nomination was originally before the Senate for confirmation, that is on his first appointment, two votes were cast against him, that of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] and that of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER]. Both Senators voted against his confirmation at that time. There was no partisanship, no politics in that vote. There is no partisanship and no politics in the present attitude toward Mr. Pike. So far as I am concerned and I am sure so far as the other Senate Members of the Joint Committee are concerned who have voted against him, we dislike to take a position of this kind, but as intimate observers of this program and as individuals who themselves have a deep concern for the impartial and non political and unpolitical operation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I believe that these five members have been constrained to put the good of the Atomic Energy Commission ahead of any executive appointment, and to speak frankly, rather than supinely support an Executive appointment because the Executive has made the appointment. I think that is something which Members of the Senate should dwell upon.

Mr. President, I am a little afraid that we will see certain choosing up of sides on this matter when the time for voting comes. I anticipate that may be the way the thing will work out. But I am convinced that not one of the five Members who voted against the confirmation of Mr. Pike has the least question of partisanship or the least question of personal rancor, but only of voting his convictions in behalf of a more vigorous and a more progressive atomic-energy program in the interest of the national defense and the public security.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] cares to yield I shall be glad to have him do so. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] has asked me to yield a few minutes to him. I shall be governed by whatever the Senator from Connecticut likes to have me do.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I do not see any of my troops here.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Then, Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the senior Senator from Colorado, or more time if he desires.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield for one question before he yields to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Did the members of the committee take up with the President any of their objections to Mr. Pike before they acted upon his name, or did the name come in without any conference being had between the Executive and the committee?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The first meeting of the committee was held on Tuesday, and the vote was had on Mr. Pike on Thursday. At the first meeting had with respect to Mr. Pike on Tuesday it was considered by the committee whether to notify the President of the feeling of the committee so the President could be informed, and if there was some alteration of attitude he would be given a chance and Mr. Pike would be given a chance to do whatever they wanted. That was done. There was no change in attitude. So on Thursday, 2 days later, the vote was had upon which we are acting now.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Is the Senator in a position to tell us from what source he received the information that Mr. Pike saw the letter of authority to Dr. Cyril Smith at the time or about the time it was delivered to Dr. Smith?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The source of my information, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, is an employee within the Commission, whose job I am afraid would be in peril if I disclosed his name. I will be happy to tell it to the Senator from Missouri privately, but if I revealed the source of my information I am afraid the man would be looking for a job outside the Government within a day or so.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, may we be advised of the time situation at the moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has 27 minutes left, and the Senator from Connecticut has 1 hour and 10 minutes left.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the Senator from Iowa for allotting 5 minutes to me. It will not take me very long to say what I have to say.

Mr. President, article II of the Constitution provides that the President—shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, and other public Ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

When the Congress enacted the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, it very wisely provided:

Members of the Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It could have provided for the appointment of the members without Senate confirmation but it deliberately wrote in this safeguard. When I entered the Senate in 1937 I took a solemn oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. It is an obligation that I do not take lightly.

There has been some intimation that the matter of senatorial confirmation is routine and that Senators commit some high crime when they dare to oppose a Presidential nomination; and further, that when a Senator does oppose a Presidential nomination he must give a minute political accounting for his action.

I disagree violently with that philosophy. To me senatorial confirmation is neither a routine nor a political matter. The Constitution could have given the President carte blanche, but instead it deliberately required him to seek the advice and consent of the Senate. So far as I know, that advice was not sought in this case.

I have no apologies to make for my opposition to Mr. Pike. He was weighed in my scales conscientiously and, in my opinion, which must be satisfied, so far as my vote is concerned, was found wanting. It is my duty therefore to vote against the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

I resent being charged with political irregularity in voting as I voted, because I found it was my duty to vote as I did in committee.

As has been said, when Mr. Pike's nomination was before the Senate some 3½ years ago I voted in committee against the confirmation of the nomination. I recall that at the hearings which we held, Mr. Pike himself—and I honored him for making the statement—suggested that he questioned whether or not he had the ability to sit on this Commission. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD that statement, if I can find it, because I think it is very important.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give us any reason why you were selected on this Commission, as a man without previous association with it? I assure you I do not mean that as a hostile question.

Mr. PIKE. I assure you it is a very proper question. It has bothered me a good deal. As an actual fact, until I was inside the President's office, and he put the exact question to me, I had not even got to the point—I had wondered why he had asked me to come down, but that thing had never occurred to me.

In other words, I had not even got the idea up so far as to dismiss it.

The CHAIRMAN. Since you have been appointed on the Commission, have you formed a substantial or basic conclusion as to the general field or activity of this Commission, the responsibilities at present, and any general philosophy of conduct for the future?

Mr. PIKE. With this proviso: I want to say that usually, Mr. Chairman, in taking hold of the job, after 2 or 3 months, you begin to get some feel of it, some feel of the size of it, and what you may be able to do with it. This is the only one I ever tackled which seemed further out of reach now than it did the day I looked at it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a pretty good sized job?

Mr. PIKE. It appears that way. And the thing that forces that view with me is that in the first 2 or 3 weeks we were on the Commission we took a trip around the country, with the idea of getting some idea of the outside magnitude of this animal, realizing that we could not learn very much about it.

And during that period we were exposed to short, well-organized talks—you might almost call them selling talks—by 35 or 40 enthusiastic scientific specialists engaged in different ramifications of this job. If there is one thing that was left with me afterward it was that each one of them seemed to feel more possibilities, probabilities, and almost certainties, that required investigation, required looking into; so many that all they needed was more men, more money, and more time.

So it raised this whole series of question marks, promising things that ought to be looked at. It left it so complicated that I honestly came back with the feeling that if we could transmit to the Congress the great, apparently well-based enthusiasm, in enough detail, and carry the spirit far enough so that the Congress would appropriate the money that these people needed, we would more that half fill the job.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I honored Mr. Pike for making that statement, because when I listened to the testimony, I was convinced that Mr. Pike did not measure up to the tremendous responsibilities of the work of the Commission to which he was appointed.

Congress has appropriated upward of $5,000,000,000, as I recall, in connection with the atomic energy program. We have voted that money in good faith. There is not a Member of the Senate, not even the chairman of the joint committee, who has ever been told how many bombs have been manufactured by the Atomic Energy Commission. I think it is correct that that information has not been given; I think it should not be given to anyone. I do not think any of us should be told that. I merely bring up this matter to show to how great an extent the Congress has reposed faith in the Commission.

There is no branch of our Government, any place, and never has been since the Government was created, with which the Congress has gone along to so great an extent as it has with the Atomic Energy Commission. We have turned over to that Commission, as we had to do, and we have left to it, as we had to do, the responsibility for carrying on this work.

Mr. President, for those reasons we must be very careful as to the men who are confirmed to membership on the Commission.

I like Mr. Pike personally. I have no objection to him because he is a Republican. This is not a partisan matter. I would just as soon vote for a Republican to serve on that Commission as I would vote for a Democrat. The law makes no distinction on the basis of politics, so far as membership on the Commission is concerned; and I am not opposing confirmation of Mr. Pike's nomination because he is a Republican—either because he is a Maine Republican or because he is any other kind of Republican. I am opposing confirmation of his nomination simply on the ground that I do not believe he measures up to the standards we should have maintained in regard to membership on the Commission.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I have only a little time, and I do not think I have enough time to yield, because I have used more time than I meant to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield 2 minutes additional to the Senator from Colorado, if that will be sufficient for him. Let me inquire how much time he desires to have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I shall try to conclude in 2 minutes. I thank the Senator for yielding additional time to me.

Mr. President, according to the newspaper article which I hold in my hand, and from which I now read:

Mr. Pike concedes that, with miners out of work in Colorado, Senators MILLIKIN and JOHNSON have a "natural interest" in increased uranium production on the plateau.

"But the low-grade Colorado ore is about our only big domestic source," he said. "I maintain we should mine just enough of it to develop the proper technique and import in peacetime all the foreign ore we can get. Then, if war comes, we can step up Colorado production."

Mr. President, that is a confession of the position of Mr. Pike toward the mining of uranium in the United States. That is a statement of his position regarding the mining of uranium not only in Colorado, but anywhere else in the plateau region made up of the four States whose corners join—Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Utah—where uranium ore has been discovered. My colleague from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] and I have had many conferences with Mr. Pike with respect to developing that uranium ore. Mr. Pike has taken the position, as stated in the article to which I have just referred, that that ore should be left alone.

I am completely in accord with the policy that the United States should buy every grain of uranium, from whatever source it may be purchased, so as at all times to stockpile uranium ore. I do not care where the uranium is to be found; I want my Government to buy it and bring it to the United States.

However, at the same time I want the Government to go ahead with the development of our own uranium deposits in those four States and also in the State of Wyoming, where it is thought there may be some uranium. I wish to say to you, Mr. President, and to my colleagues on this floor that Mr. Pike is the enemy of the production of uranium ore domestically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Iowa whether he will yield an additional minute to me.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield one more minute to the Senator from Colorado, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for an additional minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, from the very beginning, I have felt that on this great Commission we should have someone who knows something about minerals, someone who is experienced in metallurgy, because the Atomic Energy Commissioners have to deal with the source materials, and the source materials in connection with this great program are minerals. So we should have on the Commission a man who has expert knowledge of minerals. However, we do not have such a member of the Commission. The nearest we have to such a person is the gentleman from Maine, who has no experience in metals or metallurgy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield now to the Senator from Wyoming. Let me inquire how much time he desires to have.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall take only a few moments.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming whatever time he may desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have known Mr. Sumner T. Pike since he was a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission. I have had occasion to observe very closely his official activity upon that Commission, as I have had occasion to observe his activity upon the Atomic Energy Commission.

As a member of various committees of the Senate, it was my official duty to work with Mr. Pike in both capacities—both when he was a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission and during his service on the Atomic Energy Commission.

The appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission are carried in the independent offices appropriation bill, and I happen to be a member of the Appropriations Committee's subcommittee which handles the independent offices appropriations. Mr. Pike has appeared before that subcommitte on numerous occasions. Without any reservation at all, I can say to the Senate that I know of no official of the Government who has shown a broader grasp of the functions and responsibilities of the Commission or agency of which he was a member, when appearing before an appropriations committee, than has Mr. Sumner Pike.

He is a man of education, of training, and of successful achievement in business. I think he is the type of man whom we ought to welcome to serve the Government in executive offices and in offices of this kind. The duties and responsibilities of the Atomic Energy Commission cannot be overestimated. Here is a man who has made what I regard to be an outstanding record of efficiency, intelligence, and patriotism.

So I shall deem it a personal privilege to cast my vote in favor of confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Sumner T. Pike.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] desires to be recognized at this time.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am perfectly willing to take some time now. However, because of the unbalance of the time, it seems to me it would be perfectly proper for the proponents of the confirmation of Mr. Pike's nomination to take some of the time at this point, because I believe they have remaining 1 hour and 20 minutes, whereas we are down to less than 20 minutes. So I think it would make for more orderly procedure in connection with the debate for the proponents of confirmation of the nomination to take time at this point.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I think there is something to what the Senator from California has just said. There are two or three things on which I should like to comment. I should like to be reminded when 7 minutes have elapsed, if the Chair will so advise me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, some reference has been made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] to the so-called Dr. Cyril Smith incident. I find myself in a most embarrassing position in regard to that incident, because there are two versions of the facts maintained by two friends of mine. Lewis Strauss, who was a member of the commission originally, and who resigned a few months ago, is a close personal friend of mine, for whom I have a very high regard. He was a very able, hard working member of the commission. Mr. Pike and he have a disagreement as to certain of the facts which led to the cancellation of the instructions to Dr. Smith, which were signed, I may say to the Senator from Iowa, not by the general manager, as I may have indicated a few moments ago, but by Dr. Fisk, who was head of the research department of the commission, and who in turn, however, had conferred with the general manager before the letter was sent. The bare bones of the facts of the Smith incident are these: The letter of authority was given to Dr. Smith, who went to Europe. Before he met with the British to discuss the metallurgy of platonium, he was ordered not to discuss it. The question at issue is between ex-Commissioner Strauss and, I might add, ex-Commissioner Pike—because he ceased to have any validity on the first of the month—as to just how that cancellation order came about. It is Pike's contention that when Strauss came to him, upon having been notified by Admiral Gingrich—that is, Strauss having been notified of this letter of authority—Pike called Dr. Bacher, another member of the Commission, on the telephone, and that Dr. Bacher stated that it certainly was in a doubtful class, and that he agreed it should be stopped. Thereupon two cablegrams were sent, one through the State Department and one directly to Smith, and the telephone call was placed to Smith, but he could not be reached on the telephone that day, because he was off on a little holiday in Scotland. That was the reason he had not gotten around to discussing the point with the British. The next day Pike telephoned or talked with Smith on the telephone and explained to him the decision.

Admiral Strauss' version is—and they both have it written out, and I shall submit their statements in the RECORD, but I am trying to epitomize the situation fairly—Admiral Strauss' contention is that he went to Pike, and that he found resistance in Pike. He went to see the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], then chairman of the Joint Committee. The Senator from Iowa called in the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the three of them thereupon went over to see Mr. Forrestal, who was Secretary of Defense. Mr. Forrestal got in touch first with Donald Carpenter, who at that time was chairman of the military liaison committee, and, at that point, Pike backed up and did what it is alleged he should have done immediately and got in touch with Dr. Smith. That is the distinction, or rather the difference in the two versions of that incident.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have followed the outline as given by the Senator from Connecticut. What I should like to ascertain is what the record shows as to the meeting at which this letter was authorized, and what it shows as to when the letter was written, and whether it was submitted to any one of the persons to whom the Senator has been referring.

Mr. McMAHON. Let me review the situation quickly for the Senator. In January 1947 we were negotiating with the British for the exchange of information in certain defined areas. That agreement was entered into. That agreement was fully known to the members of the joint committee. In fact the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] were in Blair House when it was signed, and, if they did not take an active part in the negotiation of the agreement, they certainly gave very close attention to the negotiations. That agreement, incidentally, is still in existence. It provides for the exchange of information in nine specified areas having to do with health and safety and certain other things which are deemed not to pertain to military information.

The Commission, at a meeting, as I understand, designated the general manager to go over the subjects within those areas. Dr. Fisk, who was head of the Research Division of the Commission, prepared the specific set of instructions to Dr. Cyril Smith. It was done with the general manager's knowledge and approval. The letter was given to him, and, after he departed for England, and within about 10 days, Admiral Gingrich brought a copy of the instructions to Admiral Strauss. Then starts the disputed area, as to whether Pike immediately agreed with Strauss upon telephoning Bacher and inaugurating any movement to stop it, or whether it was necessary for Admiral Strauss to come to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Michigan, and, in turn, to Mr. Forrestal, to put on the heat to get it stopped. That is the dispute.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I understood that the Blair House meeting was the one at which there was created the modus vivendi, in 1947, is that correct?

Mr. McMAHON. Let me say to the Senator that Mr. Lovett, the then Assistant Secretary of State, and Mr. Lilienthal, of the Commission and for the Commission, came before the joint committee, and we held many meetings relating to the advisability of entering into this agreement. Dr. Vannevar Bush was an adviser for the State Department at that time. He strongly urged the joint committee to enter into that arrangement, and that was done.

Mr. WILEY. That was done in 1947, was it not?

Mr. McMAHON. In 1947 or 1948.

Mr. WILEY. But the letter was written in August 1948, was it not?

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. Certainly there must have been a meeting of the Commission of some kind, before the letter was written, at which the particular contents of the letter were discussed. What do the minutes show as to who was present, participating in the discussion? Then, after the letter was written, was there another meeting at which the letter was submitted? That is what I am trying to ascertain.

Mr. McMAHON. I may say to the Senator there have been dozens of conferences held between the British representatives and our representatives relating to health and safety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield myself 5 minutes more. Those meetings were held as a result of an order signed by the Director of the Division of Research, after it had been cleared with the General Manager. The Senator's inquiry about the Commission's having acted on it, I think, can be answered in this way: They did not purport to set down over their signatures the instruction and say, "This comes within the modus vivendi." It was a modus vivendi outlining nine specific areas. They said to the general manager, "You stay within those areas." So far as I know, the Smith incident is the only occasion on which an authority greater than that in the areas was given to anyone to discuss the matter.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. So that the history of the situation may be clear, and particularly in view of the fact that Members on the floor do not have the background information which, of necessity, the members of the joint committee have, the RECORD should not stand as it now stands, that the modus vivendi was entered into with the full knowledge of the joint committee. So far as it goes, the statement of the Senator from Connecticut is, of course, absolutely accurate, but the historic fact is that the reason why the Blair House modus vivendi was finally entered into is that the members of the joint committee, after they became acquainted with the fact that there was an earlier agreement with which they were not acquainted, and as a result of some considerable discussion with the Government of the United States, entered into a later agreement which superseded the earlier agreement. Is that statement substantially correct?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think I quite agree with the statement of the Senator with reference to cooperation having existed between the British and ourselves under a previous agreement. I think the Senator has reference to the so-called Quebec agreement. When the act went into effect on August 1, 1946, it cut off cooperation between the British and ourselves. The Commission and the State Department became convinced, as did everyone connected with it, including Dr. Bush, for whom I know the Senator has a high opinion, as well as I have, that it was to our joint advantage to discuss certain areas with the British. I think that is undoubtedly correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield myself five more minutes.

Therefore, I would amend the Senator's statement by pointing out that there was not in existence any working agreement for the exchange of information between August 1, 1946, and whatever was the date of the adoption of the modus vivendi. There was, however, a restriction in the Quebec agreement upon certain actions which I shall not go into at this time. It was undoubtedly binding upon us, and it was removed from the modus vivendi. The Senator knows to what I am referring.

Mr. KNOWLAND. For obvious reasons it cannot be and will not be discussed on the floor. The point I wanted to have made clear is that there was an earlier executive agreement which, of course, took place before the creation of the Joint Committee, so that the Joint Committee, of itself, could not have been notified at that time. It was negotiated without the knowledge of the Congress. I am not complaining about that. I merely want to say that it bore some relationship, as the Senator has just pointed out, to the type of agreement worked out at the Blair House.

Mr. McMAHON. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator tell us what information he has as to whether Mr. Pike knew of the contents of the letter of authority to Dr. Cyril Smith at or about the time it was delivered to Dr. Smith?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think there was any dispute between Mr. Strauss and Mr. Pike as to the fact that Pike learned of it from Strauss, who learned of it, in turn, from Admiral Gingrich, probably at a time when Dr. Smith had reached England, I should think, about 10 or 12 days after the letter was signed and he took ship.

Mr. DONNELL. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that his information was from some employee of the Commission, to the effect that Mr. Pike had seen the letter at or about the time it was delivered to Dr. Cyril Smith.

Mr. McMAHON. No; I think the Senator is mistaken about that. There is no contention made as to Pike's knowledge of the matter until he was advised by Strauss. The question that arose is as to whether, as he contends, he went to work when he was notified by Admiral Strauss, and instructed Smith to stop.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to address an inquiry to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McMAHON. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator from Iowa stated, in substance, that he had received information from an employee of the Commission to the effect that Mr. Pike had seen the letter of authority to Dr. Cyril Smith at or about the time of the delivery of that letter to Dr. Smith.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes; I received that information. I would have to say to the Senator, as I said before, that I feel, in fairness to the employee, I cannot name him. His job would be in jeopardy if I should name him. I am not vouching for the truth of the statement except that I believe he is an honorable, truth-telling employee, and I believe he was telling me the truth.

Mr. DONNELL. I am not asking the Senator to divulge the name, but I thought the Senator from Connecticut indicated that there is no contention that the letter of authority to Dr. Cyril Smith was sent to Mr. Pike at about the time of its delivery to Dr. Smith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield myself two additional minutes.

I was under the misapprehension, Mr. President, that no such suggestion has been made. I was engaged in conversation on some material which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] wanted, and it must have been during that time that the Senator made that statement.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I did not allege that that was a fact. I stated that I had been told by an employee of the Commission that the letter had gone across Mr. Pike's desk and that he had, in fact, known about it, but I do not allege that that statement is true. I am merely stating what was told to me.

Mr. McMAHON. In view of that, I should like to adduce some evidence tending to prove that the statement is not true, because, on July 26, 1948, when the letter was signed and delivered to Dr. Smith, there were present in the Commission Mr. Lilienthal, Mr. Strauss, and Mr. Pike. Certainly if the letter went over Mr. Pike's desk, undoubtedly it would go over Mr. Strauss' desk, and the fact is clear from Mr. Strauss himself that he knew nothing about it until Admiral Gingrich notified him about it some 12 days later. The only way we can believe Mr. Pike knew about it is to believe that there was a conspiracy to keep the knowledge away from Strauss and get the thing done. I do not think Mr. Strauss would be heard to make such a suggestion as that.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has 14 minutes. The Senator from Connecticut has 48 minutes.

Mr. McMAHON. I shall be very generous and yield some of my time to the Republican side of the aisle, but I cannot do it until I see what the situation is for the next 20 minutes or so.

I now yield 7 minutes to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Illinois is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I think I can speak with some knowledge of Mr. Pike's general qualifications, because 41 years ago in 1909 we both entered the same college together, joined the same fraternity, and were close and intimate friends throughout our 4 years together. Since then we have kept in fairly close touch with each other and I have known many of his activities at first hand.

In college, we all regarded Sumner Pike as the ablest man of our college generation, having an amazing grasp of physics, chemistry, and mathematics and a perceptive and sure common sense. His family was one of the largest sardine packers in the country and along with his other activities Mr. Pike has helped to develop and expand this business still further.

Shortly after graduation, Mr. Pike joined the utilities firm of Stone & Webster and quickly made an able record in it. After serving in the First World War he entered the oil industry in the Southwest and then managed the investments for a big group of fire-insurance companies. He made enormous amounts of money for his clients not only by his judicious choice of investments during the twenties but also by selling all of their holdings at the very height of the bull market and just before the collapse in October 1929. He sold all the holdings of his clients at the very height of the market, about 16 hours before the market collapsed, and made for them a sum which I have heard variously estimated as being between $80,000,000 and $100,000,000.

This naturally made his reputation in Wall Street and he was almost immediately made a partner in Case, Pomeroy & Co. Here he spent a most interesting decade. The firm specialized in developing both new products and backward areas. Pike worked on the development of dry ice, synthetic rubber, oil and gas both at home and in the Middle East, Mexican mines, and many other products. His scientific knowledge and business acumen joined in helping to develop many useful products and speedily to acquire for himself a comfortable private fortune.

Having established a firm economic base for himself, Mr. Pike was ready by the end of the thirties to devote his abilities to public service.

Appointed to the Securities and Exchange Commission in 1940, Mr. Pike made, according to my judgment—and I believe according to the judgment of all students of the question—a notable record. He knew at first hand the intricacies of Wall Street maneuvering—having participated in some of them himself—and, while he was absolutely fair to the corporations and to the issuing houses, he stood like a rock in protecting the public interest. During the war, because of his knowledge of the oil industry, he was given added duties in fixing the prices for those products. Here again he did a good job. For the last 4 years, as we all know, he has been a member of the Atomic Energy Commission and for the last few months its acting chairman. His scientific training and business experience admirably qualified him for this critical job.

In my youth I regarded Sumner Pike as the ablest practical person I had ever known, and today, after 40 years, I am still of that opinion. I personally am assured of his honesty and his devotion to the best interests of this country. He seems to me to be precisely the type of man whom our Republican friends are so constantly telling us we should get in Government employ; namely, one who has made a conspicuous success in private business and who has both wide and deep practical experience and theoretical training. There are few such men anywhere and it is hard to get any of them into public service. Once we do obtain them, if they do a good job, we should try to hold on to them rather than drive them out.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator was reciting some of the background of Mr. Pike. I am not familiar with one phase of it. Did I understand the Senator to say that Mr. Pike was a partner in Case, Pomeroy & Co.?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. How long did he hold that position?

Mr. DOUGLAS. He was a partner, I think, from the beginning of 1930 until the firm was dissolved in the late thirties.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The firm is no longer in existence?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. Mr. Case died. Upon the death of Mr. Case the firm was dissolved, because it was felt that since it had been engaged in the development of new products the assets of the firm should be conserved for the widow and not risked in continuing the development of new products.

To my mind so far as Mr. Pike is concerned, he has one demerit. That is that he has always been too much of a Republican for my taste. However, I have never believed that this fact should be held against him, or any other man. I have never believed it to be a man's personal fault that he should be a Republican. It may be a misfortune, but the fact itself should not be held against him. I believe instead that there are not only many but actually a very large number of splendid Americans who belong to the Republican Party. I believe moreover that they should be given a chance, when they are qualified, to use their talents for the public good. In spite of Mr. Pike's aberration from perfect behavior, I think he is one of that goodly company. On the basis of 40 years acquaintanceship, I shall not only vote for, but urge the confirmation of Mr. Pike's nomination.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, this matter is of some concern to my colleague and myself because of Mr. Pike's long association with the State of Maine, where he is well known and highly regarded. I was happy to hear the Senator from Iowa say what he has in order to clarify some of the aspects of this matter, particularly in the political field, because I think it is most unfortunate that at this or any time during the consideration of a matter of this consequence primarily political factors should be considered as influencing Members of the Senate. From knowledge which I have of the situation there is no warrant for the suggestion that politics of any character entered into the consideration of this matter, either by the committee or by other Members of the Senate. I think we are indebted to the Senator from Iowa for making that abundantly clear.

We appreciate also the generosity of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] in admitting that there may be good and useful persons in the Republican Party. We hope he will extend that admission in an ever-broadening field. We share his opinion that there are good, honest, loyal, capable, and patriotic Democrats, among whom we count him as one, not only because he was born and raised in the State of Maine and educated in one of its colleges but because of the character of his service since then.

I am also deeply indebted to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] for clarifying the situation as to his personal views, at least, regarding the patriotism and honesty of Mr. Pike. I think that also does much, not only to clarify the atmosphere but also to bespeak the absence of prejudice in the consideration of this matter by the Senator from Iowa and the other Senators who are associated with him.

That was not necessary so far as the four minority members of the committee were concerned, or so far as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] was concerned, against whom suggestions of political irregularity were leveled. Certainly every Member of this body is obligated to conform to the requirements of his conscience, and not to the judgment either of the appointing authority, or other Members of the Senate, or the country.

The aspect of this matter which interested me prior to the discussion on the floor was the somewhat general character of the opposition. Prior to the vote of the committee it was not a matter which seemed to invite discussion either by any of the Members of the Senate or of the committee. When the vote was taken, and it was 5 to 4 against confirmation, I communicated with one of the members of the committee and asked him what the situation was, because certainly I wanted to be informed if any real reasons existed for questioning Mr. Pike's appointment. The best I could make out prior to the discussion today was a seeming case of incompatibility. I have no intention of questioning in any way the intelligence or integrity of the members of the committee. They have been long associated with this situation. Some of them have been associated with it for 3½ years. They have been laboring with this matter in and out of the Senate. Certainly their opinion is entitled to most respectful consideration.

Since the adverse vote the matter has been currently discussed among the Members of the Senate, very naturally, as well as somewhat less responsibly in certain sections of the press. The most I was able to secure prior to the discussion here today was just a general feeling that Mr. Pike did not fit into the picture. Whether or not he is the one to serve as chairman seems to be, from what has been stated by the Senator from Connecticut, no longer a matter with which we are here concerned. But whether or not he could serve usefully as a member of the Commission, in the public interest, is a matter which I think has some aspects which have not thus far been discussed.

The only two matters mentioned here today, aside from the general charge that Mr. Pike is not the most desirable person who could be found, was, first, that he did favor the $10,000,000 natural gas line to Oak Ridge. That was a matter, apparently, about which there was an honest difference of opinion. I think many members of the Commission were at variance with him. In the light of later developments, it would appear that perhaps the decision as to making available natural gas in so vital a development as this, in view of the difficulties which have occurred in the production of coal, which was the other fuel available, was not entirely unwise.

The Smith incident has not been discussed before today. The Senator from Iowa stated that he had not contemplated its discussion, that he was not going into the details of that incident, but that since it had been mentioned in the press, he felt it appropriate to do so. The fact that it was not to be a subject for our consideration indicates that, at any rate, it was not considered a matter which would be conclusive in the deliberations of the Senate.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to say to the Senator that that matter was considered, and was classified as "secret," involving international relations. I may say to the Senator that there are a number of other matters which come under the classification of secrecy in varying degrees, from top secrets through other high classifications, with which the joint committee has been familiar. Those matters all inhere in the judgment which at least I, as one who opposed Mr. Pike, necessarily must take into consideration, but which in the public interest probably should not be disclosed at this time because of their secret nature. The situation is difficult, but I felt that so long as Mr. Pike had opened up this subject, and given a version of it, I could discuss it, without disclosing any secrets of bomb production, or the physical facts surrounding it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, taking the Smith matter on its face, as it has been presented here today, there apparently was an honest difference of opinion as to whether Mr. Pike proceeded immediately, when the matter was brought to his attention, to check any further action along that line, or whether its termination followed the activity of the then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Iowa, and others concerned. It is the only aspect of this situation in which I heard directly from Mr. Pike before this matter came up. It was my understanding from him that, while he was not fully in agreement with Mr. Strauss in his presentation, he did proceed very promptly. I am sure that the Senator from Iowa would not wish that the unsupported anonymous statement of an employee should be taken to discredit Mr. Pike in the consideration of the nomination, and I appreciate the care with which the Senator from Iowa stated his position.

Mr. President, it is very difficult for the Members of the Senate, outside of those on the committee, to pass upon a subject like the one now being considered, because there is so much involved that is of a classified character.

I have not been familiar with Mr. Pike's career for as long a time as has the junior Senator from Illinois. I left Bowdoin College the year Mr. Pike entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Maine has expired.

Mr. BREWSTER. May I have three more minutes?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield three more minutes to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. The year Mr. Pike entered I left the college. I have been associated with him as an overseer of the college for many years. In the State of Maine he is widely known and well regarded, and there has been a very high appreciation of the amount of time he has dedicated to public service. We should be very reluctant to see a failure to confirm one of his character and standing unless there were more adequate grounds than the somewhat general charges which have been associated with this matter.

During the war, when Mr. Pike was dealing with the Petroleum Administration, he took a viewpoint very much in favor of holding down the price of oil in conflict with Mr. Ickes, who was then acting as Petroleum Administrator. He was criticized very severely at that time, not because he had favored any of the oil interests with which he had been associated but because he was not ready to allow an increase in the price of petroleum at that time. There again a matter of judgment was involved, and he took the view which seemed to him the correct one.

I felt that at the bottom of this whole controversy was that Mr. Pike is what we call up in Maine a rather "ornery cuss," a fellow who speaks his mind rather plainly, as perhaps many people in Maine and New England do, and sometimes somewhat more generously than is entirely called for. I think Mr. Pike has agreed with me in that analysis—that some of the things which he has said in the past, both in public and in private, could have been left unsaid without detraction from the quality of his public service. That, however, I am sure, was not a conclusive factor in the consideration of the members of the committee, whose judgment I am not prepared to challenge, on the basis of our necessary ignorance, but I do hope that the Members of the Senate will make as large allowance as they can.

I should like to stress one point. Mr. Pike is the only member of the Commission who has been on the Commission from its inception. There is a long record of very intricate administration, and, in my judgment, it would be wise policy that Mr. Pike should remain a member of the Commission and give to the other members the benefit of the continuity of his service and his very large background and the quality of the service and the ability which he has demonstrated both in private and in public life.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

The Senator from Maine has spoken very eloquently about his constituent. He has referred to the fact that sometimes Mr. Pike has talked a little too bluntly. I myself had some criticism to make of him on that basis, but I daresay that I myself could well be excused for speaking bluntly at certain times in my life. That is one of the privileges of being a human being. One who always weighs every word does not amount to much, although, of course, that does not mean that one has a general license to indulge in reckless talk. But I do not think Mr. Pike has engaged in that kind of conduct.

One of the things done by Mr. Pike, which did not particularly please me, was when, during the investigation last summer, he betook himself to Bowdoin College and there made a speech in which he had some things to say about the joint committee. I taxed him with what he had said. I asked him, "What did you mean when you said that there was some political influence creeping into the consideration of the joint committee?" He wrote me a letter under date of July 5, 1950, which I read into the RECORD, as follows:

> DEAR SENATOR McMAHON: You spoke the other day of a so-called "attack" on the joint committee made by me last summer. The reference is, I assume, to the talk I made at Bowdoin College called Domestic Control of Atomic Energy. These remarks included a discussion of the relations between Congress and the executive agencies which in the main, took the form of a description of the all too frequent history of the relations of independent commissions with the congressional branch. I am surprised to learn that some people have construed this portion of my speech as an attack upon the joint committee. Immediately following this general discussion, I made specific references to the joint committee, references which seemed clear to me at the time but which apparently were not so to other people. I said for example:
> "In some instances it has been obvious that political considerations, which have no place in the management of an industrial operation which in great measure characterizes large segments of the Atomic Energy Commission's work, have been injected into congressional consideration of some of our problems."
> What I had in mind in this paragraph was twofold: The then current investigation of the charges made by Senator HICKENLOOPER against the Commission and its Chairman and the attitude on the part of some members of the committee on the matter of natural gas at Oak Ridge. My views on both these matters are well known and I think need no explanation here.
> It was no part of my purpose in making the talk to charge the joint committee with the exercise of political patronage. Rather, I was attempting to make clear the need for keeping the atomic energy enterprise free of such evils, a need which I know you appreciate fully and have consistently upheld.
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> SUMNER T. PIKE.

I think that is a very generous, a very genuine letter, and I think Mr. Pike has cleared up that misunderstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield me some time?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield some time to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield 10 minutes, Mr. President, to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I was tremendously impressed by the statement made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] with respect to the qualifications and the background of Sumner Pike. I do not know Mr. Pike. I would not know him if I met him in the corridors of the Capitol. I have never conversed with him, even over the telephone. But I am familiar with the work that Sumner Pike has done as a public servant in behalf of our Government.

All I can hear respecting Mr. Pike is that those who oppose him do so without having very good reasons for being against him. When the two Senators from Maine, the senior Senator [Mr. BREWSTER] and the junior Senator [Mrs. SMITH] come before the Senate of the United States with full endorsement and recommendation of one of their distinguished citizens of their State for this very highly important position it seems to me that should carry much weight with the Members of the United States Senate who may not be familiar with the background or the record of Mr. Pike.

The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] in the speech he made opposing Mr. Pike said that Mr. Pike admitted at one time in committee that he doubted if he had the qualifications necessary to carry on the work required by the responsible position of a member of the Atomic Energy Commission. The fact that Mr. Pike was honest enough and modest enough to make such a statement should not, in my opinion, justify Senators to hold that against him. I doubt if there is any man in America who, if he really confessed his true convictions upon such an important subject would say that he really had all the qualifications necessary to carry out the public service which must be rendered in connection with the many diverse and important problems involved in atomic energy. Instead of condemning Mr. Pike for the statement he made, Senators should, in my opinion, consider it highly commendable that one who seeks an office of this kind, especially because of its importance, because of all its ramifications, should frankly and candidly tell the committee that he did not know everything about this subject, and that, therefore, perhaps it might be a mistake to appoint him.

Mr. President, no one knows what atomic energy is all about. No one knows the ramifications connected with atomic energy. No member of that Commission, if he is honest with himself, can say where the development of atomic energy may lead. The kind of man we should have to fill the position of a member of the Atomic Energy Commission is a man who displays such modesty, such restraint as did Mr. Pike in the statement he made before the committee.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States has confirmed Sumner Pike on two different occasions.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I believe he was confirmed by the Senate only once.

Mr. LUCAS. He was also confirmed as a Member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I thought the Senator meant that Mr. Pike had twice been confirmed by the Senate as a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. LUCAS. No. He was confirmed by the Senate once to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission and once to the position he now holds.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The senior Senator from Colorado says Mr. Pike does not measure up to what is necessary in one who holds such an important position. I ask the Senator from Colorado what he thinks are necessary qualifications? The Senator's statement is a general one. It is a general assumption. No reasons were assigned by the able Senator from Colorado as to why he thinks Mr. Pike does not measure up, in qualifications, to being a good Commissioner in dealing with all the problems relating to atomic energy.

Mr. President, finally the senior Senator from Colorado said that he and the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] had interviewed Mr. Pike many times about uranium in Colorado. The two Senators have talked to Mr. Pike many many times about that subject. I am satisfied that one of the basic reasons why the two Senators are opposed to the nomination of Mr. Pike at this particular time is because Mr. Pike disagrees with them as to what should be done with respect to uranium ore in Colorado. The senior Senator from Colorado based his argument on that one fact that Mr. Pike has disagreed with the two Senators from Colorado with respect to the development and the production of uranium ore in their State. They have called upon Mr. Pike time after time and have endeavored to sell him on the idea of developing uranium ore in Colorado, but Sumner Pike has said "No, gentlemen, I want to conserve that uranium ore for future use by this country in a great emergency, and I am willing that this type of ore be brought into the United States from all parts of the world, if possible, so that when a time of great emergency arrives we can develop the ore from your section of the country."

Mr. Pike's stand with reference to that matter seems to me to present the only reason why the Senators from Colorado are now opposing his confirmation. The senior Senator from Colorado candidly tells us that he and the junior Senator from Colorado have made many trips to talk to Mr. Pike in an endeavor to convince him that he should go along with them. Mr. Pike has had the courage to stand up against the two Senators, and I am satisfied that is the basic reason for their opposition to him. If ore had been developed in Colorado the chances are that Mr. Pike would not have the kind of opposition he is having right now, Mr. President.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If war develops any place we will be mighty sorry we have not developed our domestic resources in uranium, and many other resources.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado agrees with the argument I am making. The very nature of the question the distinguished Senator asked indicates quite definitely to me that what is back of the opposition, so far as the junior Senator from Colorado is concerned, is Mr. Pike's stand with reference to uranium in Colorado. Obviously I am for the production of ore in this country. But after all, I wonder what the other Commissioners are thinking about the same question. No argument has been made in the Senate up to this time with respect to what the other Commissioners who have been appointed and confirmed are thinking about this very same question.

I yield further to the Senator from Colorado, if he desires to have me yield to him.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I did not quite understand the last remarks the Senator made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). The Senator from Illinois has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the Senator from Connecticut will yield two or three additional minutes to me.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am saying that so far as the argument up to now is concerned, no one has said how Commissioner Dean and Commissioner Smyth feel about the problem about which the two Senators from Colorado are concerned.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Commissioner Dean and the other Commissioner to which the Senator refers have not been on the Commission very long. Those basic policies were established before they arrived on the scene.

The matter the distinguished Senator from Illinois is talking about is the umbillical cord, which has disappeared, between Commissioner Dean and Commissioner Smyth and the old Commission.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the distinguished Senator from Colorado has discussed the pending question thus far.

Mr. MILLIKIN. No, I have not; but I wish to do so when I can obtain some time for that purpose.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Colorado is going to discuss the ore question; is he not?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LUCAS. That is what I was afraid of. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a remark, let me say, if I may paraphrase Winston Churchill, that I was not sent to the Senate to liquidate Colorado.

Mr. LUCAS. O Mr. President, the more we get into it——

Mr. MILLIKIN. The more we get into it, the more Senators will find that is true.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado to wait just a minute; I do not yield at this time.

Mr. President, the more we get into this question, the more we find why confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike is opposed by the Senators from Colorado. They say they do not want Colorado liquidated. Mr. President, no one wants Colorado liquidated. However, we have to repose confidence in someone with respect to what is to be done with the deposits of uranium ore existing in the United States. Simply because two Senators believe that their State is being neglected by the Atomic Energy Commission, in my opinion is a very poor reason for not confirming this nomination at this particular time. That is particularly true when the President of the United States wants this man to serve on the Commission, when no one says there is anything substantially against him, when no one questions his honesty or his patriotism or his business acumen or judgment, except with respect to this one matter in Colorado.

Mr. President, the Senate would be doing a very serious wrong to a good man and a decent man and a capable citizen of these United States if the Senate did not confirm the nomination of Mr. Sumner T. Pike. There is nothing in the record which has been shown up to this time which should keep the Senate from saying "Yes" on the question of whether the Senate will advise and consent to this nomination.

At this particular time in the history of the world, and in view of the condition in which our country now finds itself, both with respect to the Korean situation and with respect to the general world situation, I believe that to deny Sumner T. Pike the right to sit on this commission would not sit very well with our friends across the way, because atomic energy is definitely connected with our national defense.

Unless there are more reasons than I heard stated, I ask Senators on both sides of the aisle to give this question their utmost and their serious consideration, without regard to the political situation, but with regard to what is best for America and what is best for the world, not what is best for Colorado.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I have served on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy ever since its inception. In the 5 years I have been in the Senate of the United States, I have always given the benefit of the doubt to the appointments made by the President of the United States, because I believe the benefit of the doubt is entitled to go to a Presidential appointee. Over the period of time during which I have served in the Senate, there have been very few Presidential appointments whom I have not supported.

However, in this particular case, I believe it is important for the Senate and for the country to realize that this is an unusual situation. The Atomic Energy Commission probably has more power than that which is or has been possessed by any other commission which ever has been created by the Government and the people of the United States. The Atomic Energy Commission is dealing with a subject which means life or death for the American Republic, and perhaps to the entire free world. This Commission is dealing with a subject of the highest classification of security.

Because the Congress of the United States recognized the fact that such matters could not always be freely discussed on the floor of the Senate or on the floor of the House, the Congress created what is known as a joint committee, consisting of nine Members of the Senate—five from the majority party and four from the minority party—and a like number from the House of Representatives.

In addition to the obligations which the joint committee has on an over-all basis in the field of atomic energy legislation, the Senate members of the joint committee have an additional responsibility, one not possessed by the House members, namely, that of passing on the matter of confirmation of the nominations of Presidential appointees, because under the Constitution of the United States, of course, the Senate is the body which must confirm or deny confirmation to such appointees. So in this connection a double responsibility rests upon the Senate members of the joint committee.

Mr. President, this situation is different from that with which we would be faced were this a de novo appointment. If a man who was new to the field had been nominated for this position, in my judgment it would be entirely proper for hearings to be held and for testimony to be taken. However, in this particular case all the members of the joint committee have lived intimately with this picture since the Atomic Energy Commission itself was created, and day by day in a thousand different ways they have had opportunity to examine and to understand the abilities and the capabilities of the members of the Commission.

I can say without fear of contradiction that under the able chairmanship of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] and under the previous able chairmanship of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], I have never known partisan questions to arise in the joint committee. I have never known a group of persons who were more alive to their responsibilities and to the terrific burden they bear. I wish to say to the gentlemen of the Senate and to the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] that this joint committee possesses secrets which are enough to keep men awake at night, in regard to matters dealing with the very security of the Nation.

The decisions which the joint committee and the Atomic Energy Commission itself must make may determine the very future of the United States. So we do not lightly accept and do not lightly discharge the responsibilities resting upon us.

Under the circumstances presented here, Mr. President, I believe the committee itself would be derelict in its duty if, after an examination of all the facts at its disposal, it believed that a man who had been nominated for membership on the Commission——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has one-half minute remaining.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield 2 minutes additional to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield that much additional time to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 2 minutes additional.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I was saying that under the circumstances presented here, I believe the committee itself would be derelict in its duty if, after an examination of all the facts at its disposal, the committee did not make a determination as to whether or not the appointee measured up to the job he had to do.

The matter of the metallurgy of plutonium has already been discussed, including the violation of the Atomic Energy Act which many of us believe was inherent in the authorization of the transfer of that information to a foreign power.

Furthermore there probably is not a commission or agency of the Government of the United States in which security has a greater meaning than it has in the case of the Atomic Energy Commission. Yet for a period of more than 1 year since Admiral Hillenkoetter left that job, the position of Director of Security has not been filled, despite the fact that the joint committee itself has been greatly concerned over this problem.

In addition, the members of the joint committee—at least, those of us who voted to make an adverse recommendation on this nomination—believe that Mr. Sumner Pike has not shown sufficient diligence in regard to going ahead with the hydrogen weapon, which the very nature of the situation requires should be done in the interest of the security of the Nation. There are implications, I believe, that there has been an unnecessary dragging of feet in this regard. Of course, the Senate of the United States is fully and freely able, and it is part of its responsibility——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me an additional half minute?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Senators are entirely able and, under the Constitution, they themselves have the obligation of passing on these nominations. We have given our best judgment. If, in the judgment of Senators, they desire to confirm the nomination of Mr. Pike, of course that is their right and their responsibility.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Is a motion to recommit in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to recommit is not in order, for the reason that the Senate, by unanimous consent, has agreed to vote at 4 o'clock.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the junior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, Sumner Pike is one of Maine's most respected citizens.

No one questions his loyalty or integrity. Certainly he has more experience than practically anyone available for the job since he is the last of the original Atomic Energy Commissioners. Certainly he is needed for the continuity of knowledge and experience that is necessary to the Atomic Energy Commission.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, editorials of three of Maine's outstanding newspapers which reflect the thinking of Maine people on this matter.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lewiston (Maine) Daily Sun of June 30, 1950]

SUMNER PIKE TURNED DOWN

We deplore the refusal of the Joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee to approve the renomination of Sumner Pike as Acting Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission for another 4-year term for two reasons.

In the first place, it is the consensus at Washington that Pike, a former Maine man and one-time member of the Securities Exchange Commission, has done well as Acting Chairman following the resignation of David Lilienthal. Only yesterday, in appealing to the joint committee for Pike's renomination, Commissioner Smyth declared that the AEC has functioned with increasing effectiveness, particularly during the last few months, under Pike. He advanced the opinion, moreover, that under Pike's direction, great steps have been taken toward development of the hydrogen bomb.

In the second place, we don't like the intense secrecy that has surrounded the hostility to Pike's renomination. That it exists is apparent—even the Associated Press reports that the "58-year-old Republican from Maine has developed powerful opposition on Capitol Hill." And it is more puzzling that in the decisive 5-4 vote rejecting Pike yesterday, four Democrats voted for the Commissioner, while four Members of his own party and Democratic Senator JOHNSON of Colorado voted in the negative.

It is true that the AEC, notably under Chairman Lilienthal, has often been under fire. It may be that Pike has inherited the hostility expressed toward his predecessor. It may be that the Commission, under his guidance, has been developing policies many Members of Congress think are wrong, or that Pike himself is not believed to be big enough to handle this vital post.

But whatever the reasons, let's get them out in the open and give the American people an inkling of what is supposed to be wrong. Pike's rejection, with his term expiring today, means there are two vacancies on the five-man AEC, and this dispute compels haste on the part of President Truman to fill them both at once, so that the Commission can function with a full complement. The Commission is bound to suffer, moreover, from the loss of Pike's long experience in atomic policy.

[From the Portland (Maine) Press Herald of July 5, 1950]

DISPUTE OVER PIKE

The name of Sumner Pike will be in the news again today as the Senate takes up his presidential nomination for a 4-year term on the Atomic Energy Commission. We would like to see a reversal of the tide that has set in against his confirmation.

The Press Herald often has commented to the effect that Mr. Pike's work in Washington has brought credit to Maine. True enough, but the question of his renomination to AEC is considerably more than a matter of home-State pride. The problem concerns the necessity of finding men as fully qualified as possible to fill the membership of one of the Nation's most important organizations.

Many newspapers throughout the Nation have commented on this basis on Pike's renomination. The Cleveland Press ran an editorial recently, titled, "No Reason To Delay Approval of This Good Public Servant."

The piece said, "Sumner Pike of Maine has served ably as a member of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) since it was established. He is now its Acting Chairman.

"On two previous occasions the Senate has confirmed Pike, and he deserves prompt confirmation for the new 4-year term to which President Truman has named him."

Speaking of the Senate opposition which has arisen, the Press goes on to say, "Three other AEC members, renominated at the same time as Pike, have been confirmed. All of them have had briefer experience than his in dealing with atomic problems.

"Pike is a Republican, but there is no evidence on public record that he has ever permitted political or other considerations to interfere in any way with performance of his duties. And a Democratic President has given repeated evidence of the great confidence in him."

Then the Press asks for full and clear explanation of "why confirmation of this good public servant is being obstructed."

Immediately after five of the nine Senate members of the joint congressional committee turned thumbs down on Pike, the Boston Herald, in an editorial titled "Sentence by Silence," wrote:

"If the members of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy don't have the decency to reconsider their mysterious blackballing of Sumner T. Pike the least they could do would be to insist that those who voted against him tell the public why they did so. The committee voted 5 to 4 on Thursday against Senate confirmation of his reappointment for a 4-year term. But not a word of explanation was given.

"Mr. Pike is a Yankee who made good in the business world. Born in Lubec, Maine, and a graduate of Bowdoin College, he early went from Boston to Texas where he is reputed to have made a fortune, lost it, and made another. He first came to the attention of official Washington as a Republican member of the Temporary National Economics Committee.

"Since then he has held various Government positions. In the atomic-energy post he has been eager to learn and deeply concerned for the best interest of the country in guiding the vital work under the Commission's control. He has also been frank to criticize where he believed criticism could improve the situation. All of this the better done for the possession of a ready sense of humor.

"As far as we can see, the Atomic Energy Commission could stand more men like Sumner Pike, not less. The committee had better reconsider."

These expressions show how many newspapers without the "home-town angle" feel about Sumner Pike. We hope the United States Senate won't turn him down without better reasons than have been brought forth so far.

[From the Bangor (Maine) Evening Commercial of July 3, 1950]

AS WE SEE IT—REJECTION OF SUMNER PIKE JUSTIFIED CAUSE FOR ANGER IN MAINE

Many people in Maine are justifiably angered by the refusal of a majority of the Senate members of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee to recommend confirmation of Sumner Pike for another term as a member of the Atomic Energy Commission. The vote was 5 to 4 against confirmation.

There has been no official statement from the four Republicans and one Democrat who voted against Mr. Pike. But Washington reports indicate they are trying to penalize Mr. Pike for the attitude he took during last year's Senate investigation into alleged "incredible mismanagement" in the AEC.

That investigation, launched as a result of charges by Senator HICKENLOOPER (who has led the fight on Mr. Pike), turned out to be a boomerang. It pretty completely refuted the charges levelled against the AEC and its then Chairman, David Lilienthal.

In the end, the whole affair stood revealed as an attempt at headline hunting for political gain. It also brought out the fact that, although mistakes had naturally been made, the AEC's record was one of solid achievement and progress.

At that time Mr. Pike was outspoken—as he generally is—in his support of the Commission's record and that of Mr. Lilienthal. In so doing he earned the enmity of Senator HICKENLOOPER and others.

We supported Mr. Pike's stand at the time. Even if we had not agreed with him, we would have respected his courage and forthrightness in speaking his mind.

We think it is outrageous that his fine record as a member of the Commission and more recently as its acting Chairman should be ignored by members of the Senate committee in petty reprisal for his stand last year.

The work of the Commission is too important to sacrifice Mr. Pike's experience, ability, and knowledge at this juncture. The AEC is no place in which to play ward politics. Nor should an appointee be rejected because he may have stepped on some sensitive toes.

Henry P. Smyth, one of Pike's colleagues, said the Commission under his chairmanship had operated with increasing effectiveness despite the very great difficulties faced. Dr. Smyth strongly urged Pike's confirmation.

We hope the Senate committee members will reconsider their ill-advised action. Mr. Pike is too good a man to be lost to the Nation at this critical hour.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have known Sumner Pike personally and well for a number of years.

Mr. Pike has been a resident and a successful businessman in Texas. Since he gave up his business career 10 years ago to enter public service as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, I have had many opportunities to observe first-hand his very capable work in government.

One such opportunity came when I served for nearly 2 years as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. During that period, I came to respect Sumner Pike as a valuable balance wheel in the operations of the Atomic Energy Commission.

He was sure-footed in his decisions, judicious in his opinions. He worked for the Nation, not for himself. Sumner Pike was not a prima donna; he was not a zealot contriving to use his position to advance some cause; he certainly was not a useless nonentity.

Sumner Pike was wholly independent in his thought and in his action—he was uncompromising on principles, but not belligerent in practices.

During the time I had the privilege of working with the Atomic Energy Commission, I found Sumner Pike to be an unselfish, capable public servant of very great value to the American people.

His value is even greater today.

It would do the Senate no credit—and it would be a distinct disservice to the Nation—to deprive the Atomic Energy Commission of this man's ability, experience, and courage at this critical moment in history.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of my prepared remarks may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a statement.

There being no objection, the remainder of the remarks of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We cannot deny that this is a critical moment in our history—and in the history of civilization.

Plainly, the hour of history is late.

The moment of judgment—the moment when our way of life must prove itself—is now upon us.

For 5 years, we have realized that this moment of judgment was certain to come. For 5 years, we have realized that the judgment would be made on the basis of strength—cold, hard, obvious physical strength.

For 5 years, we have known what was coming and we have known how that challenge would have to be met.

Through these years, our conscience has been burdened with memories of the humiliation, the shame, the infamy of Bataan, of Corregidor, of Guam, of Wake. We knew those chapters in our history had been unnecessary. We knew those defeats could have been avoided—if we had not tried to buy peace too cheaply, if we had not squandered time.

That is the reason the American people—the mothers and fathers, the veterans, the young men of the Nation—find the news from Korea so disturbing, so difficult to believe.

Delay, defeat, retreat.

That is not what the American people meant to purchase with their tax dollars; the American people meant to buy strength—real, hard-hitting strength.

It is tragic that now on the scroll of "too little, too late," we must add the name Korea as the product of our complacence and overconfidence.

The people know that strength is costly. But they know that strength is not nearly so costly as weakness. Whatever the price of strength, the people are and have been prepared to pay it—prepared to pay it in advance.

Unfortunately, however, it has been popular among some groups during the past 5 years to advance the doctrine that peace could be bought cheaply.

Economy firsters told us that we could best thwart the plans of communism by spending our time and our imagination on cutting the fat from the muscle, rather than spending on preparedness.

Men who should have known better accepted the argument.

Today those few dollars we saved—if we saved any at all—are being lost in Korea. Once again, the cost of false economy is running high. Once again, aggression is thriving on our mistaken belief that preparedness is cheap.

Once again, the American people have been underestimated. They are interested in economy, yes; but they are more interested in seeing this Nation kept strong to insure that it may be kept free.

It is too late in the day now to engage in vindictive quarrels about the past. The people are weary of the quarreling here. The people are impatient with the constant emphasis upon hindsight; they want more foresight.

The people want their elected representatives and all who serve them in the Government to do all that is necessary to settle this situation in Korea—they want us to do it now.

The people know that time is short—that time is running out.

The people want us to make use of the time that remains.

This action is a misuse of time—a shameful and unnecessary waste of time.

At this moment when our way of life is in growing peril, we find ourselves divided against each other about the very program upon which preservation of our way of life may depend.

No program in our Federal Government is of greater importance to us now than the program of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Despite this, the Commission today—as on many other occasions—is busy defending itself rather than defending the Nation.

If we were to indulge in the same tactics with some other agency—such as the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the indignant wrath of the American people would be heaped upon all our heads.

How long would the American people tolerate the secret indictment, the silent disregard for any one member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff? Not long, I am sure.

The Atomic Energy Commission is fully as important to our security—to our strength—at this moment of decision as is the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Because the Atomic Energy Commission is not cloaked in a military uniform, some apparently expect that it can be more readily hampered and harassed.

I, for one, do not think we can longer afford such a misuse of our energies and our time.

We are running late.

The time has come for positive action, for decisive action, for constructive action.

The time has passed when we can indulge our whims indiscriminately.

Of the original members of the Atomic Energy Commission, only Sumner Pike remains. The others have departed; their experience—their rare, invaluable experience—has been lost to the cause of our preparedness.

If we should now turn our backs on Sumner Pike, we would break the last slim thread of continuity in our Atomic Energy Commission.

We would entrust the program to a collection of newcomers. The program would be in the hands of inexperienced personnel, not in the hands of experienced policy makers.

Furthermore, by driving away Sumner Pike we would also—and more significantly—drive away from the Commission the few men in private life who might be willing to make the personal sacrifice necessary for service on this most vital agency.

If a man such as Sumner Pike—a man with no ax to grind, a man with a record of success as a business executive—fails to merit the pleasure and approval of the Senate, who then can expect to serve unmolested in this urgently important position?

Mr. President, it is time for the Senate to raise its sights—to look at the world as it is. It is time to realize that time is running out.

As time runs out Sumner Pike's experience is not expendable. We need him; the Nation needs him; the whole free world needs him.

We have work to do—important work.

We have a battle to win. It must be won quickly or we cannot win.

Each day that the cause of freedom languishes in Korea the cause of totalitarianism acquires more appeal, more force, more momentum.

Let us put first things first. Let us get on with the job to be done. Let us tell the people the facts.

The people should know—the people want to know—that dark days await us. Our godless enemy cannot be contained and cannot be driven back with platitudes about ultimate victory.

Obviously we need men, and more men. We need equipment, and more equipment. We need sacrifice, and more sacrifice. These are realities; we must face them. Trite phrases about peace—about a situation that does not exist—will not win for us now.

We must use time and we must use our resources to the fullest. If we fail, delay, defeat, retreat will become a burden upon our conscience for years to come.

Let us cease sniping at our public servants. It is time to train our guns upon the enemy. Sumner Pike has served the public interest and served it well. The Senate can serve the public interest only by voting to confirm this fine man for another term as a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has 7 minutes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield 7 minutes to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN].

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois has referred to the fact that the principal domestic uranium supplies now come from the State of Colorado. I wish to say that the presence of those supplies in Colorado merely accentuates the importance of a far deeper problem. Mr. Pike has always identified himself with those members of the Commission who have been panting to put what I believe is an unsafe reliance on uranium supplies from a foreign country. One bomb would destroy the source of those supplies, and I venture to say that that is the first place on which a bomb will be landed. If that should happen, we would find ourselves in a very serious position because of a lack of what I consider to be the proper development of our local supplies in Colorado and elsewhere. I simply do not believe that Mr. Pike rises to the minimum level of qualification necessary for this job. There is no more important job in all the world. There is no more important commission in all the world. I have heard Mr. Pike in many, many meetings. I have heard and studied his reactions to many questions. I have read many things that he has written. For three years and a half I have had numerous opportunities to observe his work, his mental operations and his qualifications. I regretfully reach the conclusion that he does not reach that minimum level.

Mr. Pike has identified himself with those on the Commission—and I am not speaking of present members, but of those who have been on the Commission in the past—who condoned loose security practices. That commission has allowed thousands of persons temporary clearance to classified matters without a proper sifting of the kind required by the Atomic Energy Act to determine whether they were worthy of possessing classified information.

On that Commission Mr. Pike was identified with those who allowed loose practices in the selection of persons to the fellowship program which included a confessed Communist. Mr. Pike was identified with the policies which caused the Commission in several important areas to be completely ignorant of what was going on as to the expenditure of many millions of dollars.

The Commission necessarily had to do a great deal of decentralizing. But, after having done the decentralizing, essential follow-ups were not pursued in security and expenditure matters. This Colorado vanadium business, about which the senior Senator from Illinois twits me, brings to mind, and should bring very forcibly to the mind of each of us the fact that Mr. Pike has identified himself with those on that Commission who had been pushing to share all our knowledge with Great Britain. It was only through the determined opposition of the joint committee that that was not done. We took the position that, once the information was sent abroad, we would be helpless to control its security. The position that we took was completely vindicated by the discovery of Fuchs among the top scientists of Great Britain. I repeat, Fuchs received his original and also his postgraduate information because of loose security practices in this country.

No, I have no objection to Mr. Pike, personally; I do not find any lack of compatibility. He is an honest man. I regard him as a patriotic man. He seems to be qualified in many other fields. But I respectfully suggest that he is not qualified in this field. So far as the continuing need for his presence is concerned—because he is the only one who has been on the Commission 4 years—personally I should rather not have his policies influence the new members of the Commission. Those past 4 years showed his attitudes and actions on the things that I have been talking about—looseness of security practices, willingness to share with other countries what we have learned for the preservation of our liberty under circumstances which could not assure the loyal use of that to be shared—carelessness with the taxpayers' money; lack of sufficient knowledge of what was going on. I do not believe that Mr. Pike—and I say this with regret—measures up to the minimum requirements, the minimum qualifications that a man should possess in this job.

Mr. President, this is not a job where tolerance should have much play. This is not a job where we should be liberal. I believe my whole history in the Senate will show that I have been tolerant and liberal in matters of confirmation—perhaps too much so. But here is a place where we should not confirm anyone but the best. I am opposed to the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I stress the view that I would not care to speak on this nomination except that I am a member of the Committee on Atomic Energy and should know something about it. But the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], I understand, holds it against Mr. Pike because Mr. Pike himself said he doubted whether he was capable in all respects. I think that is a compliment to Mr. Pike. If he said said, "Why, yes; I know all about atomic energy," he would have suited the Senator from Colorado admirably. If that is the kind of man we are going to pick for membership on the Commission, I am against such a man instead of being against Mr. Pike. I have no ties with Mr. Pike, but I have observed him as a member of the Commission, and I have not seen anything about him that was not commendatory or was not worthy of approval. The Senator from Colorado says that he does not approve of many things Mr. Pike has done or has not done. In contrast to the Senator from Colorado, I set up the other three members of the Atomic Energy Commission. They are more intimately acquainted with Mr. Pike than is the Senator from Colorado. They know more about what he has done and what he has not done than does the Senator from Colorado. They know more about whether he is qualified than does the Senator from Colorado. They know more about whether he has been true to the Government with regard to security and safety matters than does the Senator from Colorado. They give all their time to association with Mr. Pike and with his work. The Senator from Colorado gives 1 day a week, possibly, when the committee meets.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The members of the Commission to whom the Senator is referring are new appointees and do not know as much about the business as the Senator implies.

Mr. CONNALLY. According to the Senator from Colorado, no one knows anything about the business except probably the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The remark of the Senator is completely unjustified.

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw it. I am glad the Senator from Colorado is getting into the modest class with Mr. Pike.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am willing to leave Pike's name on the peak out in Colorado, but I do not want it on the Commission.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is very clear that the Senator does not want it there. The other Pike is dead, and this one is not.

I did not mean any harm by what I said. If the feelings of the Senator from Colorado have become ruffled because a Senator from another State dares to vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Pike, instead of against it, I apologize.

Mr. MILLIKIN. There is no need for an apology. I would expect the Senator to vote in favor of Mr. Pike.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad the Senator realizes that I recognize merit when I meet it. In contrast to the position of the Senator from Colorado, however, the two Senators from Maine, the State where Pike lives, who, I daresay, know more about him than does the Senator from Colorado, will vote in favor of his confirmation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. They admit they know nothing about the affairs of the Commission or of the joint committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have already yielded, Mr. President.

I challenged those who opposed Mr. Pike to tell us what was wrong with him. I said, "There he sits. Face him with your charges. With what do you charge him?" I could not get a chirp out of them. They sat there without saying anything. Finally, when I pressed them, they did not specify any particular thing; they did not put their fingers on any particular thing. I said, "What is wrong? Tell him about it so we can know it." All they did was to look away off, out toward Korea.

Mr. President, I favor the confirmation of Mr. Pike. He has been a member of the Commission and knows more about the work than does anyone else. He ought to be continued as a member to help the new members who need instruction, according to the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] started off the debate by asserting that there was no question as to the patriotism of Mr. Pike. He referred to him as a patriotic American citizen. In the course of the debate certain charges have been made against Mr. Pike, including the isotope shipment abroad, the gas line into Oak Ridge, and the emergency clearances, which were thoroughly investigated over a year and a half ago, and a report was given to the American people on those subjects, so I do not intend again to refer to them.

I have been told that there is some feeling that the nomination of Mr. Pike should not be confirmed because the chairmanship has been vacant for some months, and he has not yet been named Chairman. I think the chances are very good that he will not be named Chairman. I merely state that as a matter of fact and to show that I do not anticipate his appointment as Chairman of the Commission.

The next thing to which I wish to refer very briefly is the reference made by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] to a supposed dragging of feet on the hydrogen-bomb program. I desire to read very quickly into the RECORD a letter which I received from the Secretary of Defense bearing upon that allegation. It reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, July 10, 1950.

Hon. BRIEN MCMAHON,
Chairman, Joint Atomic Energy Committee, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I understand that there has been some question raised concerning Mr. Pike's attitude on the H-bomb program.

As you know, the Department of Defense, in fulfillment of its responsibilities under the President's directive of January 31 to the Atomic Energy Commission, has worked closely with the Commission and has had intimate opportunity to observe the Commission's efforts in this field. Under Mr. Pike's leadership as acting chairman, the Commission has moved ahead with the program with vigor and with competence, to the complete satisfaction of the Department of Defense.

With kindest personal regards, believe me,
Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

Mr. President, some suggestion has been made as to the security situation. I should like to have Senators pay attention to the assertion which I am about to make. The very serious violations of security did not take place under Mr. Pike or under the Atomic Energy Commission. They took place under the Manhattan District. I challenge anyone to refute that statement, whether it be the Fuchs incident or any of the other matters.

I am reminded of a famous quotation written many years ago, by Tom Brown, who said:

I do not love thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this alone I know full well,
I do not love thee, Dr. Fell.

After 2 hours of debate, that is exactly the situation in which we find ourselves. Some Senators do not love Dr. Pike, but why, they cannot tell. I think his nomination should be confirmed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD a memorandum from Sumner T. Pike to the Commissioners and the general manager, and a memorandum from Lewis L. Strauss to the Commissioners and general manager, together with a letter from Mr. Strauss to myself, dated July 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 14, 1950.

Memorandum to Commissioners and General Manager.

Commissioner Strauss' memorandum of March 29, which reached me after 2 weeks, at 12:30 p. m. today, April 14, does not accord in certain respects with my memory. While I do not keep an office diary, this incident has remained painfully clear in my memory since the sequences have probably been more detrimental in our relationship with the Joint Congressional Committee than any other single incident during the life of the commission.

My memory is that the specific matter of "the basic metallurgy of plutonium," as proposed for discussion with the British, was first brought to my attention by Mr. Strauss on the morning of Thursday, August 12 between 10 and 10:30 a. m. While this does not check with his memorandum of March 20 it apparently agrees quite well with his earlier memory as recorded in his memorandum to Mr. Volpe on August 30, 1948, copy of which is attached. The last 10 lines of the second paragraph and the whole of the third paragraph in a memorandum written during the month in which the incident occurred agree in general with my present memory.

On that date only Mr. Strauss and I were in Washington, but since Dr. Bacher was available at Brookhaven, I phoned him to get his views. While my memory is not completely clear on this point, I believe Mr. Strauss was still in my office when I phoned Dr. Bacher who agreed with both of us that this subject should not be discussed by Dr. Smith while he was in England.

My memory is that Mr. Strauss suggested at the time that it might be well for Dr. Smith not to have any discussions with the British on any of the other points in the agenda. I did not agree with this and did not suggest it to Dr. Bacher.

The office record shows that I put in the call to Dr. Bacher at 10:48 that morning and got hold of him at 10:51. I asked Mr. Strauss to help me draft a cable to Dr. Smith, which he did. The cable was received by Western Union at 11:12 a. m. on the 12th and was sent by them at 11:14 a. m. A copy of this same cable was sent to the State Department for transmission to the American Embassy in London in case Dr. Smith might happen to be there. This cable was received by the State Department Traffic Section at 12:28 p. m., August 12.

I put in a phone call for Dr. Smith at 11:26 on that day and received word that he was touring Scotland and would not be available until around 2 o'clock, our time, the next day, August 13.

I talked to Dr. Smith at 2:12 p. m. on August 13, at which time he told me the conversations with the British had not commenced and that he would, of course, not include the subject of the basic metallurgy of plutonium in his conversations with them.

I called Dr. Bacher at Brookhaven that afternoon at 2:28 and reported the conversation with Mr. Smith.

My memory has been and is still clear that the question was not raised with me until the morning of August 12 at about the time apparently that Senator HICKENLOOPER and Senator VANDENBERG were conferring with Secretary Forrestal. When Mr. Carpenter called me up and told me about the conference in Mr. Forrestal's office, I told him that I had already sent the wires and was also attempting to reach Dr. Smith by telephone.

(Mr. Carpenter's memorandum prepared August 12 states: "D. F. Carpenter phoned Mr. Sumner Pike, Acting Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, at 3 p. m., August 12, advising of the objection to exchange of information with the British on basic metallurgy of plutonium. Mr. Pike stated that this had already come to his attention and that he had already sent two cables to Dr. Cyril Smith in England, instructing him to withhold exchange on these items. Mr. Pike was not certain that this exchange might not already have commenced.")

It is literally true, as Commissioner Strauss' memo states, that I did not actually communicate with Dr. Smith until after I had heard from the Office of the Secretary of Defense. It is not true, however, as would be inferred by a reading of the memorandum that I had not attempted to reach Dr. Smith before that time. Both wires had been sent and a telephone call had been placed for him, and the fact that I had not actually talked with him until the next day was due to his absence in Scotland, where he could not be reached by phone.

I do not completely agree with the last paragraph in the memorandum. My memory is that a discussion with Senators HICKENLOOPER and VANDENBERG must not only have taken place before the Commission "had taken steps to arrest the compromise of information" but even before I, as the Acting Chairman and the only other Commissioner here in Washington, had known about the argument or had any opportunity to do anything about it.

It may very well be that Commissioner Strauss had spoken with Mr. Fisk before that time, but I am very clear in my memory that he had not brought the matter up with me, and it is even clearer that he had not attempted to reach any other member of the Commission before taking the matter up with the Senators, in which I thought then, and still think, a very irregular manner.

SUMNER T. PIKE.

MARCH 29, 1950.

Memorandum to Commissioners and General Manager.

Before leaving the Commission, I would like to have the record corrected in respect to a memorandum from the General Manager to the Commission, dated July 18, 1949 (Info Memo 195).

Page 3 is a narrative account concerning a situation which, since it antedates the appointments of Messrs. Dean and Smyth by almost a year, should be accurately described as it will not be familiar to them.

The memorandum states: "A letter dated July 26, 1948, was dispatched by Dr. Fisk to Dr. Smith (Dr. Cyril Smith.) At that time it was understood by the staff that prior approval by the Commission of definitions of areas made unnecessary specific notification to the Commission of authorizations for individual visits for discussion of topics within these areas, it being understood that all activities under the program would be reported periodically to the Commission."

I am unable to find anything in the records of the Commission to justify this understanding by the staff. On the contrary, at the Commission meeting on January 7, 1948, it was agreed, "These nine areas are general areas in which it appears that cooperation would be mutually advantageous and consistent with the common defense and security of this country. As to specific topics, no commitment is made by approval of this document. Any recommendations for a specific interchange will remain subject to Commission approval."

The memorandum continues, "When Mr. Strauss learned the contents of Dr. Fisk's letter to Dr. Smith on or about August 11, he was of the opinion that item No. 6 'the basic metallurgy of plutonium,' was an excluded topic, brought it to the attention of Mr. Pike, who promptly conferred by telephone with Dr. Bacher, who believed it should not be discussed, and thereupon Mr. Pike promptly telephoned and cabled to Dr. Smith canceling this topic from among those which he was authorized to discuss. This word reached Dr. Smith in advance of his discussions in England and this topic was never discussed. On August 12, after Mr. Pike had undertaken to notify Dr. Smith to omit this topic, Mr. Strauss reported this matter to Senator HICKENLOOPER and Senator VANDENBERG."

The statement in this paragraph does not conform with the record. Admiral Gingrich brought Dr. Fisk's letter to my attention late in the day of Monday, August 9 (reference, diary entry). I called it to the attention of Mr. Pike on August 10 (reference, diary entry). Mr. Pike did not promptly confer with Dr. Bacher. He did call him 2 days later, August 12 (reference, record of a telephone conversation between Washington office and Patchogue, Long Island). He did not reach Dr. Smith by telephone until August 13 (reference, memorandum by Mr. Pike). I conferred with Senator HICKENLOOPER and Senator VANDENBERG on August 10 and 12 (reference, Senator HICKENLOOPER'S letter to Mr. Lilienthal dated August 18, 1948), and it was not until Senators HICKENLOOPER and VANDENBERG had called on Secretary Forrestal and Secretary Forrestal had sent for me and had communicated with Mr. Pike that Mr. Pike in turn communicated with Dr. Smith. In addition to trying to reach him on the telephone, Mr. Pike came to my office and asked me to draft a cable to Dr. Smith, which I did.

The statement in the General Manager's memorandum above referenced indicates that this subject was discussed by me with Senator HICKENLOOPER and Senator VANDENBERG after the Commission had taken steps to arrest the compromise of information. The fact is that I conferred with the chairman of the joint committee (Senator HICKENLOOPER) and Senator VANDENBERG, a member, and Secretary Forrestal because up to that time I had not been able to get the release of information halted.

LEWIS L. STRAUSS.

SUN VALLEY LODGE,
Sun Valley, Idaho, July 9, 1950.

The Honorable BRIEN MCMAHON,
Chairman, Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, the Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: A statement to the press by my former colleague, Mr. Sumner Pike, has been telephoned to me here in Sun Valley where I am on my first extended vacation in many years. I am at a loss to account for Mr. Pike's action. We had no unpleasantness during the three and a half years we served together. But I cannot permit misstatements in his interview, so far as they concern me, to go unanswered.

Mr. Pike refers to an event in August 1948, the circumstances of which he says that I created and distorted. I have never discussed the matter outside of official circles and the testimony before your committee last year will show that I even declined to testify on this matter except in closed session. The facts are well documented and the distortions can be assessed where they properly belong. These are the facts.

Early in August 1948, Rear Admiral John Gingrich, then Chief of Security for the Atomic Energy Commission, came to see me with a copy of a letter which had just come into his hands. This letter which the Commissioners had never seen or approved, Mr. Pike's statement to the contrary notwithstanding, directed the disclosure abroad of certain information which had hitherto been a closely guarded secret.

Mr. Pike and I were the only members of the Commission then in Washington. Mr. Lilienthal was on vacation, Mr. Waymack was in Iowa, and Dr. Bacher was at Brookhaven. I took the matter immediately, therefore, to Mr. Pike who had been named Acting Chairman.

Mr. Pike was as aware as I was that the proposed disclosure went far beyond the agreed terms of international exchange of atomic energy information. He knew as I did that it concerned a material whose primary use was for atomic bombs. However, he took no action at that time.

As each hour was critical because Dr. Smith, who had been requested to bear the information, was already abroad, I had to take steps alone and at once. I called on the chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, then Senator HICKENLOOPER, and I also informed you, as the ranking minority member, of the facts.

I then called on my friend and wartime chief, Secretary James Forrestal. Mr. Forrestal informed me that Senator HICKENLOOPER accompanied by Senator VANDENBERG had already been to see him on the subject and that he had called in Dr. Vannevar Bush. As a result of this meeting, the Commission was notified that the Department of Defense regarded the conveyance of this information as extremely serious and to be halted if humanly possible. It was only after this, and the records will bear me out, that the messages were sent to Dr. Smith.

I have no records here to supply dates but can refer you to the relevant document in Commission files, specifically a letter to the Chairman from the joint committee dated about mid-August 1948.

Mr. Pike's memory is at fault even in recent matters such as my memorandum to the new Commissioners. That memorandum does not state that Mr. Pike ordered the Smith mission, as he says it does. I have directed that a copy of that memorandum be sent to you. Mr. Pike has forgotten that he even came to my office to tell me about the call from the Department of Defense and to ask me to draft the cable to Dr. Smith which was to try to overtake him before the damage was done. The original cable is in my hands.

This incident, however, is but one in a series concerning security, and as I have said, I am at a loss to understand why Mr. Pike has dragged my name into the issue of his confirmation for appointment. I certainly wish him no ill, but I cannot permit the record to be distorted.

I would be obliged if you would communicate this letter to the members of your committee.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS L. STRAUSS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired. The time for all debate has expired.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE LEGISLATION—CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Illinois made a motion at the beginning of the session that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1728. I send to the desk now a motion for cloture, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will waive his right to state the motion, and ask the Secretary to state it.

The motion, with the signatures, was read, as follows:

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close the debate upon the motion of Mr. LUCAS that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1728) to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin:

SCOTT W. LUCAS, FRANCIS J. MYERS, HERBERT H. LEHMAN, CLINTON P. ANDERSON, BRIEN MCMAHON, WILLIAM BENTON, JAMES E. MURRAY, PAUL H. DOUGLAS, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, EDWARD L. LEAHY, ELBERT D. THOMAS, DENNIS CHAVEZ, HARLEY M. KILGORE, MATTHEW M. NEELY, WARREN G. MAGNUSON (by SCOTT W. LUCAS), GLEN H. TAYLOR (by SCOTT W. LUCAS), KENNETH S. WHERRY, CHARLES W. TOBEY (by KENNETH S. WHERRY), WILLIAM E. JENNER, HOMER E. CAPEHART, FORREST C. DONNELL, BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER, ROBERT A. TAFT, WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, HOMER FERGUSON, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, H. C. LODGE, JR., EDWARD J. THYE, H. ALEXANDER SMITH, JAMES P. KEM, EDWARD MARTIN, ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL, ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON, JOHN W. BRICKER, JOSEPH P. MCCARTHY, GEORGE D. AIKEN, HARRY DARBY, OWEN BREWSTER, ARTHUR V. WATKINS, IRVING M. IVES, MARGARET CHASE SMITH, HUGH BUTLER, RALPH E. FLANDERS.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I hope there will be no objection to my making a half-minute comment on the cloture motion which has just been filed.

The Senator from Oregon wishes to say that he regrets very much that a motion for cloture has been filed in the Senate of the United States in advance of any filibuster, because he considers it to be a misuse of the cloture rule. There is no Member of the Senate more in favor of a proper fair employment practice bill than is the junior Senator from Oregon, but he believes it to be unfortunate that a precedent is about to be established in the Senate—and so far as I can ascertain, it is a precedent—of proceeding with a cloture motion in advance of even the start of a filibuster. I think we should hear the opponents of the FEPC bill make their case in chief, and if and when a filibuster actually starts, then the junior Senator from Oregon will be perfectly willing to sign a cloture motion. But I desire to say to the Members of the Senate that I think they will rue the day they started this kind of procedure.

If our filibuster rule has gotten into such a position as this, we ought to give consideration to revision of the cloture rule itself. The junior Senator from Oregon will not take second place in the Senate as a supporter of civil-rights legislation, but never will he become a party to what he considers to be a misuse and abuse of the cloture procedure.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I wish to make merely a brief reply to the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon. Obviously, I cannot control, and I do not desire to control, any action on the part of my able friend from Oregon with respect to signing a cloture motion.

The merits of the bill are not before the Senate upon a motion to consider it. The merits of the bill have been debated at least a week heretofore on a motion to take up. So it seemed to the Senator from Illinois, and to other Senators on both sides of the aisles, when we discussed the question, that it would be absolutely useless and futile to have another debate for a week upon the motion to take up, when we already had that debate some time ago. To go through the same procedure would be rather ridiculous, it seemed to me, at a time when we were trying to expedite business as fast as possible.

Our main desire is to get the votes to take the bill up in order that we can then discuss it on its merits. If, on Wednesday, we can get the 64 votes necessary, there will be plenty of time for the Senator from Oregon and others to discuss the merits of the proposed legislation. There will be no question about that.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. IVES. The Senator from Illinois recalls, does he not, that at the time we dropped the question of taking up the particular bill now being discussed, the Senator from Illinois said that he was dropping it with the understanding that it would be revived later, and that there would be an attempt to have cloture on the question? He dropped it because in his opinion we had had sufficient debate on that particular subject. I do not believe the Senator from Oregon was here during that debate. At the request of some of us the Senator from Illinois did definitely specify that he was going to attempt to invoke cloture upon the motion again, and would try to have the bill considered.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from New York is absolutely correct. Furthermore, I should like to remind the Senate of the fact that under the parliamentary situation, within a short space of time, during which business had been transacted, we could have filed another cloture motion, probably on the following day, without having another word of debate upon the bill. The only thing we have done is to postpone action until this time. The Senator from Oregon knows, as does every other Senator, that we could have filed a motion for cloture upon a motion to take up the bill, probably within 24 hours after we filed the first cloture motion, so long as a certain amount of business had been transacted between the time of the filing of the first motion and the filing of the second cloture motion. I undertake to say we could have done that without one line of additional debate to that we have already had on motion to take up.

The Senator from Illinois does not believe he is out of order at all in following this procedure, and certainly those who signed the cloture motion—and I want to congratulate the Senators on both sides, the Republican and the Democratic side, for doing so—believed we were following a proper parliamentary procedure in so doing.

WAR ACCOUNTS FOR 78 PERCENT OF CURRENT APPROPRIATIONS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has filed the report of the Appropriations Committee on the single package appropriation bill. During the consideration of the report I was very much impressed by the extent to which war-connected expenditures dominate the report. I have prepared a table showing the total amount of war-connected expenditures, war-connected appropriations, war-connected contract authorizations in the bill as a whole, and specifically in the independent offices bill which was considered by a subcommittee of which I was a member. These figures show that of the total cash appropriations 77 percent of the thirty-two and one-half billion dollars appropriated go for war-connected expenditures; that in the independent offices bill 91 percent of the total cash is for war-connected expeditures.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table I have prepared may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

War accounts for 78 percent of current appropriations—war-connected expenditures (rough estimate)

THE OMNIBUS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, speaking of the appropriation bill, as all Members of the Senate know, on Saturday the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate reported the bill favorably to the Senate. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] a short while ago that he was going to make a motion to take up some other measure, I desire to say that tomorrow, on the convening of the Senate, I shall undertake to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill. As the Members of the Senate know, this year what heretofore were individual appropriation bills have, with the exception of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, been consolidated into one single bill. I anticipate it will be quite troublesome to pass the bill. In view of the international situation and of the national situation I think we ought to take up the bill at the earliest possible moment and pass it. I hope the Senate will agree with me tomorrow when I make the motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask unanimous consent that when we take up the appropriations bill each Senator be limited on each amendment to 10 minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I object to that request at this time. I should like to wait until the bill comes up in the regular order. Then we will work out a unanimous-consent agreement, I will say to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not mind if the distinguished majority leader asks for such an agreement later. If we have hour-long and 2-hour-long speeches on the appropriation bill, the Senate will be considering it well into August.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator from Virginia. I believe an agreement is being worked out along that line, I will say to the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is not present at the moment. It will be necessary to have another quorum call before we enter into that sort of agreement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I am quite familiar with the bill. I believe that any Senator who cannot express his reasons for favoring or objecting to some one item in the bill in 10 minutes does not understand the subject he is discussing.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield further?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I am sure we will be able to work out a unanimous-consent agreement along the lines the Senator has suggested.

THE RIGHTS AND PREROGATIVES OF SENATORS BELONGING TO THE MINORITY PARTY

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, on Friday, June 30, after the junior Senator from South Dakota had endeavored to move that Senate bill 2311 be made the pending business of the Senate, the distinguished majority leader undertook in a statement to the press, and again on July 5, to lecture the junior Senator from South Dakota concerning the fact that allegedly he had violated some of the precedents of the Senate in so moving.

I had planned to discuss these precedents last Thursday, but due to the fact that the distinguished majority leader had been called from the city, I wrote him a letter and asked that he be here today so we could settle this matter here this afternoon.

Mr. President, before moving to bring Senate bill 2311 before the Senate on Friday, June 30, the junior Senator from South Dakota had made a rather careful study, he thought, of the precedents of the Senate involved in such a matter. But after hearing the Senator from Illinois comment about it, after reading what he had to say about it in the press, I thought perhaps I had erroneously interpreted those past precedents of the Senate. However, after having resumed my study and reexamined the precedents, I find that the distinguished majority leader made an error, which, as a former pedagog, I found sometimes made in a classroom, and that was a failure quite carefully enough to examine the textbook before lecturing from it to the students.

Consequently this afternoon, without any rancor in my heart, and in all good humor, but with the clear determination that the record be kept straight and clear in the interest of minority Senators at any time they may sit in this body, I want to discuss rather thoroughly the precedents of the Senate as they apply to the situation which developed on Friday evening, June 30, and I expect to quote from the greatest of all textbooks, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have no desire, Mr. President, to magnify this matter beyond its true proportions. I have no prepared address on the subject. I have handed out no press release. I simply want to discuss the matter in the interest of free discussion on the floor of the Senate, and to do it in a straightforward, off the cuff, from the heart, manner.

In order that we may have the picture clearly before us, Mr. President, let me set the pattern of what happened on June 30. The junior Senator from South Dakota had endeavored since about 4:30 in the afternoon to secure the floor for the purpose of moving to consider Senate bill 2311. It was about 6:30 o'clock, however, before he succeeded in obtaining the floor, and when he did, he made the motion, and immediately a quorum call was asked for. At that time the majority leader returned from his office, where he had been working, and unanimous consent was requested to withdraw the order for the quorum call. The junior Senator from South Dakota acquiesced in that, because he had stated in his earlier remarks he had no intention of pressing for a vote at that particular time. But he did want to focus attention on the legislation.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, does the Senator desire to be interrupted; if so, will he yield at this time?

Mr. MUNDT. I shall be happy to do so at any time.

Mr. LUCAS. I simply wish to make a correction. The Senator said that the Senator from Illinois requested that the suggestion of the absence of a quorum be withdrawn.

Mr. MUNDT. I referred to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. LUCAS. He did not have to request unanimous consent to withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum. He did withdraw it after some 8 or 10 names of Senators were called, after the senior Senator from Illinois came to the floor.

Mr. MUNDT. He asked for consent, and no objection was made.

Mr. LUCAS. He may have asked for consent, but no consent was required, under the rule.

Mr. MUNDT. I am perfectly willing to accept the Senator's explanation of that point.

Then, Mr. President, on July 5, I was engaged in a short colloquy with the distinguished majority leader as to the propriety of making the motion and on the question of giving the Senate an opportunity to vote on Senate bill 2311.

I wish to state the entire record in connection with this matter, so as to have it determined.

The distinguished majority leader said—and I quote from his remarks, as they appear on page 9668 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 5:

> I was greatly surprised and, I may say, rather shocked, last Friday evening when only three Members were on the floor of the Senate that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] had the temerity to move to consider the bill at that time. That was not "cricket," Mr. President; it is not done in the United States Senate. At least, it has not been done since I have been a Member of the Senate.

Mr. President, I should like to repeat the last sentence of that statement, because I think it is very important:

> At least, it has not been done since I have been a Member of the Senate.

Then the distinguished majority leader continued as follows:

> I think we on this side of the aisle are capable of handling the situation, and we are going to handle it as we deem best.

A little later in the colloquy the majority leader said:

> Mr. President, I resent, and I shall always resent the fact that when there were only three or four Members on the floor of the Senate a Member on the other side of the aisle—

Meaning the Republican side—

> attempted to take advantage of the situation, as the Senator from South Dakota did last Friday night. Again I repeat that it was not fair, it was not right, and it was not in keeping with the integrity and dignity of the United States Senate for anyone to do that. I do not say a Member of the minority party cannot make a motion to consider a bill. It is the way in which the Senator did it that I resent. He waited until the very last minute of the day, when nearly every Member of the Senate had gone home, after I had told every Senator on this side of the aisle that no motions would be made to take up any measure and that no votes would be taken on any measure, and after the same thing had been said on the other side of the aisle by the minority leader. It was then that the Senator from South Dakota moved to take up one of the most controversial bills on the calendar, hoping to slip it by when nobody was around.

Of course, Mr. President, that statement ignores entirely the fact that when I moved to bring up the measure, I said I did not expect to obtain a vote on it that evening.

I quote further from the statement made by the majority leader on July 5, as appears on page 9670 of the RECORD:

Mr. LUCAS. I am not talking about the merits or demerits of the bill. I am discussing the parliamentary processes of the United States Senate. In the 16 years I have served in Congress I do not remember a single instance, certainly not during the 2 years during which the Republicans were in control, when a Member of the minority party sought to move out of order to have a bill considered. That is not done, Mr. President.

Mr. President, let me repeat that statement, because it demonstrates how frail are the memories of all of us because we are so busy with the multitude of things we have to do—so busy that I do not in any way allege that the majority leader was not stating what he believed to be a fact. However, it simply shows that he has forgotten things which have occurred in the Senate comparatively recently:

In the 16 years I have served in Congress I do not remember a single instance, certainly not during the 2 years during which the Republicans were in control, when a Member of the minority party sought to move out of order to have a bill considered. That is not done, Mr. President.

The the majority leader continued, as follows:

That is exactly what the Senator from South Dakota did the other night. That is what I am discussing. That is what I am complaining about. If we are to have orderly procedure from a parliamentary standpoint the majority must take control and keep control of measures which are brought up. That has been the policy throughout the history of the Republic.

The majority leader not only said that has been the policy for the past 2 years, but he said it—has been the policy throughout the history of the Republic.

Then he said:

I do not say that the minority do not have rights. I do not say that they should not present their case at a proper time or when the situation is serious enough that they do not have some rights with respect to bringing up a bill. However, as I have said many times, whenever the minority can move to bring up a bill at any time they want to bring it up, and succeed, we the majority lose control, handing it over to the minority party. That is not done. It cannot be done if orderly procedure is to continue.

Mr. President, those are all the quotations I have to make from that RECORD. But in order that the situation may be completely before us, I think I should quote the Associated Press dispatches emanating after my attempt on Friday evening, June 30, to have the bill called up.

The Associated Press dispatch says:

LUCAS described MUNDT's action as "an all-time low" in "Senate decency and courtesy."

I repeat, Mr. President, that my action was described, according to that dispatch, as "an all-time low."

After the Saturday session, the Associated Press quoted the majority leader as saying that—

The effort to have S. 2311 brought up was made purely for political purposes, and he warned "some people better stop playing politics while this Korean crisis is on."

Mr. President, I have no desire to comment in kind on the assorted Illinois invective which was launched against me because of my efforts on June 30 to bring this bill before the Senate. I recognize that in moments of heat and surprise, all of us are inclined to say things a little more sharply than we would in other circumstances. Certainly I shall not comment on the rather stern terms launched against me by Senator LUCAS through the Associated Press.

However, Mr. President, I wish to discuss the precedents, because I know that the majority leader, busy as he is, overlooked, when he made those statements, some precedents which have occurred here on the floor of the Senate—and that rather recently.

The most recent one was about 2 years ago—on June 15, 1948—when, as shown on page 8242 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 7, we find that a discussion occurred, precipitated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], about the oleomargarine bill, which apparently in the Eighty-first Congress, as in the Eightieth Congress, had come up for a considerable amount of attention.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. THYE. In line with what the able Senator from South Dakota has just said about the oleomargarine bill and the attempt to have it brought up and considered, let me say that many of us were compelled to sit here evening after evening, evening after evening, waiting, up until the time the Congress adjourned, so as to make certain that a motion to consider that bill did not come before the Senate.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator for the information, which I cannot read between the lines here in the RECORD.

However, I see in the RECORD that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] then said:

Mr. President, I desire to say a few words regarding the bill—

Referring to the oleomargarine bill.

Then he said:

I think that the policy committee, in refusing to place the bill on the agenda, must assume full responsibility for killing the bill, if it is killed at this session.

Certainly, Mr. President, I concur completely in that sentiment, insofar as Senate bill 2311 is concerned—a bill proposing that we do something about communism here at home. Certainly I concur completely in, and echo, those remarks by the Senator from Arkansas; and I say that the full responsibility for killing Senate bill 2311, if it is killed at this session, falls squarely on the shoulders of the majority policy committee.

A little later in the colloquy regarding the oleomargarine bill, the President pro tempore said:

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of House bill 2245—

As is shown in the center column of page 8243 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 7, the Senator from Arkansas previously had said:

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1485, House bill 2245, to repeal the tax on oleomargarine.

That was one of the precedents I had examined, Mr. President, before I made my motion the other Friday evening, because I have high respect for the statesmanship and loyalty and good decorum of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. I had noticed that he had made that motion, and I had studied how he had made it, and I decided that if he had made a motion, as a minority Member in the Eightieth Congress, it would not be improper for me to make a motion in the Eighty-first Congress, when the majority control had switched from the Republicans to the Democrats and I am here as a minority Member of the Senate. After the Senator from Illinois, however, had stated he could never remember when that had happened in the history of the Republic, and certainly not in the past 2 years, I concluded, of course, it had happened in his absence, for, had it happened in his presence, certainly, being consistent as he is, he would have risen at his seat to acclaim against it.

And then I observed that those motions were not debatable, so he could not protest against that "all-time-low and indecent" action of the Senator from Arkansas. I said, "Then, of course, I will find him voting in the negative"—the only way he can vote in order to uphold the position which he presented so vitriolically in my presence the other afternoon, but I find that on the yea-and-nay vote on page 8244, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 7, Mr. President, to my sorrow, to my surprise, 57 Members voted favorably to upset the whole program of the minority, and 26 voted in the negative, to maintain the rights of the majority to run the Senate. And among those voting to upset the majority was the then distinguished Senator from Illinois; serving as a minority Member of the Senate, not as the majority leader. Well, of course, that surprised me. It set me to reading further into the textbook—the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—which, in his professional pontification to the junior Senator from South Dakota, the majority leader had failed to study sufficiently well before lecturing me on the subject the other afternoon and the other evening.

And I find that it was not very far back when the same thing had happened again. So that certainly there can be no criticism of the majority leader for having voted to upset the affairs of the majority, as he did on the Fulbright resolution, because he had a very good precedent to follow. I find that it had happened before in the history of the Republic. I find that it had happened, as a matter of fact, in those 2 years that he pointed out, when he said, "I am certain it never happened then," when the Republicans were in the majority. I find as a matter of fact that it happened just about a year preceding the time the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] brought the matter before the United States Senate. And I find that it happened on May 14, 1947, and those who are interested may study how it happened (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5265).

I suppose I shall never be surprised so much again, as a Senator on this floor, Mr. President, as I was when I discovered who the author of the precedent was in 1947, the precedent followed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] 1 year later, in 1948. I followed it, 2 years later, in 1950, because the author of the precedent and the man then trying to upset the majority program, then having the "temerity" to make a motion as a minority Senator, was the then distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], still serving as a minority Member of the United States Senate, I read on, with considerable interest; and I want to quote from his statements, because I share so completely his convictions at that time and have followed them so meticulously at this time, that, of course, I am surprised that I should be castigated and that I should be "accused of having reached an all-time low" simply because I had followed with a complete parallelism the activity of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. I have admired the Senator for a long time; I still admire him; and I do not believe it is correct that a man reaches an all-time low when he does in 1950 what the Senator from Illinois did in 1947 and 1948. I think one must find some other reason for criticism, rather than the fact that he has emulated the Senator from Illinois so carefully and so closely.

I now quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5266, statements made by the then distinguished senior Senator from Illinois—and he is speaking in defense of a motion he had made, Mr. President, after getting the majority leader, Senator White, to yield to him. Speaking in support of a motion which he made at that time to discharge one of the great committees of the United States Senate, headed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and to bring up forthwith, without consultation with the majority, without action by the Senate committee, without any attempt to maintain the decorum of the Senate and the order of the majority business, moved to discharge the committee and bring it up; and here are his words:

> I am today taking the privilege in executive session of filing a number of motions to discharge the Committee on Civil Service from the further consideration of certain of the nominations in the hope that, perhaps, by that method it may be possible to secure action one way or the other by the majority party upon what seems, in the minds of some Senators at least, to be one of the most important questions which has been pending before the Senate for a long time.

That was my feeling, Mr. President, exactly, precisely—stated more eloquently than can be stated by this country boy from South Dakota. That was my feeling on the evening of Friday, June 30. I thought S. 2311 was important; I felt it should be brought up. Then, after a while, Senator White induced the Senators then in charge of the time, who were not only the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], whom I admire, but another great Senator whom I admire equally well, the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]—the two great statesmen were then collaborating to upset the program of the then majority, the Republican Party of the Senate. Senator White, as the majority leader, finally managed to wedge in a question, and it will be found wedged in on page 5267, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4. Senator White said, somewhat plaintively, I suppose, in that pleasant manner for which he was so understandably famous—

> I had the floor awhile ago and was about ready to make a motion that the Senate recess as in legislative session. I did not know that I was to sit here and receive all this castigation from the other side.

So, certainly, if the Senator from South Dakota has been castigated, he has been castigated in mighty good company, because I think the then majority leader, Mr. White, was one of the really distinguished Members of the United States Senate of all times. Mr. White said:

> I have found satisfaction in the good deeds to which the Senator from Maryland has made reference. I rather expected that from him, and I congratulate him that in those instances, at least, he has been right and has done rightly.
> I do not want to enter into any agreements with respect to the procedure tomorrow. I am quite content to let the day take care of itself. A motion to recess, of course, would continue the discussion of the foundation bill. I had hoped, and I now hope, that that might be the course to be taken and that there might be some more appropriate time found for this political discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the very able junior Senator from South Dakota be kind enough to yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MUNDT. I am always happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was not my privilege to be in the Senate in 1947, but I wonder whether the junior Senator from South Dakota will inform us whether the Republican leadership agreed with the motion to discharge the committee, or whether it refused to accede to it? I shall appreciate that information very much.

Mr. MUNDT. If the Senator will but listen attentively, he will hear that in great abundance, right from the words of the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder whether my good friend from South Dakota cannot answer the question in a brief compass, instead of reading from the RECORD.

Mr. MUNDT. He could, but he might be guilty of the same failures of memory which were demonstrated on this floor on June 30. So I want to quote from the RECORD, because all of us understandably can forget things that have happened in the past.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am sure the good Senator from South Dakota would not forget on this question, and it would be a great aid if he would inform us what the attitude was of the Republican leadership in 1947 when the motion was made to discharge a committee. We shall then have the full record on the precedent before us.

Mr. MUNDT. If the Senator will listen attentively to the following pages——

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. TAFT. Unfortunately, I did not stay for all of this discussion. I only want to state my general experience in this matter. Any individual Senator has always been free in the United States Senate to move at any time to take up any bill. The leader of the majority, however, has always claimed that he had the right to determine what the calendar should be. He did not appeal to the minority; he always appealed to the majority and said, "This is a question of confidence in the party."

No matter who was in the majority, the leader always asked for the support of everyone on his side to maintain his control of the calendar—which was perfectly proper.

On the other hand, any individual Senator has always had the right to move the consideration of any measure and the right has been frequently exercised. I remember when the Senator from Oregon moved to take up the FEPC bill. If I recall correctly, not only did he succeed in doing so, contrary to the majority leadership in the Seventh-ninth Congress, but actually a vote was taken, and it was voted to take it up, contrary to the majority leadership.

There is no question whatever about the propriety of it. Whoever is in the majority the leader necessarily must claim the right to control the calendar, and he must and does appeal to Members on his own side to stand by him on matters of procedure. They nearly always do. But, so far as the propriety of any Senator making a motion to consider a bill is concerned, there has never been any question about it in all the time I have been a Member of the Senate. It is the individual right of any Senator to make such a motion at any time. There is nothing improper about it. If a Senator can obtain a vote on his motion, he has a right to do so.

When the Republicans were in control we, of course, opposed any such motion from the minority side. Of course, the majority leader opposed such a motion, but he did not claim it was improper or in any way low or in violation of the rules of the Senate. He claimed it was an attempt to take control of the procedure from the majority leader. As a rule, the majority has always stood by its leader, as it must if it wants to maintain majority control of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. I wonder if the precedents to which the Senator from South Dakota is now referring will show that a motion was ever made to consider a highly controversial bill at 7 o'clock in the evening when only a few Senators were on the floor. If the Senator can find a precedent of that nature, we shall have one which fits the facts.

Mr. MUNDT. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will watch carefully and listen carefully as I read, he will learn something about the time of day when it occurred. I think it will be especially interesting——

Mr. MYERS. The time of day is one thing, if there are 20 or 30 Senators on the floor. I can remember the controversy regarding the discharge of the committee from the further consideration of the confirmation of the nominations of certain postmasters. It is my recollection that there was quite a number of Senators present.

Mr. MUNDT. I am not this afternoon going to rely on recollection, because I discovered on June 30 how faulty recollection can be. I shall quote directly from the RECORD, and the Senator from Pennsylvania may be surprised to learn——

Mr. MYERS. I believe the majority leader was on the floor at the time the Senator from Illinois filed a motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. MUNDT. I do not want the Senator to get into the difficulty of having protested too much. If he will remain quiet for a moment, I shall read the RECORD, and I think he will be surprised at the development.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator disclose how many Senators were on the floor?

Mr. MUNDT. There will be some interesting things disclosed in harmony with what the Senator has been suggesting.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I should prefer to proceed, but I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator from South Dakota get the same impression from the distinguished Senator from Ohio that I did, namely, that the Republican leadership in 1947 declined to permit the committee to be discharged? That was the impression which I received from the remarks of the very able Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MUNDT. If the Senator will look at the RECORD, in 1948, he will see that the effort of the majority leader on the oleomargarine matter——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was speaking of the other matter.

Mr. MUNDT. It did not demonstrate that the majority always rallies around the leadership. They voted down the leadership and proceeded. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], with the full support of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, succeeded in upsetting the program of the majority at that time.

I say to my good friend from Illinois that in 1947 I was serving in the House of Representatives, but I shall quote from the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Our very able colleague implied that the majority leadership in both cases refused to have the calendar upset.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I did not deal with any particular case. I said the majority leadership objected to any change in the calendar program, but he did not charge anyone with treason, or anything of that kind.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator said majority leaders have always opposed such action, and, since this was an individual instance, apparently the Senator from Ohio, according to all principles of logic, implied that the majority leader objected in that instance.

Mr. MUNDT. I think they always do object, but I do not want to be accused of reaching an all-time low in Senate decency and courtesy, because I am sure the Senator from Illinois was not reaching an all-time low in what he did when he set the precedent for my own course of action.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Illinois has never moved, at 7 o'clock in the evening, that the Senate consider a bill after both the majority leader and the minority leader had told Members they could go home and there would be no action taken. I never at any time, under such circumstances, moved that the Senate consider a bill.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I shall proceed to read from the RECORD, because, otherwise, too many Senators will dig too many pitfalls for themselves, and I do not want to set any "booby traps" for anyone.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it makes no difference about what the Senator says with reference to digging pitfalls. The Senator from South Dakota dug his own pitfall the other evening when the majority leader had left the Senate and had told Senators that there would be no motion to take up any kind of a bill, so far as he knew. I understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] told Republican Members the same thing. The Senator from South Dakota said a moment ago that he had remained from 4:30 o'clock on for the purpose of trying to get his motion before the Senate. He did not advise any Senator on this side of the aisle that it was his intention to move the consideration of a bill. I do not know that he said anything to the minority leader with reference to it.

Mr. MUNDT. I was carefully following the precedent of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], neither one of whom warned any Senator that the matter would be taken up.

Mr. LUCAS. I am talking about the procedure of the Senator from South Dakota with respect to the majority leader and the minority leader.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I dispute the idea of the Senator from Illinois that a Senator is not free to make a motion at any time. The majority leader can remain, or can leave some Senator in charge in order to deal with whatever situation may arise. If there is no promise on the part of the Senator that he will not do a certain thing, there is no bad faith in making any motion he wants to make, morning, noon, or night, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio is technically correct, but I undertake to say that when it is understood by both the majority leader and the minority leader, after an all-day debate on some important bill, that there is going to be no vote and no motion to consider any other bill, and Senators are permitted to go home, it is not in accordance with the best practice and procedure of the Senate for some Senator to make a motion to consider a bill. I think if a Senator intends to do such a thing, he should serve notice on Members on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think it is very important to get the RECORD straight at this point. In line with the statement just made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], I want to call attention to a statement by the minority leader [Mr. WHERRY] found on page 9044 of the RECORD of June 22, 1950, at which time the minority leader called attention to a violation of this so-called gentlemen's agreement. At that time Mr. WHERRY pointed out how on the previous afternoon the majority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], gave notice that there would be no vote following the vote on the Russell amendment. With that understanding the minority leader and other Members of the Senate left the Chamber, and the next day we were surprised to find there had been another vote taken on a conference report. This was a direct violation of the assurance which had been given to the Members by the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this discussion, but my good faith has been impugned by the Senator from Delaware as a result of that situation.

What happened was that the Senator from South Carolina had the conference report taken up with the understanding that there would be no vote on it. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] was occupying the chair of the minority leader. The minority leader [Mr. WHERRY] had informed him what the agreement was. Senators on the Republican side immediately called for a yea-and-nay vote on the conference report, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] was responsible for the yeas and nays being taken. Certainly there was no question about my trying to break faith with anyone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The majority leader, in keeping with his promise to the Members of the Senate, could have recessed the Senate and voted the next day had he so desired.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, continuing, I shall quote from the statement made by the then majority leader, former Senator White. He concluded by saying:

I had hoped, and I now hope, that that might be the course to be taken and that there might be some more appropriate time found for this political discussion.

Continuing, former Senator White said:

Mr. WHITE. In the situation which confronts me I shall not consent to anything. If I have the opportunity to take the floor again in my own right I shall move that, as in legislative session, the Senate recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow. That will keep the bill which has recently been before the Senate in its position. I think it is vastly more important—and I say this with great respect to the Senators on the other side—that we proceed with the unfinished business as rapidly as possible and that the observations which are being submitted—I say this to the Senator from Illinois with great respect—be submitted at a more appropriate time.

Mr. President, we are moving into areas of discussion dealing with time. We find the then majority leader talking about time. We find that he was referring to the fact that it was not the appropriate time. We have not yet come to the question of whether it was 4:30, 5:30, or 6:30. The discussion so far deals however with the important question of time.

I quote further:

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate what the able Senator from Maine has said with reference to submitting observations at a more appropriate time, but I do not know of any more appropriate time than to submit them when we can finally meet in executive session.

Mr. WHITE. I make the suggestion that it would be a more appropriate time when some of the majority members of the committee of which complaint is made are on the floor.

Mr. President, someone said something about the majority leader not being on the floor when I made my motion. He was not on the floor. That is correct, Mr. President. He returned to the floor, and things were pretty well adjudicated from that point on. It is true that he was not on the floor at the time I made my motion. It is also true that the Senator from Illinois made his motion when the members of the committee involved in the bill were not on the floor. I put that in merely for the purpose of clarifying the record.

The Senator from Illinois then said:

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot control the majority on the floor.

That comment occurred while the Senator from Illinois was minority leader. He said:

I cannot control the majority on the floor.

I am not trying to say that he cannot control them now.

He continued:

It is too bad that there are not more Members present on the other side.

I mention that for the benefit of my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. He referred to how many Members were on the floor.

I quote further:

Mr. WHITE. I should think that if the Senator from Illinois knew he was going to make the talk which he is making he might well have notified someone on the majority side—

Ah, Mr. President, how sweetly history sometimes does repeat itself. We heard echoing through this hall only a few minutes ago some words about notifying the majority in advance. Apparently all we shall establish here today is the axiomatic truism that "it depends on whose ox is being gored." I quote again this highly interesting and, to this very junior Senator from South Dakota, tremendously informative comment from the distinguished majority leader of the United States Senate:

Mr. WHITE. I should think that if the Senator from Illinois knew he was going to make the talk which he is making he might well have notified someone on the majority side that it was in contemplation, and members of the Civil Service Committee having jurisdiction over these nominations might have been present to speak for themselves.

Mr. LUCAS. Let me say to my able friend that if I had been certain that I could have obtained the floor and would not be deprived of it by an adjournment or a recess——

I quote that now, Mr. President, as coming from the junior Senator from South Dakota. Had I been certain that I could have obtained the floor, and not have been deprived of it by some parliamentary move, of course I would have consulted the majority leader. However, I was quite certain on June 30, as the Senator from Illinois was certain in 1947, that to tip over one's hole card too soon is to let someone else pick up the chips in the game. Consequently, I followed as meticulously as I could the precise method and timing of the present majority leader of the United States Senate.

I continue reading the RECORD:

Mr. WHITE. Of course, I do not know how long it will be before I regain the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. It will be some time, I may say to the Senator from Maine, unless he enters into an agreement with the Senator from Maryland.

At least, it can always be said for the junior Senator from South Dakota, when he was conducting, to quote the Senator from Illinois, an all-time low in Senate decency and courtesy, that he did not try to blackmail anyone. It cannot be said that he tried to make any deals. He did not say to anyone, "All right, I will give you permission to withdraw the quorum call provided you tell me when you are going to bring up S. 2311 for a vote." At least, the junior Senator from South Dakota cannot be accused of following the majority leader quite to the excess of the Senator from Illinois trying to negotiate with the then majority leader at the point of a gun.

I continue to quote what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5268:

I wish to say to him—

Referring to former Senator White—that the unfinished business, the bill relating to the Scientific Foundation, is exceedingly important from the standpoint of the welfare of the economy of the United States, as well as of the world, but, on the other hand, if the Senator from Maine were to make such an argument in a small community such as the one to which I referred, to the postmastership of which one of these veterans had been nominated, he probably would be challenged from the beginning to the end.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has said that this is a political discussion.

That is what the Senator from Illinois called my effort. He said it was a "political discussion." With boys dying on the sands of Korea, while being stabbed in the back at home by unknown Communists whom the junior Senator from South Dakota would like to register or force into the open, the majority leader said it was a political discussion. He said on May 14, 1947:

I do not know who brought on the political discussion unless it was the majority, because of their action in holding up the confirmation of these nominations. They can call it politics if they want to, but we on this side of the aisle did not start it.

Mr. President, I skip along. I do not intend to quote all the Senators who engaged in the colloquy. I skip along and I find the following in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5270:

I want it distinctly understood that I did not bring this matter up today simply because the Senator from North Dakota happened to be out of the city. I did not have the slightest notion where he was when I began my remarks.

I say that for the benefit of my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. I want the Senator to understand that the minority leader at that time, the Senator from Illinois, brought up the motion to discharge the committee when the chairman of the committee was not only out of the Chamber, but was out of the city. At least, Mr. President, when I struck the position which the Senator from Illinois referred to as "an all-time low in Senate decency and courtesy," I did not select a time when the majority leader was out of the city. In fact, I respectfully deferred making my comments until today because the majority leader was out of the city on Thursday, when I had originally intended to say what I am saying now.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I merely pointed out that the majority leader was present at the time there took place the controversy to which the Senator is now referring. The majority leader was on the floor at the time, regardless of what members of the committee may have been on the floor. That is an important point in this discussion. As I read the RECORD, at least seven Members of the Senate took part in the controversy, and a great number of others were on the floor at the time. However, at least seven Members of the Senate participated in the discussion. When the Senator from South Dakota made his motion on Friday evening only three Senators were on the floor. I know that the Senator from South Dakota does not seem to care to rely on one's recollection, but I remember that there were a great many more than seven Senators on the floor at the time to which he now refers.

Mr. MUNDT. It certainly is not the purpose of the junior Senator from South Dakota to get into an argument with the Senator from Pennsylvania as to whether there were three Senators on the floor at one time, seven at another, or eight at another. It is not my purpose to say that they were discussing the same bill. The Senator might as well arise and say, "It was a different measure entirely, because it was Senate bill 2311 of one Congress, and the other was another measure." The same issue was involved, namely, "Do the minority Members of the United States Senate have the right, without being publicly abused, to make a motion to bring up a bill?" That is what I am interested in, and I think that before we conclude this evening all of us are going to decide that whoever is in the majority, any minority Senator still has a perfect right to present a motion at any time when it is in order from a parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. President, while I am referring to the majority leader and the minority leader, I may say that it has been stated that the majority leader had told the Members of the majority that there was going to be no business on June 30, and that he had also told the minority leader that, and that the minority leader was certain of that.

Mr. President, I have heard the Senate referred to as the world's most exclusive club, meaning 96 Members. It was at one time referred to as the world's most exclusive gentlemen's club. Now it is referred to as the world's most exclusive club, being composed of 1 lady and 95 gentlemen. That does not mean that it is the world's most exclusive club composed of two, the majority leader and the minority leader. After all, some of the rest of us have rights.

Neither the majority leader nor the minority leader rose and said there was nothing more to be done on the day in question. I believe that as a minority Member of the United States Senate I have a perfect right to make a motion, just as any other Member of this body does, at any time when there is no business being transacted by the Senate. The majority leader may talk to the minority leader and the minority leader may talk to the majority leader, leaving 94 Members of the Senate in the dark, but we do not want to have such an exclusive club that we can listen to what only 2 say.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator and I have been friends for many years, having served in the House of Representatives together. Perhaps my recollection is faulty; the Senator says that memory sometimes fails. However, I think I have a recollection of the Senator himself rising late in the evening and asking if there were going to be any votes that evening, and as acting majority leader I accommodated him by saying I did not think so, and that he could go back to his office, because I was certain there would be no votes.

Unless we can transact business in that way in the Senate, I do not think we can transact business at all. I believe we do have to have informal understandings and agreements that after a vote is held, let us say, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, Senators can go about their business, because we have so much to do that we cannot spend all our time on the Senate floor. I think we are justified in having confidence in each other, and when Senators on the other side of the aisle consult the majority leader and ask him whether there is to be a vote on a certain afternoon, they are entitled to have confidence in the reply.

I understand that any Senator can rise at any time and move to consider a bill. Of course every Senator has that right. But we can never transact business unless we transact by unanimous-consent agreements, unless we have confidence in each other, so that when we give our word that there will be no vote, we may know that will be followed through. That is not an agreement between two men. Both the majority leader and the minority leader are chosen by their respective sides. The only objection is as to the method pursued, not that a Senator does not have an absolute right to make a motion. I really think the matter could be handled in another way, which would not be unfair to other Senators.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is not the record clear that on June the thirtieth the Senator from South Dakota stated that he did not desire to force a vote at that time upon his motion, that he was merely making it because there was no business pending before the Senate?

Mr. MUNDT. That is precisely the fact, and I appreciate the Senator calling that to my attention. I was going to recall to the Senator from Pennsylvania my short comment at the time on June 30 that I made the motion to make Senate bill 2311 the pending business. I quite agree that we should have confidence in each other. But my intention was to fix attention on a bill which had been pigeonholed for a long time. I precisely stated I would not press the matter for a vote that day.

Mr. President, I desire to carry on now, because I am nearing the conclusion of this unpleasant task. But it really is not so unpleasant, because if we are to have any minority responsibility and any minority opportunity, the minority Members of the Senate cannot sit mute in a body like this when their motives are put in question, when as members of the minority, they do things they have a perfect right to do. Certainly when they follow in the illustrious footsteps of those who preceded them in the seats of the minority, and do things exactly in the manner and in the way and at the time the Senate majority leader did them when he was in the minority, it is more than strange that they should be castigated and chided.

Mr. President, I continue the quotation from the Senator from Illinois. He said:

> I want it distinctly understood that I did not bring this matter up today simply because the Senator from North Dakota happened to be out of the city. I did not have the slightest notion where he was when I began my remarks.
> This matter has been pending for months, weeks, and days, and this is one of the first opportunities we have had in an executive session really to bring it to the attention of the Senate, in view of the tremendous amount of work the Senate has been doing on other important matters.

Mr. President, this other occurrence was at almost exactly the same time of the year, in June. My bill had been pending for weeks and months, and this was my first opportunity to take action. I did exactly what the precedents taught me. So I was more than surprised, and a little disappointed. But I am a charitable young fellow from South Dakota, and I know that in times of heat we may all say things we do not exactly mean.

Senator White, of Maine, then said:

> It is an unfortunate fact—

I am sorry the Senator from Pennsylvania has departed from the Chamber. I wanted to state why I desired to cut off the earlier colloquy.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I had just stepped into the cloakroom. I cannot be in two places at the same time.

Mr. MUNDT. I understand that fully. I was about to say that I was merely trying to demonstrate how frail human beings are when they rely on memory. I now read what Senator White, of Maine, said in the debate referred to:

> But it is an unfortunate fact that the chairman of the committee gave notice yesterday that he would be absent for a week, and that today this assault comes on his committee and on the Senator as chairman of the committee. I feel that it is regrettable; I feel it is inexcusable.

That was the then majority leader, I suppose talking in the same excited hyperbole employed by the present majority leader when he was castigating the Senator from South Dakota, because I am sure the Senator from Illinois did not know or remember that the Senator from North Dakota had given notice that he was to be absent for a week.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] desires to leave for the night. Does the Senator from South Dakota think it is safe for him to go, and that there will be no motions of any kind made tonight?

Mr. MUNDT. It is safe so far as the junior Senator from South Dakota is concerned.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that no business be transacted while I am absent.

Mr. MUNDT. I object, if my remarks are considered business.

Mr. EASTLAND. No; I mean that there will be no votes.

Mr. MUNDT. Very well. I now desire to continue with the colloquy I have been reading, because I do not want the RECORD to indicate that I have felt that the Senator from Illinois was taking an unfair advantage of my colleague from North Dakota. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] then said:

I do not agree with the Senator. It may be regrettable that the Senator from North Dakota is not here, but it is not inexcusable, so far as I am concerned, and I resent the statement—

He was resenting things back in 1947 just as badly as he was resenting what I said on June 30. That makes me feel better. He said:

I resent the statement that it is inexcusable, because there is not anything so important from the standpoint of certain individuals, who are entitled to their rights in this country, as having this matter brought before the Senate of the United States—

And so forth. Now, Mr. President, I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5272. I give the page number so Senators may follow me. Senator White spoke up. He said:

Mr. WHITE. Yes, Mr. President, that may be so; but the fact remains that the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Illinois have found the occasion when the chairman of the committee was absent, when he had given notice that he was to be absent; and the Senators chose that time to bring it onto the floor of the Senate and to suggest certain procedure.

Mr. President, it is a small, trivial matter, who makes the motion to recess. I submit that I had the floor, that I was about to make the motion to recess, and I thought I was doing a courteous thing when I yielded to the Senator from Illinois. I now find myself in a position where the Senators on the other side propose to take charge and to make motions. I do not like it.

Majority leaders, I guess, have many things in common, even though belonging to different political parties. I do not blame them for not liking it when some minority Senator wants to make a motion, but I think they ought to repel such an attempt in accordance with parliamentary procedure, rather than by use of invective, and by assuming that such a thing had not happened before in the history of the Republic, although we can find that it has, by consulting the textbook, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] spoke up, because he was working with the Senator from Illinois on this project, and said:

Mr. TYDINGS. I may say to the Senator from Maine that I think if he will reflect a minute, he will concede that the position he takes is not altogether fair. Certainly, the Senator moved the various motions that were made, to handle and to expedite consideration of the Executive Calendar. We did not interrupt him. But then, if the Senator had kept the floor through all this, and had moved to adjourn, what he is saying in effect is that we, who wanted to transact business in executive session, should not have interfered with his making a motion to recess. That is untenable. Certainly we are Senators and we have got a right to rise and make any motions we see fit, before a recess is taken.

If that were true, as I am sure it was when enunciated by the Senator from Maryland in 1947, Mr. President, I submit it was equally true on the evening of June 30, 1950. There is nothing improper and nothing low and indecent about a man making a motion of that type. While I am not familiar with the English game of cricket, I know something about baseball, and it is certainly in keeping with the display of sportsmanship found in the great American game of baseball. I do not claim to be an authority on the English game of cricket.

I continue to quote, Mr. President, because Senator White now has something to say which is kind of interesting regarding the matter of time. Mr. White said:

Mr. President, I decline to yield at the moment. I do want to say that I do not like the course of conduct followed here at this late hour this afternoon.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from Arkansas without jeopardizing my rights to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be no vote on any issue this afternoon except a motion to recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOUGLAS in the chair). Is there objection? If not, it is assumed that unanimous consent has been given that there will be no vote on any measure before the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Except a motion to recess.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not object, I certainly trust that this will not become a precedent. If the unanimous-consent request is agreed to, there is likelihood that it would be a very bad precedent. I do not object, however, Mr. President.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I include in my unanimous-consent request also any motion, except a motion to recess.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it also should not be a precedent with respect to motions to consider measures, because, as stated by both the majority leader back in 1947 and by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota at the present time, it is proper for any Senator to make a motion at any time he can obtain the floor. He should obtain the floor if he rises first, whether he be a member of the majority or minority party. He may then make such motions as are within the rights of any member to make at the time he desires to make them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, has the request been acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MUNDT. I yielded for a unanimous-consent request, Mr. President.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. What disposition was made of the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has consulted the parliamentarian. The unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arkansas, as the Chair understood it, was that there should be no motion proposed and no vote taken on any question except a motion to recess.

Mr. WHERRY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Has the Chair announced whether or not the unanimous-consent request was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that, no objection having been made to the unanimous-consent request that no action be taken, the request was approved.

Then the Senator from Arkansas made the supplementary request that the request should also include that no motion should be made. Unanimous consent has not been granted to the second request.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the pending question now, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, that is the pending question.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will say I do not believe this is a precedent. I think a Senator has a perfect right to make a unanimous-consent request for anything he wants to ask, in the hope he can obtain it. I do not believe that such a request if granted would in any way either aid or hinder any motion that might be made at any time during the session of the Senate.

However, Mr. President, I should like to make an observation. I want the distinguished Senator from South Dakota clearly to understand, as I have already said on the floor, that I feel that the Senator from South Dakota was wholly within his rights in making the motion to consider the bill which he moved to consider, regardless of whether 3 Senators were present on the floor, or whether 7 Senators were present on the floor, or whether 77 Senators were present on the floor. What the Senator did should be pretty good notice to all of us that until the Senate has taken a recess or adjourned we should remain on the floor.

Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, later I should like to explain the part the minority leader had in the incident to which the distinguished Senator from South Dakota has referred.

The matter came very forcibly to my attention the other day during the observations made by the majority leader, and also when I read the record of what the Senator from South Dakota said on June 30. I want the Senator to know that there was no agreement made between the minority leader and the majority leader about the business of the day. At 3 o'clock the Senate voted on the District rent-control bill. I will say that when a vote is taken on Friday afternoon it has become a custom for Senators to ask the majority or the minority leader, "Will there be any other business transacted today?"

Of course the minority leader has to depend entirely upon the majority leader in order to know what program the Senate is supposed to have presented to it.

So it is very difficult for the minority leader to advise the minority Members of what might be taken up, unless he has been advised as to what the program will be.

I should like to say to the minority Members that, especially during the remainder of the session, when the Senate is in session the place for Senators to be is on the floor of the Senate, and they should be here to resist or to support motions or anything else which comes up for consideration.

I have tried to do that, both in a previous session as acting majority leader and in the present session as minority leader of the Senate. It is very difficult to do it. However, I think the record will show that the junior Senator from Nebraska is constantly on the floor of the Senate, doing his level best not only to cooperate with the majority in regard to the program of the Senate, but also in endeavoring to cooperate in letting the minority Members know what will come up for consideration. I have done my best.

Mr. President, let me say that I do not know that there is any duty resting exclusively on the minority leader to keep the minority Members informed in regard to what the program will be. I will say that whenever a unanimous-consent agreement is entered into, the minority leader will inform the minority Members of it and, furthermore, will do his utmost to see that the agreement is carried out.

With regard to the request which has been made, I wish to say that I shall not object to it. I think it is a perfectly proper request. I do not think it will establish a precedent in any way, shape, or form. I do not think any unanimous-consent agreement establishes a precedent. Whenever a Senator can obtain a unanimous-consent agreement, he is rather lucky, it seems to me. Furthermore, I think that each unanimous-consent agreement stands on its own feet.

So I think the unanimous-consent request is proper, and I hope it will be agreed to.

I wanted to explain the part I had to play in the transaction occurring on the particular day which has been mentioned. Certainly any Senator has a right to make such a motion as was made by the Senator from South Dakota, on any day during this session.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEM. Does the proposed unanimous-consent agreement apply to all unanimous-consent agreements which may be proposed during the remainder of today?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. KEM. In other words, there are to be no further unanimous-consent agreements today?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that no motion be made to have the Senate take up any business, other than a motion to take a recess.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I was called from the floor, and have just returned. Is a unanimous-consent agreement pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

A unanimous-consent agreement has already been entered into that during the remainder of the session today, no vote will be taken on any matter except a motion to take a recess.

Supplemental to that unanimous-consent agreement, unanimous-consent has been requested that during the remainder of today no motion will be made to have the Senate take up any business, other than a motion to take a recess.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, to such extent as I am able to do so under the existing parliamentary situation, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. MORSE subsequently said: Mr. President, a few minutes ago when there was a unanimous-consent request before the Senate, the junior Senator from Oregon objected. He did not desire to take the time to set forth the reasons for his objection at that time because he did not care to impose upon the time of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. But he would like to have permission to have the remarks he desires to make at this time inserted at the point where the objection was raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOUGLAS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Briefly, I wish to say that I am very much surprised to find that the unanimous-consent request had been made and that the Senate had allowed it to be agreed to without a quorum call. The junior Senator from Oregon is sure that the minority leader of the Senate was simply guilty of an oversight, because he is certain that the minority leader will recall, now that his recollection is refreshed by the junior Senator from Oregon, an incident during the Eightieth Congress when the then majority leader, Mr. White, of Maine, and the now minority leader, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], then whip of the Senate, allowed a unanimous-consent request to be agreed to while the junior Senator from Oregon was out of the Chamber, having been called to the cloak room to take a long-distance telephone call.

This afternoon the junior Senator from Oregon had been called to the reception room of the Senate to confer with an Oregon constituent on a very important matter. When he walked back on the floor of the Senate he discovered that another unanimous-consent request had been agreed to without a quorum call.

Mr. President, I was very much surprised at such action, because I thought that following the incident of the Eightieth Congress we had a pretty good gentlemen's understanding and working arrangement in the Senate that unanimous-consent agreements would not be entered into in the absence of a quorum call.

The debate during the Eightieth Congress showed that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] at that time, as well as the then majority leader, Mr. White, of Maine, pointed out that a Member of the Senate did not have a right to a quorum call for the consideration of a unanimous-consent agreement save and except under the rules of the Senate when it was proposed to fix a definite time for a vote on a bill or a resolution. The junior Senator from Oregon said at that time that he recognized that he was not entitled as a matter of right to a quorum call, but he was perfectly willing to leave it to the then majority leader and the Republican whip as to whether or not senatorial courtesy did not entitle a Member of the Senate who was within range of the bells of the Senate to have a quorum called when a unanimous-consent agreement was requested.

I submit again, as I did on that occasion—and as I recall there was general agreement with the junior Senator from Oregon at that time—that if a Member of the Senate is within the sound of the bells he is entitled to an opportunity at least to pass his judgment on whether or not a unanimous-consent agreement shall be entered into, irrespective of the subject matter of the unanimous-consent request. The junior Senator from Oregon thought that there was a general acceptance of his point of view in the Eightieth Congress, and the record would seem to indicate that there was an acceptance. He desires to say now, in complete fairness to the minority leader, that the minority leader, the Senator from Nebraska, has been very cooperative with the junior Senator from Oregon on all past occasions since the Eightieth Congress incident, in extending to the junior Senator from Oregon the courtesy of a quorum call. But I can well imagine that in the rush of affairs this afternoon he forgot about the understanding, and therefore I make no criticism of him, other than once again to point out for the record that it will always be the position of the junior Senator from Oregon, whenever he is on the floor of the Senate and a unanimous-consent request is made, to ask for a quorum.

I do not desire to place myself at the mercy of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], and ask him to protect my wishes on the floor of the Senate. I am going to continue to insist that the leadership of my party on this side of the aisle extend to me the assistance I want in this matter.

Therefore, Mr. President, I make this statement for the RECORD this afternoon, in the hope that in the future when a unanimous-consent agreement is requested, the minority leader, whoever he may be, will extend to me the courtesy of a quorum call.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I have only a few further remarks to make on this subject.

I had just completed quoting a statement by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] that—

Certainly we are Senators and we have a right to rise and make any motions we see fit, before a recess is taken.

Then the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], as shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 4, page 5273, said:

Mr. President, let me say in conclusion of the debate that this is the first time in my experience as a Member of Congress that I have filed a motion to discharge a committee from further consideration of legislative measures or nominations submitted by the Chief Executive.

Mr. President, I assume that he was accurate in his memory on that connection; I have no inducement to go back and check on that matter.

He then said:

I filed the motions with great reluctance.

Mr. President, let me say that I filed my motion with great reluctance. The parallel between the two courses of action is so close that it seems to me it is clear that that pathway can be followed in the Senate of the United States; but reluctantly the Senator from Illinois made his motion, and reluctantly I made mine—those motions being in regard to matters which each of us considered to be of vital importance.

Then the Senator from Illinois said:

I had hoped that some constructive action in accordance with fairness and justice would come from the Committee on Civil Service of the United States Senate, but as days dragged along and even extended into months, and no action was being taken to relieve these veterans and other worthy citizens of various communities in every State in America, I felt, as a United States Senator from Illinois, that it was my bounden duty to secure action by taking the procedure which is allowed a Senator under the rules of this body.

Mr. President, I could not have said it more appropriately for myself on June 30; I would change only the designation of the State. I repeat, with regard to Senate bill 2311, that I felt, as a United States Senator from South Dakota—not from Illinois—that it was my bounden duty to secure action by taking the procedure which is allowed a Senator under the rules of this body.

The Senator from Illinois said that in 1947; the junior Senator from South Dakota says it in 1950.

I quote further the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I cannot yield at the moment, I am sorry to say.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois said further, on that occasion:

Mr. President, I propose to follow through on this matter. The opposition can term my actions anything they please. I know whereof I speak on this question.

Mr. President, I am not sure that I can match in perseverance the bulldog tenacity of the Senator from Illinois; but I commend him for his statement, and in the remaining days of this session of the Senate I shall do my best to emulate his activities and to follow through on this matter.

I repeat, in the words of the Senator from Illinois, that the opposition can term my actions anything they please—including, if they must repeat the phrase, that they are "an all-time low in Senate decency and courtesy."

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois said one other thing, and I wish to quote it, and then I shall conclude the quotations:

I looked up the rules carefully—

As, in turn, did the junior Senator from South Dakota—and examined into the matter thoroughly—

As, I may say again, did the junior Senator from South Dakota—before I made the motions to discharge the committee with respect to these various nominations.

Then the Senator from Illinois proceeded to show why he continued in that endeavor. He said:

I do not know when we will have another executive session. The majority can control whether or not we shall have another one. It has been days since we have had one, and it might be weeks before we have another executive session. But this matter is now before the United States Senate, and we are going to talk about it tomorrow and the next day and the next day until these nominees, these veterans, are given their just deserts. That, Mr. President, is no threat. It is no idle promise. We are going to have a show-down on this matter. That is all I have to say.

Mr. President, let me say that I could not put it better in 1950 than the Senator from Illinois expressed it in 1947. I feel that way about Senate bill 2311. I feel that way about the continual pigeonholing of the only bill before the United States Senate which even purports to do anything about communism here at home.

I feel that way about a piece of proposed legislation which would require the Communists in America to register, to identify themselves, to identify their front organizations, to give us some protection against propaganda and sabotage and false peace petitions, at a time when American boys are dying in Korea in a fight against communism, and at a time when we are exercising the draft to take boys from the farms and the homes, to send them off into a bloody war against communism, which up to this late hour we, as Members of the Eighty-first Congress, have not done a single thing to curtail.

So, Mr. President, I say, in warm emulation of the example placed before me in 1947 by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, that I looked up the rules carefully and examined the matter thoroughly before I made the motion; and I, too, do not know when I shall have another opportunity; but if it should come along, I propose to exercise it; and, Mr. President, "that is no threat, it is no idle promise." We are going to have a show-down on this matter, if the junior Senator from South Dakota can bring it about, as the Senator from Illinois rightfully said he was going to have a show-down, if he could bring it about. I am not sure how successful he was; I think some of the nominations to which he referred were confirmed.

I hope to have some modicum of success; but I hope I am not accused of doing things that are irregular, if at some time during this session or at a future session, as a minority member of the United States Senate, I endeavor to do what I can to promote the enactment of legislation in which I am vitally interested.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say, so far as concerns the colloquy with the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington has been listening with real sympathy and a considerable amount of personal interest to the anguish which has overcome his distinguished friend from South Dakota, and partly for the reason that the Senator from Washington suffered from exactly the same cause in January 1950. The Senator from Washington has noticed that the Senator from South Dakota has been collecting a few precedents. If he is interested in furthering his case and his right as a United States Senator to move to consider a bill at any time, the Senator from Washington will be most pleased to offer to him for his collection several pertinent quotations of statements made to the Senate by the majority leader on the eighteenth and nineteenth days of January 1950. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. MUNDT. I shall be interested in hearing the precedents read into the RECORD, yes.

Mr. CAIN. I think they properly belong in the RECORD, because of the joint, collective, and individual desire on the part of Senators, to move, legitimately and without criticism, to consider a bill whenever a Senator individually considers it to be legitimate and proper to do so.

On January 18 the Senator from Washington moved to proceed to the consideration of House bill 3905, Calendar No. 644, a bill to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code. Shortly after I made the motion, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] said:

Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington will not press the motion. * * * The distinguished Senator from Georgia has assured the Senate he will call up this bill at the proper time. I have attempted to reassure the Senate, as majority leader, that we shall consider excise taxes, and, after all, what the Senator is now attempting to do is to take over the leadership of the Senate.

That comment was directed to the junior Senator from Washington, on the 18th day of January 1950, as it was at a later date directed in substance to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I am sure that the Senator from Illinois inadvertently forgot, then, as he did on the other occasion, and that it was not intentional.

Mr. CAIN. We shall take it for granted that it was not intentional, but we should like to be of service in straightening out the record, if possible. On page 561 of the RECORD of June 18, the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, went on to say:

I want to say, Mr. President, that so long as I am majority leader of the Senate, the policy committee representing the Democratic Party in the Senate will meet and lay down certain policies which we believe are for the best interests of the country. I do not believe that any Senator on the other side of the aisle is going to make a motion such as has been made by the distinguished Senator from Washington and meet with success. I am satisfied that when all the Democratic Members realize what is attempted to be done, they will stand unanimously back of the Senator from Illinois in what he is attempting to do.

I have told Senators on the other side of the aisle, as well as my Democratic friends, that the repeal of excise taxes will be given consideration in due course.

I should like to refer to one other quotation, if I may, of something which occurred on the following day, January 19, 1950—a statement made by the majority leader. I wish to offer it because it throws some light on what the determination of the majority leader appears to be. He is as much entitled to make determinations for himself as are the Senator from South Dakota, and the Senator from Washington, and other Senators. on page 616 of the RECORD of January 19, 1950, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] mentioned this in passing:

Mr. President, there is on this side of the aisle what is known as the Democratic Policy Committee, composed of some of the most distinguished Senators in this body. Once a week the policy committee meets, and at such times we make a careful examination of the bills on the calendar and arrange a schedule for their consideration in the Senate accordingly.

Parenthetically, the Senator from Washington has a very strong interest in the bill which the Senator from South Dakota has been seeking to have considered. I am constrained to think, as a result of reading these words, that serious consideration has been given to the bill in which the Senator from South Dakota has a very real and American interest, and that the policy committee on the other side of the aisle has decided that it shall not, for reasons of its own, be brought before this body, certainly at this time.

Mr. MUNDT. I may say I hope that is not the case. I cannot quite believe that is the case, from a reading of the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois on the subject up to now. As I recall, he stated he had not studied the bill carefully, that he had not had it considered at great length by the Democratic policy committee; and I am not sure that he alleged that he was speaking for the Democratic policy committee when he protested against action. So I hope the Senator from Washington is in error and that the Democratic policy committee will give the green light to a consideration on the floor of proposed legislation which is supported and endorsed not alone by a great many Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle, but by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars. the AMVETS, the Knights of Columbus, the American Conference of Small Businessmen, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and the D. A. R., as well as having been endorsed, in substance, by a resolution adopted by the National Education Association, meeting in St. Louis, Mo., only last week. It would be inconceivable to me that the Democratic policy committee would continue to maintain "operation road block" against the demands of a great group of patriotic Americans such as those mentioned. I do not believe that the majority leader has told us that the case is hopeless. He has protested primarily against what he dubbed "the temerity" and the moves engaged in by the junior Senator from South Dakota. It is in an effort to get the water leveled off in that matter that I am addressing the Senate on the precedents today.

Mr. CAIN. The only reason for calling attention to these statements is that the Senator from Washington desires to assist in the effort not only to keep the record straight but to further the issues presented by the Senator from South Dakota, as he moves in the direction of continuing to bring this particular bill to the attention of the Senate. Against what the Senator from South Dakota has just said, the Senator from Washington read a sentence which appears to be a contradiction of it, which the senior Senator from Illinois and other Senators will probably straighten out in due course.

Mr. MUNDT. I hope so. The American public is certainly entitled to a candid statement on the part of someone as to whether the Democratic policy committee or the majority leader, either one or both, are trying to maintain a position that the United States Senate cannot vote on this important measure at a time when we are actually at war, fighting communism abroad.

Mr. CAIN. Can the Senator from South Dakota tell me the date when the bill in question was reported to the Senate?

Mr. MUNDT. March 21.

Mr. CAIN. If that be so, how does the Senator reconcile the reporting of the bill with the following sentence, which I want to restate:

Once a week the policy committee meets, and at such times we make a careful examination of the bills on the calendar and arrange a schedule for their consideration in the Senate accordingly.

That sentence only says to me that serious consideration has been given to the bill in which the Senator from South Dakota and many other Senators are interested. The decision thus far has been not to bring it up for debate.

Mr. MUNDT. Certainly, I must confess upon listening to a rereading of the statement, it would indicate that the majority leader and the policy committee had carefully considered the bill. I had understood that was not the case. I have rested my hope, in large part, upon the statement made by the majority leader on the 5th of July when he stated he had not personally studied the bill carefully and it had not been considered at great length in the policy committee. The American public and these great patriotic organizations interested in it, the mothers and the fathers of the boys who are dying in Korea in their fight against communism, are at least entitled to have direct from the majority leader, or whoever speaks for the policy committee, a statement that, "we are or we are not going to give the Senate of the United States the right to vote upon S. 2311." I do not know whether the Senate will oppose it or approve it, but it certainly seems to me that the Senate is entitled to vote on such an important measure which was reported by a 12-to-1 vote of the great Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate.

Mr. CAIN. I trust the Senator will permit one further quotation from the majority leader as I find it to appear on page 616 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1950. I read:

Mr. President, the question of excise taxes is not involved in the motion of the Senator from Washington at all.

Parenthetically, Mr. President, as I have listened to the colloquy between the Senator from South Dakota and the leadership on the other side of the aisle, those words have a familiar ring as they have been directed by those in administrative authority to my friend from South Dakota. I read further:

The sole question before the Senate is simply whether the majority party, duly constituted and organized, shall be permitted to carry out the obligations and duties of the Senate of the United States in a way which the majority believes is best for the Senate and for the country.

Again, parenthetically, I can draw only one conclusion, and that is that the majority leader is saying that the majority party will determine in every instance what is good and proper for the United States of America; but the Senator from Washington wishes to dissociate himself from any such view. The conclusion of the quotation is as follows:

The question in this debate is not excise taxes; the question is whether a Senator on the opposite side of the aisle can take the leadership away from the majority party—and advise the Senate and the country that from now on, any time the Senator from Washington desires to make a motion for the consideration of some measure in which he is interested, the majority of the Senators must go along with him.

Mr. President, I think those quotations add substance and reality to the case which the Senator from South Dakota has offered to the Senate and to all the citizens of the United States of America. It seems to the junior Senator from Washington that if there is no disposition on the part of the majority to bring up a bill which is of such vital concern to many Americans and to the Senator from South Dakota, the responsibility for failing so to do must be assumed in its entirety by Senators on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the able Senator from Washington. Mr. President, I should like to bring this colloquy, if not to a close, at least to a point at which the Senator from Illinois, if he so desires, will have an opportunity to address himself to the subject in question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator from South Dakota aware of the fact that there are times, in perhaps what might be called the weaker moments of the Senator from Illinois, when he takes the position that it is the responsibility of minority Members of the Senate to bring up legislation? I have particular reference to a letter which I received from one his constituents dated June 30, 1950, which, by the way, is the same date on which the Senator from South Dakota made his motion, and I should like to read a portion of the letter into the RECORD:

> MY DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: Recently I wrote my Senator, SCOTT W. LUCAS, regarding my disapproval of the Postmaster General's recent curtailment of our postal service, all over the United States of America. I had a kind reply, in which he pointed out that recently the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service had tried to change this order, but that your objections had prevented this.

I might say that the writer refers to Senate bill 3500.

In his letter the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] says:

> This is in reply to your communication of recent date, with respect to the recent order of the Postmaster General curtailing mail service.

He goes on and points out in his letter that "Senator WILLIAMS, Republican, of Delaware, objected to the legislation, and these objections prevented the passage of the measures."

The letter goes on to say:

> You may rest assured that I shall continue to register the protests I am receiving.

And then he proceeds to assure the writer that he would do everything possible to get the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his objection and bring the bill before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. President, I have taken the position as one who opposes the measure that if the Senator from Illinois wished to give favorable consideration to the proposed legislation, he as majority leader would have made a motion to have the bill considered. I understand, indirectly—and the Senator can correct me if I am wrong—that he is opposed to the proposed legislation, although the letter indicates he is favorable to it. But I assure him that if he wishes to make a motion to bring this legislation upon the floor I will support him. If he wishes, I shall make the motion, and I trust he will support me. I say that as one who will vote against the bill, for the same reason that I think the Senator from Illinois will vote against it. The Senator from Delaware has hesitated to make such a motion, for fear the Senator from Illinois would take the same position as he did when the Senator from South Dakota made his motion, and accused me of trying to take the leadership away from him.

For the information of the constituents of the Senator from Illinois, I might call attention to the fact that this legislation has never been placed on the list of the Democratic policy committee as legislation which they even intended to consider. Nor has the Senator from Illinois ever approached the Senator from Delaware requesting that I withdraw my objections.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator from Delaware still object to the bill

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator still objects to the Postmaster General's order but he does not object to the bill being made the pending business. All I ask is an opportunity to express why I think the bill should not pass. That does not mean that the Senator from Illinois cannot make a motion at any time to have the bill considered and that motion will be supported by the Senator from Delaware, even though he may vote against the bill. If the Senator from Illinois wants me to make the motion, I will make it.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Delaware is the only Senator who objected to the consideration of the bill on the call of the calendar, so he must take responsibility for the failure of the bill to pass. I think I have a right to advise my constituents as to who it was who blocked action on a bill. If we decide to bring it up we shall do so, and if we do not decide to bring it up, we shall not do so. I was only quoting what the RECORD shows. When we call the calendar again I hope the Senator from Delaware will let the bill pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By that same token the Senator from Illinois who objected to the consideration of the Mundt-Ferguson bill could be described as the only Senator who opposes that piece of legislation.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator now admits that he is against the bill. Simply because I tell my constituents what the RECORD shows, the Senator should not be filing an objection against the Senator from Illinois, stating that there is something wrong with the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was merely referring to the last paragraph of the Senator's letter. I assure the Senator that I shall make a motion to bring the bill up at the appropriate time.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator from Delaware write my constituent and tell him that I am trying to convince the Senator on the floor of the Senate, but that he refuses to be convinced? What is the name of the constituent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has already written him twice.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to write him a third time, now that the Senator from Delaware has brought the matter up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall give the Senator the name of the constituent——

Mr. LUCAS. I want to put the Senator from Delaware in just as favorable a light with my constituents as I possibly can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The constituent's name is Mrs. L. P. Rogers, 340 Woodland Avenue, Winnetka, Ill. All that I ask is that you tell them the truth. If you have no intention of bringing this legislation before the Senate, then tell them so.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator for his kindness. I always appreciate his cooperation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I assure the Senator from Illinois that I will support the majority leader in a motion to take up this bill even though I shall vote against it, and will give my reasons at that time why I disapprove.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to congratulate the Senator from Delaware for his cooperative spirit. I do not know of any other Senator with whom I have served who is more cooperative than the Senator from Delaware. I am happy that he brought the matter up on the floor, hoping to embarrass the Senator from Illinois by reading a letter I wrote to a constituent of mine in which I merely quoted from the RECORD. I shall continue to try to convince my friend that he should withdraw his objection to the bill and go along with other Senators. However, I know that I cannot do that. He stands alone on the other side of the aisle. He stands by himself. I shall be glad to tell Mr. Rogers in Winnetka how cooperative the Senator from Delaware has been.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Illinois said that he would continue to try to convince the Senator from Delaware. However, up to this time he never mentioned the subject, nor made any effort to have the bill considered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, if I may, I should like to bring this discussion to a close, insofar as it involves the point under discussion. It had been my purpose to devote some time today to the legislation itself, which created such a turmoil. As a minority Member of the Senate I thought it was my duty and my obligation, inasmuch as I was injected into this situation by my action on June 30, to make a study of the precedents and to first make clear at one point in the RECORD, where oncoming junior Senators may have an opportunity to consult it, whether minority Members of the Senate are within their rights or are not within their rights when they endeavor to bring up matters as pending business at a time when the legislative situation is clear.

Along with the distinguished Senator from Illinois I served my apprenticeship in the House of Representatives. I did not serve at the same time that he served over there. I regret that it was not at the same time. However, he will agree with me that the House of Representatives also has its precedents.

I know and he knows that in the House of Representatives a minority Member has certain inalienable rights and functions. He knows and I know that in the House of Representatives an individual Member may appear before the Rules Committee and induce the Rules Committee, if he has the persuasive power, to schedule his bill for action by the House, so that a vote may be had on it. That is all I am asking for here in the Senate.

I do not have the persuasive powers, I know, to induce the majority leader to support S. 2311. I do not know that he will support the bill, and I am not convinced that he has made up his mind to oppose it. I believe that logic demands, however, that the matter be brought before the public, because it is a matter in which millions of Americans have expressed interest, so that we may vote on it. In the House it can be done. The party of which the majority leader is a very important Member revised the rules to make it even more liberal. So that if the Rules Committee fails to give a Member of the House a rule to bring up the bill, he can stand on the floor of the House and move to discharge the Rules Committee. Failing in that, an individual Member of the House can file a petition with the Speaker and try to induce, if he can, 217 other Members to go along with him. In that way 218 Members of the House can compel the leadership to schedule a measure for a vote.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seemed a little incredible to the junior Senator from South Dakota, having eventually worked his way over to the Senate, that in this great deliberative body, which is sometimes called the greatest deliberative body in the world, a minority Member should find himself handcuffed and strait-jacketed because either the majority policy committee or the majority leader, or both, have decided in their wisdom that despite all these great American patriotic organizations who are interested in this legislation they do not propose to have the Senate vote on it.

Therefore I decided to read the record and the precedents which the majority leader forgot to examine. I found the precedents that I thought I would find. Certainly I do not feel that the Senator from Illinois was acting beyond the rights enjoyed by him as a minority Member of the Senate when on three occasions within the last 3 years he demonstrated, once by a vote, once by a motion, and once by a speech, that he believed the Senator from South Dakota to be eternally within his rights in offering the resolution which he offered on June 30, that S. 2311 be made the pending business of the Senate.

I think it important, as minority Members, to keep in mind that one of the big difficulties in the world today, in this era of history, is that too few men have been pushing too many people around for all too long a time. We in South Dakota in homestead days soon found that if a person permitted an adversary to stake out a claim to his rights without defending those rights, those rights would soon be diminished and lost. Therefore, I felt impelled, when it occurred to me that my rights as a minority Senator were being jeopardized and that I was being criticized by the majority leader in the press and on the floor of being guilty of acts unworthy of a Senator, or not in conformity with the great English game of cricket, or not in keeping with common decency, or with the rules of fair activity, to place in the RECORD, in a friendly fashion, the joint testimony of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from South Dakota, in which over an expanse of many years we agree completely that minority Senators now have, as they have had at all times and shall have in the future, a perfect right to bring up a measure at any time which they consider to be of great importance.

Both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate the precedents and decisions of the Chair and the rules of both bodies are made to protect the minority because a majority can always work its way, if it is ruthless enough, as it sometimes is, or if it is determined enough, as it frequently is, and can say to the minority, to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Knights of Columbus, and the American Bar Association, among others, "In spite of your interest in this legislation in time of war, we know best. So we are not going to bring up a measure in which you are interested. We will not permit it to be debated or voted on, despite a vote of 12 to 1 on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary."

I know a majority party can do that. However, I also know that minority Members can try as best they can, with perfect propriety, within the rules of this body, to dissuade them from doing it, and to give the people the fair chance to which they are entitled, and to find out whether this body will take such action as will give them protection against communism on the home front while we are fighting a war against communism abroad.

If we should permit the precedent to be established that a minority Member of the Senate cannot suggest that a bill should be brought up for debate, it is just a short step to what the Senator from Washington complained about this afternoon, where it becomes the accepted precedent in the Senate that before a bill is brought up for debate the hour is fixed at which it is to be voted on. From that it is only a short step to telling a minority Senator that he is descending to "an all-time low" if he tries to bring up a matter, or if he insists on discussing it. Mr. President, majorities swing back and forth. It is important that we get precedents clearly established so that we may protect the minority as well as the majority.

I have no resentment or rancor in my heart. I had intended to discuss the provisions of the bill today. However, I shall do that on a later occasion since I think in common courtesy I should desist from doing so now in the event that the majority leader feels that I have misquoted him in any way, or should he wish to offer some type of rejoinder. I thank him for coming here and for his patience in remaining here throughout this discussion.

CONTEST FOR THE MINDS OF MEN—AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, recently there appeared in the Portland Oregonian an editorial entitled "United States Dilemma." It is an editorial which has caused widespread comment not only throughout my State, but it has caused considerable comment throughout the West.

The editorial was followed by a second editorial in the Oregonian on July 5, 1950, entitled "It Is Time For America's Type of Revolution."

I ask to have both these editorials printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of the remarks I now wish to make, and make very briefly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland Oregonian]

UNITED STATES DILEMMA

The Oregonian succeeded in reaching Stanley W. Earl by telephone at Seoul, Korea, early Monday morning—a surprising business in itself so far as the normalcy of business there was concerned, since Mr. Earl could hear the boom of artillery on the battlefront some miles away, and there were no priorities on telephone calls. He said he saw little evidence of war except for troops and equipment moving through the streets. The attitude of the people was apathetic.

Mark the word well. Mr. Earl, raised in Portland and ex-CIO official now with the ECA in Korea, is a keen observer, and though he used the word in a hasty transpacific call, we can have no doubt that it is thoroughly accurate. It is too much in keeping with the situation in China as the Communists moved down to be otherwise.

And in many respects that single word "apathetic" as descriptive of the demeanor of the people of Seoul and South Korea in general, has far more significance than all the statements that are coming out of the United Nations and the State Department at Washington.

The fact is that in Korea we are up against almost exactly the situation which confronted us in China so far as the people are concerned. The people are living under corrupt and ineffectual governments—ancient tyrannies masquerading as democracies. Down come the Communists from the north like the wolf in fable, and the sheep have so little to lose that they are indifferent. Why should they care who eats them?

All over the world, as this page has stated on several occasions, the United States is confronted with the same embarrassing—in the long run, impossible—situation. If we are to oppose the aggressions of Russia, and still maintain our democratic policy of letting other peoples come to their own decisions, we can only lend ourselves to the parties in power in any country where the Russians choose to strike or bring pressure. So we lend ourselves in France, Turkey, Yugoslavia, Iran, Greece, and Italy, though there are factors in the organizations of these countries which make the democratic flesh creep. All over the globe history has tricked us into the position of supporting rotten regimes and stubbornly ancient economic organizations in the name of democracy.

The situation, in brief, is this: We cannot permit communism to take over the earth without a war to the death. But meantime communism gradually extends itself, playing on all the ancient injustices which have accumulated in the countries which it can reach—injustices which make the people apathetic. And since the United States, sitting on its high moral throne, does not wish to interfere with the internal workings of these countries, it can only withhold action or give aid to the governments in existence.

So far as this page is concerned, it shares with all other good Americans the wish that there were a solution in our present line of approach to the world difficulties. But we are very much afraid that a test case is coming in this Korean war, and that whether or not the Korean problem breaks the world crisis, something else will very soon afterwards.

We do not see how the United States can continue its policy of merely bolstering up the shaky governments which stand in the way of advancing communism. Most of these governments are vulnerable in the extreme, and are supported by economic systems which have little relationship to democracy. It seems to be clear that if we permit Russia to offer the only revolutionary force against the established evils—that is, if we merely go in with arms aid for every decrepit regime—we are in for humiliation first and war with Russia afterward.

Putting it all together, there is the question of whether—against the wishes of every sane person—we are not in the position of being compelled to undertake something approaching political imperialism?

We did not remake Southern Korea. We let a fantastically bad government and organization go on there, with the result that the people are apathetic as the invasion gets under way. And all over the world we are holding up a lot of tripe from the past. What will be the end of it? This page, while reconciled to any extremes that may be decided on in regard to Korea, cannot believe that the United States, experienced in democracy, should continue to attribute democracy to every country which stands in the way of Russia. Most of them are impossible left overs that violate our every sense of justice.

The question is as to whether we should begin to impose democracy upon those we save in its name.

[From the Portland Oregonian of July 5, 1950]

IT IS TIME FOR AMERICA'S TYPE OF REVOLUTION

So much comment has resulted from our article of Tuesday, June 27, on the crisis of American foreign policy brought about by the Korean situation, that we reprint the article elsewhere on this page as a basis for further discussion.

We have no illusions to the effect that the strong public reaction has resulted from any particular brilliance of statement. Rather, we take it that the interest shown is a recognition of our having isolated and faced what the public has come to recognize as the No. 1 problem of American policy but which our Government, and the world, for that matter, continues to duck. Frequently enough the public—as fully informed as the authorities except in technical details—is far ahead of the authorities in the acceptance of inevitable conclusions. And we suspect that this is one of those occasions, on a tremendous scale.

Restated and extended, our point is that it is doubtful whether the United States, forced by its strength into the role of world protector, can afford to continue its policy of nonintervention in the internal workings of the countries it is called upon to guard.

That is: The earth is a patchwork of governmental and economic organizations which the present inherits from the past; and each patch on the works, save for a very few exceptions, is a mighty sorry mess from our democratic American standpoint. And this reality has been brought home to us in Korea as never before. Here, after years of our occupation, a surprise invasion by the North Koreans under Russian auspices finds us almost without friends among those we feel called upon to cover militarily. The people are indifferent because we, during occupation, attempted no redress of their ancient suffering. And what are we going to do now, assuming that we succeed in reestablishing the military situation up to the 38th parallel? Will we simply place senile President Rhee more firmly in his chair, and call back to command of the South Korean army the 300-pound general who resigned at the first sound of firing?

It is little wonder that in Korea, as in China earlier and as in all other areas convenient for Russian expansion, the Russians feel free to exploit accumulated unrest for their own benefit. So long as Russia offers the only revolutionary program, this program can be the most false and disastrous program in the history of mankind and yet gain the acceptance of the people, inasmuch as no other choice is offered. What is it to the Koreans that America represents the restoration of Rhee and the fat general? That would leave them right where they started from.

And this situation is no matter of academic argument. It is a matter of reality. The vast masses of China have accepted a version of Russian revolution under our eyes, and the people of Korea have shown that they do not care much whether they go that way. We had better take stock.

This page is just about around to the point of concluding that the United States has absolutely no escape from its dilemma except in full acceptance of the responsibilities of its power.

We cannot draw out of affairs. We would throw the whole of mankind into chaos. Our negative action would in effect be a positive action of the most important sort. And yet here we are operating all around the earth in a most unsatisfactory manner. Everywhere, as a result of the restraint which is ingrained in our democratic practices, we are supporting the governments which exist. We are trying to get by. And the truth of the situation is that these governments are generally unacceptable to the masses of the people. Our intentions are honorable, but all over the globe we support democracies which aren't democracies at all—which merely represent the old injustices—and so we expose ourselves to creeping communism.

Our policy of nonintervention in internal affairs is now a proved failure in Korea. It probably has been a failure in Germany. Our success perhaps has been greatest in Japan, where positive action has been more the rule. But even there it remains to be seen whether reform has been sufficient.

There is no way out—and no common sense—except in making democracy dynamic. It is too late now to correct the hesitancy we have shown from the end of World War II to the present. But if we restore the situation in Korea, we should return to that scene as a revolutionary force, not merely as an imperial power bolstering the warlord feudalism of the past.

After all, only one true revolution exists on earth. Only one exists in all human history. That is the upheaval which results when men are released to govern themselves. Communism is no revolution whatever. It is merely the commotion attached to the transfer of power from one mass of favored subjects to another. But it does temporarily win the loyalty of those who formely were dispossessed. That is the strength of communism in its expansion.

And we are going to continue to have difficulty with that strength, in Asia particularly but elsewhere also, so long as we content ourselves, in entering old, misruled lands, with mere support of those who preside over the miseries of the people. Democracy must again become a shattering force. Otherwise we will never have truly grateful friends in these countries where we are being compelled to operate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, these two editorials discuss a specific phase of the general subject matter of America's foreign policy, to which I think not only each Member of Congress, but the American people, should give a great deal of heed. I do not comment upon the editorials from the standpoint of suggesting that our hindsight be used for critical purposes by way of destructive criticism, but I ask to have them read because I think it is important that we reflect upon America's record in the field of foreign policy since the close of hostilities in World War II.

This editorial writer, as the Members of the Senate will see if they read the two editorials, in essence says that the United States is in a very serious contest in the world for the minds of men; that we have a great system of political and economic democrary to sell to the peoples who have not yet come under the domination of Russian totalitarianism, and we have the job, once we can get behind the iron curtain, of also selling that system of political and economic democracy to the millions of people who today are living under the subjugation of the Soviet Union.

This editorial writer, I think with penetrating thought, suggests that we survey the record we have made in our contest for the minds of men, and do what we can to correct a very serious mistake we have made in our approach for the minds of men.

He points out that to a remarkable extent America has been supporting reactionary governments which have been exploiting, economically, their subjects, with the result that in the advance of Russian communism there has not been a will to resist the aggressive policies of Russia.

In these two editorials the writer says in a brief space, as well as I have seen it written, Mr. President, that after all our Government has not made a good record in demonstrating to the peoples of the countries that have been subjected to the aggressive acts of Russia the superiority of political and economic democracy to the totalitarianism of communism. As one who believes that if communism continues to advance throughout the world, free America not only will be in danger but in the next century there will even be a question as to whether or not free America will survive in the world if she becomes surrounded by Communist states, I believe the editorial writer of the Portland Oregonian has put in print something we had better consider now by way of bringing about a change in the approach the United States has been making to the peoples in the countries that have been subjected to Russian aggression.

We know now, Mr. President, that Russian communism succeeded in China not because the United States failed to supply—at least in 1946, 1947, and 1948—the Nationalist Army of Chiang Kai-shek with sufficient matériel for war, but that Russian communism swept over the mainland of China because the will to resist it was not in the hearts of the Chinese people. Believe me, Mr. President, that is a fact of history we cannot afford to ignore when we come to appraise the reasons for the plight in which we now find ourselves, or to determine the policies which ought to be followed by us in a program we will have to initiate.

In my opinion, this editorial writer has made a substantial contribution to the thinking of his readers when he points out that it is important that we ask ourselves the question, "Why was the will to resist the spread of Russian communism not in the hearts of millions of Chinese people?"

The record is perfectly clear that although we supplied military equipment and military aid by the millions of dollars worth, economic aid and economic reform failed to constitute a part of the program of America in China. I think it is no answer to say that after all we did we did not feel that we should interfere with the internal domestic problems of China. We were interfering with the domestic internal problems of China, Mr. President, when we went to the military assistance of the generalissimo.

I happen to be one who believed we should go to his military assistance. But I am not talking from the standpoint of hindsight now, because the record is clear that the junior Senator from Oregon urged in those years that we accompany our military aid with economic aid and reform since the false, vicious, lying propaganda of the Communists was by way of appeal to the stomachs of the Chinese.

Believe me, Mr. President, in this contest for the minds of men we cannot afford to overlook the stomachs of men. We might as well face the fact that one of the reasons why so many millions of dollars worth of our military equipment fell into the hands of the onrushing Chinese Communists was that members of the Chinese Army and the peasants living in the areas where the Chinese Army was encamped, from time to time as that great retreat took place did not have the will to resist. They fled, leaving the equipment undamaged to the Chinese Communists. And the peasants, so we are now reliably informed, were of sabotage assistance to the oncoming Russian Communists.

I believe one of the errors made in our aid to China, as this editorial writer points out, is that after all we did not create a will to fight the Russian Chinese Communists because we did not give the Chinese peasants economic reason for resisting.

After all, Mr. President, to an illiterate, ignorant Chinese peasant it does not do much good to be talking by way of an intellectual appeal to his mind in terms of the right of man and the dignity of the individual. One can be successful in educating them to an accepting understanding of those great principles of human freedom only after they see that they and their loved ones are going to be fed and clothed, and given an economic opportunity as individuals to support themselves and their loved ones free of the type of feudalism that unfortunately characterizes the economic program of the Nationalist Government.

Oh, I know how dangerous it is to point these things out, because even in pointing them out one will probably discover, as I am sure this editorial writer has already discovered, that those who do not want to study the facts will be inclined to say, "Why, the implications of such remarks are favorable to the overrunning of the Generalissimo's army by the Chinese Communists." Quite the contrary happens to be the position of the junior Senator from Oregon. It happens to be his position that more military aid, not less, should have been made available to the Generalissimo. The junior Senator from Oregon happens to believe that we did not do enough so far as giving the Nationalist Chinese Government military assistance is concerned. But I think we had the right, and we owed it to the American taxpayers also, to take the position, when we were pouring millions of dollars' worth of equipment and material into China in order to strengthen the military arm of the Generalissimo, that there should be distributed to the Chinese people economic assistance for the benefit of the individual Chinese family. It should have been made perfectly clear that it was American aid which was coming to them, and that the hordes of Chinese Communists, supported by the Soviet Union, were turned back, there would be adopted an economic reform program, including a land reform program.

We know, Mr. President, that one of the most successful bits of propaganda the Communists were able to use in China happened to be their promises in regard to land reform. They smeared us with the vicious, false propaganda that it was the Americans who were seeking to prevent economic reforms which are necessary if millions of Chinese people are to be enabled to live just a little bit above the level of almost an animal existence. The American people need to remember how sordid are the conditions that confront millions of the Chinese.

I happen to be one who also is saddened by the fact, as this editorial writer brings out, that apparently the same lack of will to fight has characterized many of the South Koreans, and that apparently the Russians have been making some progress with their propaganda that the materialistic United States is in league with the reactionary regime in Korea which seeks to keep the South Koreans in a feudal state and continue what is, so far as economic benefits are concerned, almost a system of serfdom imposed upon a large portion of the population of South Korea.

Mr. President, no Member of this body will be quicker to vote for every possible assistance which can be given to end, and to end quickly and successfully, America's military engagement in South Korea. However, we must go further than that. After we drive the Communists beyond the thirty-eighth parallel, we must give consideration, and must give it quickly, to the economic system which will prevail in the part of Korea for which we assumed very definite responsibility when, in July 1945, the San Francisco Charter was before the Senate of the United States, we missed the great opportunity which was ours of recognizing the provincial Government of Korea and then insisting that, under a mandate relationship through the United Nations, an early free election be held in Korea, to determine, on the part of the Korean people themselves, their own economic and political future. However, instead of doing that—as it was urged on the floor of the Senate that we should do, what did we do? A few months later we wrote a rather sad chapter in the history of our country; we joined with Russia in a partition of Korea. In my judgment, when we did that, we partitioned the freedom of the Koreans and we laid the foundation stones for what has happened in Korea.

In my judgment a thorough investigation by the appropriate committee of the Senate of the United States will show that since we took whatever jurisdiction it was—and it is not clear, in international law, just what that jurisdiction was—over South Korea, we missed one opportunity after another to convey to the people of South Korea a true understanding of what American political and economic democracy means. Where is the record of American political and economic reform in South Korea? On the basis of such information as I have received, it would appear that we did not make much of a record. Not only that, but recently we started a movement out of Korea. Someone was certainly asleep at the switch at that time, Mr. President, because it would appear that adequately handled intelligence would have shown that the North Koreans apparently meant to create trouble for the South Koreans. After partitioning the freedom of Korea, I think we owed it to the South Koreans to keep their military defenses so strong that there was no danger that a successful military advance could be made upon them.

Oh, yes, Mr. President, what I am saying could be interpreted—although I do not mean it as such—as crying over split milk. However, that is not at all what I am doing. What I am saying is that I think there should be a resurvey and a revaluation of our entire foreign policy, so as to see to it that we do not make similar mistakes in the other areas of the world where I think there is danger that Russia, through her satellites, will take action which may cost the lives of additional American boys.

Mr. President, that leads me to the concluding point I wish to make in these remarks, namely, that the entire problem of winning the minds of men, in this contest between the democratic way of life and the totalitarianism of communism, calls for educating millions of people who are illiterate, millions of people who do not even think on the plane on which we think, millions of people who are not the beneficiaries of the decades of economic growth and development which the American people, through their far-seeing ancestors, now have the privilege of enjoying.

We must bring to these countries not only political reform, if the democratic way of life is to win their minds, but economic reform. We must appeal not only to their minds but to their stomachs. In my judgment we must appeal to their stomachs first, because only when we relieve men of the instinctive fear of hunger, only when we relieve men of the instinctive fear of insecurity, insofar as concerns the lack of the necessities of life, do we have any chance of appealing to their minds. A hungry Chinese or a hungry South Korean or any other hungry asiatic is not going to be very much impressed with appeals which we may make to his mind, in terms of individual rights. They are more concerned with where they are going to get the next bowl of rice with which to feed their loved ones, as well as themselves, because, after all, the parental instinct is a rather basic thing, and parents the world over act emotionally and instinctively about the same way when it comes to wanting to protect their loved ones.

Mr. President, we can do something about it; but are we doing it? Has there been manifested in this Congress a desire to do very much about it? I do not think so. That is an assertion by me. It is proper to ask whether I have anything with which to back it up. Yes, I have an interesting bit of evidence with which to back it up, namely, the record of this Congress on point 4. It is not a good record.

What is the record to date? The record to date is a proposal to cut the heart out of point 4. In my judgment such a proposal will make it just that much more difficult to win the minds of men in this contest for freedom the world over. Impolitic as it may be, nevertheless I consider it my duty, as I view this problem, to say to the American people that we should be substantially increasing the appropriations for point 4, rather than talking about cutting them so drastically as committees of Congress have proposed to cut them to date.

There is a need for the American people to be informed about point 4, because as I go about the country, I discover, to my complete surprise and astonishment, that the people do not understand point 4. I submit—and other Senators can test the general sentiment on this matter—that the average American taxpayer has the notion that the point 4 program is a Santa Claus program, that the point 4 program involves a proposal to dump millions upon millions of dollars' worth of more food and economic aid and eqiupment into the breadbaskets of backward peoples of the world. But that is not the program. There is need of the point 4 program, regardless of whether there were a Democratic President or a Republican President in the White House, he would have to have a point 4 program. The American people sooner or later are going to awaken to that fact. I am pleading here this afternoon that they awaken to it sooner rather than later. There has been too much of "too little, too late" for too many years in America. The very essence of the point 4 program is to bring American economic know-how to the backward areas of the world as fast as they can absorb it, to the end that they may develop their own natural resources, their own economy, and thus be placed upon not only a self-sustaining basis but upon a basis of economic production which will make it possible for them to bring to their millions of people a higher standard of livin. When that time comes we shall not be reading, almost every year, newspaper headlines to the effect that millions of people are dying in China because of famine, or that famine is sweeping India and other sections of south Asia.

The very heart of point 4 is to encourage in the retarded countries the development of the much vaunted—and rightly so—free-enterprise system of America, to bring it to the backward peoples of other nations by enabling them to make proper use of their natural resources, so that they may become self-sustaining. Oh, there are some great industrial leaders in America who see that vision. There are some great industrial leaders in America who are thinking in terms of the next century, instead of next year's profits. There are some great industrial leaders in America who recognize that a point 4 program is one of the best insurance policies that can be taken out for the perpetuation of the American free-enterprise system. But there is not a sufficient number of them. The same is true of leaders in other walks of American life. But there is not a sufficient number of them.

Mr. President, in my opinion we are going to win the contest for the minds of men in the interests of the democratic way of life, unless we as a people recognize that the price of peace, too, is a high price, though it is much, much less than the price of war. Yet it is a price worth paying. It gives the best assurance of bringing freedom not only to future generations of American boys and girls but of keeping the light of freedom flaming in all the countries of the world. I think that if we will proceed as this editorial writer clearly implies in the admirable editorials of his I have placed in the RECORD, and succeed in getting people in backward countries to understand the economic objectives of democracy, we shall turn back the tide of Communist totalitarianism.

Therefore, Mr. President, I strongly recommend to my colleagues the reading of these two great editorials, and I urge the careful pondering in this session of the Congress of the need for more adequate appropriations for the point 4 program.

As one Republican Senator, I offer no apologies on this issue for giving my all-out support to President Truman in behalf of his point 4 program. In fact, I think the Democrats in the Senate ought to be urging early action on it by way of increased appropriations over those requested. I happen to believe it is in part the answer to the problem of reaching the stomachs as well as the minds of men.

In closing, I give an example. Certainly, a loan under point 4 should be made to India for the development of great power resources on one of the Indian rivers, if it can be demonstrated by a thorough investigation that the particular project is economically feasible and will bring important economic benefits to the people of India. Likewise, I shall work and vote for similar economic developments in other backward countries under point 4, as good insurance for the preservation of the American free-enterprise system. I am cognizant, too, I may say incidentally, that the point 4 program is not going to result in any economic losses for American industry. Potentialities for economic development for American industry almost exceed one's imagination, when we think what can happen to our free-enterprise system once we start raising the standard of living of millions upon millions of people the world around; who, as I said earlier in my remarks, today have a standard of living so far below ours that it is almost to the point in some countries of an animal existence.

I trust, Mr. President, although I am never sure, that my remarks will be interpreted as I mean them. I summarize them in this sentence: I am for all-out military aid to those countries which show a willingness to resist Russian communism. I am also in favor of an all-out point 4 program for the same countries in order to give them a clear demonstration of the superiority of economic democracy expressed through a free-enterprise system, over the police-state economy of Russian communism.

THE RIGHTS AND PREROGATIVES OF MEMBERS OF THE MINORITY

Mr. LUCAS obtained the floor.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, does the Senator want to make an insertion in the RECORD, or does he want to make a statement?

Mr. CAIN. I should like to make a statement of about 3 or 4 minutes' length.

Mr. LUCAS. I thought my friend from Oregon was going to speak for 3 or 4 minutes, but it developed into a speech a little longer than that.

Mr. CAIN. I may say to my friend from Illinois, the difference between the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Oregon in this instance is that the Senator from Washington has written his statement.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. It happens that I should like to have the floor, likewise, for possibly 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to conclude what I have to say. I do not want to keep the Senator from South Dakota here any longer. He is staying, I know, waiting to hear what the Senator from Illinois has to say; which is not going to take very long.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that at no time since I have been in the Senate have I ever thought of trying to bar the rights of any Member of the minority party. Perhaps what I said recently with respect to a precedent or two was wrong. However, there is quite a distinction between the precedents cited by the Senator from South Dakota and what happened in the Senate a few days ago. The first precedent cited by the Senator was that of a motion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] to consider the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. President, we must always remember that there is a proper time when measures can be taken up and considered. The motion of the Senator from Arkansas to have the Senate consider the oleomargarine bill was made on the call of the calendar, and every Senator knows that when we are working on the calendar many Senators are present. I believed in the oleomargarine proposition and I voted for it at the time.

Another instance which has been referred to involved the motion to discharge the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. If the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] had known the background and the history of what we were trying to do, how many times we had discussed the question involved with the members of the committee in an effort to get the committee to make a report on the nominations for postmasterships of servicemen many of whom were disabled, I think he could understand why a number of us on this side of the aisle were somewhat excited about the failure of the committee to report the nominations. That matter was taken up during an executive session when the majority leader, former Senator White of Maine, was present.

The difference between those two examples and the one which disturbed me no end—and I admit it, and I still feel very badly about it—is the fact that the Senator from South Dakota said he was present from 4:30 o'clock on, waiting for an opportunity to move to consider his bill. Of course he had a right to do that, but there had been no excitement about the bill until very recently. No one on this side of the aisle had spoken to me about the measure; no one had appeared before the committee, or even asked to appear before the committee, or requested that the bill be considered. The Senator from South Dakota, in the debate, spoke about its not being a political matter, and that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] was a cosponsor of the bill. That is correct. But the Senator from South Dakota did not pay any attention to the right of the Senator from South Carolina to be present when the bill was considered. He knew he was engaged in a campaign, fighting for his senatorial seat, and could not be present when the motion was made to consider the bill. But that did not make any difference with my friend from South Dakota. He was going to move to take it up, and he did so move.

Mr. President, I still resent the fact that at the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening, when it was generally understood that there would be no more business transacted in the Senate, such a motion was made. I think that even the Senator from South Dakota has come to me on a few occasions since I have been majority leader and asked me whether there would be any more business transacted, and I would say "Yes" or "No," depending upon what sort of an agreement we on this side of the aisle had with the minority leader.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I had not made such an inquiry of the Senator from Illinois on that day.

Mr. LUCAS. No; the Senator had not. But I think the Senator, on previous occasions, has come to the Senator from Illinois and asked whether there would be any more business transacted in the Senate on that day. If not, of course the Senator from South Dakota would go to his office to sign his mail and do whatever was necessary to be done, which we all have to do every day.

I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] was absolutely correct a moment ago when he said on the floor of the Senate that we must have confidence in each other with respect to such matters. If the Senator from South Dakota had advised that he was going to move to consider the bill, we would have had a quorum call and discussed the question.

I am satisfied in my own mind that the Senator from South Dakota feels that he did not do the correct thing, even though he had a right to do what he did under the Senate rules, because no other Senator has ever talked so much, used so much language, so many words, so many gestures, speaking for approximately 2 hours in order to defend his position. It was not that serious. But I am satisfied in my own mind that the Senator from South Dakota knew, after he had moved to consider the bill under those circumstances that, after all, it was probably the wrong thing to do. It has taken him about 2 hours to try to square himself with his own conscience as a result of what he did a few days ago. That is about all there is to it, Mr. President.

Someone has said there has been a lot of wind on Capitol Hill today, and I think that is correct, and I have contributed to it. I plead guilty of helping to keep going the windmill which has been turning all day long.

Mr. President, as majority leader of the Senate, I have a tremendous amount of responsibility. It may be that I was too much upset. I had left the Senate, and it was a wonder that I was not at home, or out to dinner, or at some other place, but it happened that I had a lot of work to do, and when the bells rang for a quorum call I could not believe my ears. I called up the cloakroom and was advised that the Senator from South Dakota had just moved to consider a bill. I rushed to the Senate and found that on the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is now in the chair, a quorum call had been started and everything went along all right.

I am not vexed at all with my friend from South Dakota. I think everything has passed off very pleasantly during the day. He had a right, of course, to make his defense, but I repeat that it took him a long time to square himself with respect to what he did.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN BENEFITS TO AMERICAN FORCES IN KOREA

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the armed forces of North Korea crossed the thirty-eighth parallel on Saturday, June 24. Since that date American ground forces have been committed in southern Korea through a United Nations determination to repel the invader.

Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the Netherlands have pledged air or sea support to the United Nations peace forces but so far as the junior Senator from Washington knows only American ground troops are engaged in the conflict. We are told that one American Army division has thus far been promised to and partly committed in the Korean campaign and that an American Marine division is now on the way to take part in the campaign. We are likewise told by those within our Defense Establishment that three to six or more divisions may be required to restore peace and order throughout Korea and to destroy the invader.

Mr. President, war in every full sense of that word is now in progress in Korea. It is a real and bloody and cruel war to the men who are dying, to the men who lie wounded, and to the men who are fighting in Korea today.

The junior Senator from Washington can see no real difference, nor can he see any difference at all, to the war which is now being fought in Korea and World War II. The present war in Korea is but an extension of the life-and-death struggle against totalitarianism for which this Nation and our allies suffered and sacrificed in the last war. As the American Congress and the American people provided for the wartime requirements and postwar needs of the men and women who persevered in the armed services during World War II so will our people and the Congress wish to demonstrate the same care and action to the American military personnel which is today seeking to preserve the rights and freedoms which were temporarily made secure on the battlefields of World War II.

The only way that we at home can give this assurance to those who are now engaged in Korea is to reinstate the GI bill of rights and other related benefits which covered our service personnel in World War II. Though the junior Senator from Washington was not a Member of the Senate during the period when this World War II legislation was conceived he has read the record and found it adequate to the needs of the present. The Senator from Washington sends to the desk a bill to extend GI rights and benefits to those who are engaged in and will become veterans of the Korean war and asks for its appropriate reference.

The Senator from Washington has been advised by the legislative counsel who prepared the proposed legislation, that, to all practical purposes, the bill, if enacted into law, would do for the Korean veteran what was done for the veteran and participants in World War II. Among its provisions is one to confer $5,000 of war service insurance automatically on the persons who are now or will be engaged in the Korean campaign.

This bill, Mr. President, is being introduced in my name and that of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], a veteran himself of World War II, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], a veteran of World War I.

Had this proposal, Mr. President, been circulated among my colleagues, it is likely that the name of almost every Senator would have appeared upon it.

The junior Senator from Washington actually prays to God, Mr. President, that the Korean war will soon and victoriously be concluded and that no part of it will overflow into other areas of the world. That war, however, whatever the time it takes to win it, will be fought by our countrymen. Every single member of our committed armed forces are deserving of being protected and covered by every reasonable benefit a grateful homeland can provide. The Senator from Washington knows that the bill which he has just sent to the desk will receive the prompt and serious consideration which it deserves.

The bill (S. 3890) to extend to personnel of the Armed Forces engaged in operations against the forces of the government of North Korea certain benefits provided by law for veterans of World War II, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CAIN (for himself, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and Mr. BRICKER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, on last Thursday, July 6, the Senate recessed until today at noon. The morning newspapers of July 7 disclosed the fact that the switchmen's strike on five of the western and midwestern railroads had been halted as to four of those roads, but had continued in effect as against the fifth railroad, namely, the 8,000-mile Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Co. It will be recalled that on the evening of July 6, last Thursday, it was reported to the Senate that the President, according to a ticker report of 11:01 a. m., July 6, was asked whether he considered the strike serious enough for him to seek seizure of the roads in the courts, or to address the Congress about it.

I quote the ticker report:

He replied that the delay to movement of wheat and cattle is reason enough for drastic action. But he declined to predict what course he will take if the strikers do not return to work.

The New York Times of the next morning, July 7, in reporting the halting of the strike as to four of the fixe railroads, published an article entitled "Switchmen Halt Tie-Up on Four Roads on Truman's Threat."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be set forth at this point in my remarks in the body of the RECORD a copy of the New York Times article of July 7, so entitled.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SWITCHMEN HALT TIE-UP ON FOUR ROADS ON TRUMAN THREAT—UNION CALLS OFF WESTERN STRIKE AGAINST ALL BUT ROCK ISLAND—PRESIDENT HITS WALKOUT—DRASTIC STEPS PREPARED—TEAMING UP OF "BIG GOVERNMENT WITH OBSTINATE EMPLOYERS" ALLEGED BY WORKERS' HEAD

(By George Eckel)

CHICAGO, July 6.—Citing the threat of direct Government action, the Switchmen's Union of North America, AFL ,tonight called off its 12-day strike against four Midwestern and western railroads, but continued it against a fifth, the 8,000-mile Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co.

There was no immediate indication of what action the struck railroads would take in the face of this development.

The switchmen's action, announced by Arthur J. Glover, the union president, followed a threat made today by President Truman at his news conference in Washington to take drastic action unless the switchmen abandoned their strike.

Mr. Truman called the strike an unjustified one and blamed it on a small minority of the switchmen. He said that he hoped drastic action would not be necessary to force the strikers back to their jobs, but said also that he would act if it became necessary. He declined, however, to say what steps might be taken.

CONDUCTORS' PLAN HALTED

President Truman today also ordered an emergency fact-finding board in the threatened strike of Pullman conductors against the Pullman Co., which automatically defers for 60 days a strike the conductors had scheduled for July 11.

The union, which is the Pullman Conductors' division of the Order of Railway Conductors, seeks a general revision of its working agreement. Mr. Truman said the dispute threatened to deprive the country of essential transportation.

The President observed that the switchmen had declined to abide by the recommendations of what he called a very able fact-finding board.

Mr. Glover's announcement today ordered back to work about 2,500 of the 4,000 switchmen called out at 6 a. m., June 24 against the Rock Island and these four other railroads, all smaller than the Rock Island: the Chicago Great Western, the Great Northern, the Denver, and Rio Grande Western and the Western Pacific.

The strike was called in support of the union's demand for a 40-hour week with 48 hours of pay. A Presidential fact-finding board on June 15 had recommended reduction of the switchmen's workweek from 48 to 40 hours, with pay increase of 18 cents an hour. A union spokesman today contended that this report made no mention of the switchmen's union.

Mr. Glover's announcement today charged a teaming up of "big Government with obstinate employers" to the detriment of collective bargaining.

RAIL MANAGEMENT HIT

"In this way we learn whether free men in a free country can still bargain with their employers over their living conditions without fear that big Government will team up with obstinate employers," said Mr. Glover.

"There has been no true collective bargaining in the railroad industry for years. There has been no true collective bargaining in this dispute.

"Railroad management has made no move to settle this dispute. Railroad management merely has said 'go on strike, we don't care. The Government will come in on our side and knock the hell out of the switchmen's union.'

"And, judging from President Truman's remarks today, railroad management has been on the right track.

"Our strike is legal. We have complied with all provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

"Well, now we'll just find out whether a legal strike against a railroad is possible in this free country."

UNION GIVES STATUS OF ROAD

Asked how the status of the Rock Island differed from that of the other four struck railroads, a union spokesman said there were two reasons:

1. Apparently a union cannot have a strike against four or five railroads but it might be possible to strike against one—that is what we're trying to find out.

2. The Rock Island is paralleled throughout its system by other railroads, and hence is less needed than the others.

Mr. Truman, in his remarks today, however, had said that the strike was tying up five main-line railroads when the rail services were needed, especially for the movement of cattle and wheat from the West.

The Rock Island does a good deal of that business, but the use of alternate railroads, attended by the inconveniences of longer truck hauls and the prospect of car shortages, has thus far handled the cattle and wheat business along the Rock Island's route.

Larry Gonder, public relations director for the union, who issued Mr. Glover's statement, said that if the four railroads against which the strike was called off did not take the men back, it's a lock-out.

NEGOTIATIONS WILL KEEP ON

Mr. Glover said that negotiations would continue with the Rock Island in an attempt to remake a settlement. Mr. Gonder said the switchmen's president would remain here for negotiations.

J. D. Farrington, president of the Rock Island, was "stunned" by the union announcement, said an aide, and had no immediate comment.

Harold Sims, public relations director for the Association of Western Railways, took issue with Mr. Glover's statement that rail management had made no move to settle the strike.

"We've offered a 40-hour week, and 18-cents-per-hour increase, and time and a half after 40 hours," said Mr. Sims, observing that the railroads had gone along with the fact-finding board's recommendations.

The union contends that a 31-cent-an-hour increase is needed to maintain take-home pay on the 40-hour week at the 48-hour level.

Mr. Gonder said that any striking switchmen going back to work would go back on a pre-strike basis, adding that 65 percent of the union's members worked 56 hours a week, and 35 percent 48 hours, all at straight time. He then said that the June 15 fact-finding report did not mention the switchmen's union, but on April 19, the board, hearing the conductors' and trainmen's case on a similar dispute, had announced their findings would apply also to the switchmen.

MEDIATOR'S APPEAL FAILED

The union Saturday rejected an appeal by John Thad Scott, Jr., chairman of the National (Railway) Mediation Board, to end the strike in view of current critical developments.

The union announced yesterday that Presidents William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, and Philip Murray, of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, had pledged the support of their organizations in telegrams to the switchmen. Unemployment due to the strike has reached 60,000, mostly of railroad employees, as all the struck lines except the Great Northern shut down operations. The Great Northern has carried on curtailed passenger service.

Francis A. O'Neil, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, who has been here trying to help settle the switchmen's strike and to avert a strike threatened on or after July 15 by the trainmen and conductors on a similar issue, said tonight that mediation efforts had been centered on the switchmen't dispute today in view of President Truman's remarks. He added that there was nothing new to report.

PRESIDENT SILENT ON PLAN—SEIZURE PROGRAM IS CONSIDERED AS WAY TO SWAY STRIKERS

(By Joseph A. Loftus)

WASHINGTON, July 6.—The decision of the Switchmen's Union, AFL, to end a strike on four of five western railroads followed by a few hours today President Truman's threat to take action to restore traffic.

Whether the return to work on all but the Rock Island System would be enough to stay the President's hand was a matter of speculation. A controlling element probably will be the progress, or lack of it, in the negotiation of a settlement.

The President did not indicate what course of action he had in mind. It was reported authoritatively that no firm course had been decided on, but that seizure would have to be considered if the strikers did not yield to public pressure generated by the White House.

The Government's timetable will be controlled to some extent, too, by its desire to head off a threatened strike of trainmen and conductors. Those two groups will be legally free to strike July 15. The issues in both disputes are the same, and it is probable that the pattern of settlement will be the same. Union rivalry was said to have spurred the switchmen to move out in front to try to set a pattern.

Mr. Truman, answering news conference questions, said the railroad strike was not interfering with supplies for the Korean fighting but that two of the railroads were absolutely essential to the movement of wheat crops and cattle from grass pastures to feed lots.

And it seemed to him, he added, that this was important enough for drastic action if they did not go back to work.

The Rock Island is one of the railroads important to the movement of grain.

The President was asked at the outset of the conference for comment on the switchmen's strike.

He replied that the strike had been brought about by a very strong minority of the switchmen; that it was an unjustified strike and that the men ought to go back to work at once.

Continuing, Mr. Truman said the switchmen had the views of a very able board made up of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah, a former Justice of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and a professor of economics at California University.

The mediation board, he went on, suggested that they go back to work and they should have gone back to work when the board suggested they do so. It was then he added that he hoped it would not be necessary to take drastic action to get them back to work.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the report made to the Senate on the evening of July 6, as to the progress of the strike, was made in order to emphasize the importance of the passage by Congress of the bill, S. 3463, which, if enacted into law, would make unlawful any strike or any lockout by a carrier arising out of or in connection with any dispute falling within the purview of the Railway Labor Act. Secondly, the report was made to the Senate in order that we may preserve indelibly in the RECORD of this body a chronological description and statement of what are deemed to be the salient facts of this strike, there having been previously given to the Senate in the course of earlier reports the facts as they developed, or at least what the present speaker considered to be the more important of those facts.

Mr. President, to my mind the history which has been made within the past few days since the recess of the Senate on the evening of July 6, has verified, amplified, and strengthened the argument in support of the importance of the enactment into law of S. 3463. I call attention to the remarks made by Mr. Arthur J. Glover, president, Switchmen's Union of North America, AFL, in connection with the continuance of the strike against the 8,000-mile Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co. In the article which I have had incorporated into the RECORD appears this language:

Mr. Glover's announcement today charged a teaming up of "big government with obstinate employers" to the detriment of collective bargaining.

It continues:

In this way we learn whether free men—

I am still quoting from Mr. Glover's statement—in a free country can still bargain with their employers over their living conditions without fear that big government will team up with obstinate employers.

I continue to quote from Mr. Glover's remarks:

There has been no true collective bargaining in the railroad industry for years. There has been no true collective bargaining in this dispute.

Railroad management has made no move to settle this dispute. Railroad management merely has said "Go on strike, we don't care. The Government will come in on our side and knock the hell out of the switchmen's union."

Continuing with Mr. Glover's statement as quoted in the New York Times:

And, judging from President Truman's remarks today, railroad management has been on the right track.

Our strike is legal. We have complied with all provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

Well, now we'll just find out whether a legal strike against a railroad is possible in this free country.

Mr. President, this was the attitude of the president of the labor union in continuing the strike, although pursuant to the threat or remarks by the President—if they be not considered a threat—he had called off the strike as to the other four railroads involved. I am not here to denounce or to praise any leader of this or any other union, or the head of any railroad. I desire to point out to the Senate, however, that the interests of the public seem to have been the last thing in the mind of Mr. Glover as he issued these emphatic and concluding words which I have read:

Well, now we'll just find out whether a legal strike against a railroad is possible in this free country.

Mr. President, the Washington Post of Saturday, July 8, contained a most interesting editorial entitled "Strike Test." It begins with the sentence:

The reason given by the head of the switchmen's union for the decision to continue the strike against the Rock Island Railroad is that the union wants "to find out whether a legal strike against a railroad is possible in this free country."

Then the editorial writer says:

We think the question should be phrased differently. For what the union is really trying to determine is whether the Government will consider a strike against a single railroad system sufficiently serious to justify resort to the drastic action threatened by the President, which led to abandonment of the strike against four other roads.

Mr. President, I shall not read the editorial in its entirety, but I ask that it be set forth in full at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRIKE TEST

The reason given by the head of the switchmen's union for the decision to continue the strike against the Rock Island Railroad is that the union wants "to find out whether a legal strike against a railroad is possible in this free country." We think the question should be phrased differently. For what the union is really trying to determine is whether the Government will consider a strike against a single railroad system sufficiently serious to justify resort to the drastic action threatened by the President, which led to abandonment of the strike against four other roads.

Strikes against the railways are unquestionably legal and their increasing frequency answers the query as to their possibility. The really important issue that the switchmen's union ought to be considering is the effect on public opinion of exercising the right to strike. The fact that members employed by four railroads were ordered to return to work after the President issued his warning shows that the union realizes that the right to strike is, in fact though not legally, limited to strikes which, in the opinion of the Government do not create national emergencies.

However, any strike that ties up an important segment of the transportation system—in this case the Rock Island—has a demoralizing effect on the economy that calls for protective action in the public interest. If railway unions proceed on the assumption that a long-suffering public will tolerate localized strikes that permit unions to pick off their victims one by one in a struggle to gain wage increases or other concessions, they are mistaken. For the public is interested not only in preventing strikes against the railways, but in maintaining an efficient system of rail transportation. By using the strike as a weapon for extorting from the roads greater concessions than they can afford to grant, unions increase railway operating costs and compel the roads to raise their charges—in short, they exact tribute from the entire country.

Whether strikes are directed against one or many roads, reliance on this kind of coercion as a means of settling disputes is bound to lead ultimately to legislative restriction or prohibition of strikes. Compulsory arbitration of railroad labor disputes, as proposed in a bill sponsored by Senator DONNELL, would, as Senator MORSE pointed out in the course of a debate on the switchmen's strike, set a precedent for Government control of a segment of the national economy, and might lead to establishment of similar controls over electric utilities, mines, and the merchant marine. Nevertheless, the public requires protection against strikes that endanger health, demoralize trade and industry and, as at present, threaten national security. If peaceful settlement of railway disputes cannot be effected through collective bargaining, the only alternative will be to ban strikes, despite the dangerous potentialities of this kind of Government intervention.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I call attention to this concluding paragraph in the editorial:

Whether strikes are directed against one or many roads, reliance on this kind of coercion as a means of settling disputes is bound to lead ultimately to legislative restriction or prohibition of strikes. Compulsory arbitration of railroad labor disputes as proposed in a bill sponsored by Senator DONNELL, would, as Senator MORSE pointed out in the course of a debate on the switchmen's strike, set a precedent for Goverment control of a segment of the national economy, and might lead to establishment of similar controls over electric utilities, mines, and the merchant marine.

I digress to state that that question was discussed to some extent upon the floor of the Senate the other day, and it is not necessary at this moment to reiterate the views of either the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Missouri with respect to the substance of the statement to which the editorial writer alludes.

Continuing, the editorial says:

Nevertheless, the public requires protection—

There is a third party in interest in all these matters, not the employees alone, not the employers alone, but the public, to whom this editorial writer correctly alludes.

I quote further:

Nevertheless, the public requires protection against strikes that endanger health, demoralize trade and industry and, as at present, threaten national security. If peaceful settlement of railway disputes cannot be effected through collective bargaining, the only alternative will be to ban strikes, despite the dangerous potentialities of this kind of Government intervention.

After the strike had been halted as to the four railroads on the evening of July 6 there occurred another step, and that was on July 8, when the Army seized the strike-bound Rock Island Railroad System and did so by order of President Truman.

I hold in my hand the New York Times article of July 9 entitled "Rock Island Road Is Seized by Army; Strikers Stay Out. Truman Orders Pace To Take Over and Asks Switchmen To Return, but They Refuse. United States Starts Legal Action. Injunction Move Is Expected—Rail Head Predicts Early Resumption of Operations."

The opening two sentences of the article read:

The Army seized the strike-stalled Rock Island Railroad System today by order of President Truman. Simultaneously the President and Frank C. Pace, Jr., Secretary of the Army, called upon the switchmen to return to work but their union rejected this request.

I call attention somewhat farther in the article to this:

Arthur J. Glover, president of the Switchmen's Union, gave its reply to the National (Railway) Mediation Board and issued this statement:

"We have informed the Secretary of the Army that the Switchmen's Union of North America will restore full and complete service on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co. when"—

Note the condition imposed and the time expressed by Mr. Glover—

"when and if the Government seizes the profits of that railroad as well as the labor of free men.

"The President has said the United States is not a war. Is the Democratic President of a democratic country saying that no railroad union can conduct a legal strike in peacetime?"

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this entire article from the New York Times be incorporated in my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROCK ISLAND ROAD IS SEIZED BY ARMY; STRIKERS STAY OUT—TRUMAN ORDERS PACE TO TAKE OVER AND ASKS SWITCHMEN TO RETURN, BUT THEY REFUSE—UNITED STATES STARTS LEGAL ACTION—INJUNCTION MOVE IS EXPECTED—RAIL HEAD PREDICTS EARLY RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS

(By Joseph A. Loftus)

WASHINGTON, July 8.—The Army seized the strike-stalled Rock Island Railroad system today by order of President Truman. Simultaneously the President and Frank C. Pace, Jr., Secretary of the Army, called upon the switchmen to return to work but their union rejected this request.

After taking possession and receiving the switchmen's rejection, the Army had announced that it had requested the Department of Justice to take necessary legal action under the President's order. The Department of Justice was reported already in action.

Seizure-plus-injunction is the tested pattern that prevented a national rail tie-up in 1948.

J. D. Farrington, president of the Rock Island, said in Chicago that transcontinental trains would be in operation, under the Army, in 48 hours.

The Government's next thrust was expected Monday when the courts reopen, although there were precedents in emergencies for going to a judge at home and getting his signature on a temporary restraining order.

If union officials defy a court order they are liable to swift penalties for contempt.

ORDER BASED ON 1917 STATUTE

The seizure order relied on the President's powers as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces and on a 1916 seizure statute.

As he ordered the Army to take over and operate the railroad, Mr. Truman said that the union had refused to accept the findings of an emergency board that he appointed and that "governmental seizure is imperative for the protection of our citizens."

"It is essential," he continued, "to the national defense and to the security of the Nation, to the public health and to the public welfare generally, that every possible step be taken by the Government for the operation of this railroad."

Arthur J. Glover, president of the Switchmen's Union, gave its reply to the National (Railway) Mediation Board and issued this statement:

"We have informed the Secretary of the Army that the Switchmen's Union of North America will restore full and complete service on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Co. when and if the Government seizes the profits of that railroad as well as the labor of free men."

OFFICERS NAMED TO OPERATE ROAD

"The President has said the United States is not at war. Is the democratic President of a democratic country saying that no railroad union can conduct a legal strike in peacetime?"

Secretary of the Army Pace designated Assistant Secretary Karl R. Bendetsen to act for him in carrying out the executive order. Mr. Bendetsen in turn, appointed Maj. Gen. Frank A. Heileman, Chief of Transportation of the Army, as director of operations.

Luke W. Finlay, wartime executive officer of the Transportation Corps, will act as special consultant for the Department of the Army during the period of Government operation. Brig. Gen. Andrew W. McIntyre, war-time chief of the railway transport service division, Transportation Corps, will act as executive officer to General Heileman.

The President's action amounted to a warning to the trainmen and conductors not to go through with their threatened strike over the same wage and hour issues raised by the switchmen.

The President's order placed in effect the prestrike wage terms but left the way open to continued negotiations and the application of a final settlement on a retroactive basis.

The switchmen's union is a relatively small one. There are far more switchmen in the Brotherhood of Trainmen.

The order authorized the management of the company "to continue its managerial functions to the maximum degree possible consistent with the purpose of this order." That meant the collection and disbursement of funds as before.

The alternative to this "token seizure," as unions term it, is to operate the railroad for the account of the United States Treasury.

The union struck 2 weeks ago for a 40-hour week without a cut in the present pay for 48 hours. The emergency board, which heard similar demands by the trainmen and conductors and said the findings should be applied to the switchmen, recommended the shorter work week and an increase of 18 cents an hour instead of the full pay for the 8 hours that would be lopped off.

PROTECTION FOR WORKERS ORDERED

The strike was called originally against five railroads in the West and Midwest. The switchmen went back to work on the other four after President Truman on Thursday called the strike unjustified and threatened drastic action.

The President on Thursday said the strike against the five railroads was not affecting the fighting in Korea but that it was affecting the movement of grain and cattle.

In his statement today announcing the seizure, Mr. Truman called upon not only the officers of the switchmen's union but also "such other labor organizations as may be affected to take appropriate action to keep their members at work."

His order authorized the Secretary of the Army to furnish protection for persons employed or seeking employment * * *; to furnish protection for such transportation system; and to furnish equipment, manpower, and other facilities or services deemed necessary to carry out the provisions, and to accomplish the purposes, of this order.

Secretary Pace, taking possession of the carrier, said: "In assuming this task, I rely on the cooperation of railroad labor and management and of the public, for only through the united efforts of all can the task be successfully performed. I earnestly request all citizens to give their help.

"The interests of the public will be fully protected by the Army. Every effort will be made to resume full operations of this railroad. Maximum care will be taken throughout to avoid any impairment of normal service.

"The Army proposes to utilize the knowledge and experience of outstanding civilian and military transportation experts. It will be my policy to insure that the public is fully and swiftly informed of all matters affecting the operation of the railroad while under control of the Department of the Army."

In the threatened 1948 strike, the unions involved were the switchmen, the firemen, and the engineers. They rescinded the strike order after Federal District Judge T. Alan Goldsborough signed a temporary restraining order. That was on May 10, 1948.

Judge Goldsborough signed a permanent injunction on July 1. The judge ruled, as the Supreme Court had ruled a year earlier in a coal mine seizure, that the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law was not intended to apply to the Government when it assumed the role of employer in an industrial dispute as it did when it seized private properties.

The three unions in the 1948 dispute had rejected an emergency board's recommendation of a 15½ cent wage increase. On July 8, however, the unions accepted that plus some rules changes which were not regarded as substantial.

Mr. DONNELL. On the same day, Sunday, July 9, a later article appeared in the Washington Post. I read this much from the heading and the black-faced bulletin with which the article begins:

COURT ORDERS SWITCHMEN BACK TO WORK—ACTION FOLLOWS UNION'S DEFIANCE OF PRESIDENT, SEIZURE BY ARMY

CHICAGO, July 8.—A Federal judge in Buffalo, N. Y., tonight ordered striking A. F. L. switchmen to end the strike against the Rock Island Railroad. The union's president, Arthur J. Glover, promptly ordered the men back to work.

Mr. President, I ask that this entire article be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COURT ORDERS SWITCHMEN BACK TO WORK—ACTION FOLLOWS UNION'S DEFIANCE OF PRESIDENT'S SEIZURE BY ARMY

CHICAGO, July 8.—A Federal judge in Buffalo, N. Y., tonight ordered striking AFL switchmen to end the strike against the Rock Island Railroad. The union's president, Arthur J. Glover, promptly ordered the men back to work.

Striking A. F. of L. switchmen yesterday defied President Truman's demand that they return to work on the Rock Island Railroad, which he ordered seized and operated by the Army.

The Army later announced that Assistant Secretary of the Army Karl Bendetsen had requested the Department of Justice "to take necessary legal action." It was reported that Justice Department Attorney Joseph Friedman was on his way to Buffalo—where the switchmen's union has its headquarters—to seek a back-to-work court order.

The 1,500 strikers would go back to their jobs, said Arthur J. Glover, president of the Switchmen's Union of North America, "when and if the Government seizes the profits of that railroad as well as the labor of freemen."

"The President has said the United States is not at war," Glover added. "Is the democratic President of a democratic country saying that no railroad union can conduct a legal strike in peacetime?"

TRUMAN BLAMES UNION

Mr. Truman laid responsibility for the strike at the union's door in his seizure order. Acting under his powers as President and as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, he said:

"This union has declined to accept the findings and recommendations of an emergency board created by the President under the Railway Labor Act.

"It is essential to the national defense and to the security of the Nation, to the public health and to the public welfare generally, that every step be taken by the Government to assure the operation of this railroad."

He then ordered Army Secretary Frank Pace, Jr., to take possession of the entire Rock Island system by 5 p. m. (e. d. t.) yesterday. All Federal agencies were directed to cooperate with the Army. Pace was told to use military personnel to operate the road, if necessary, and to protect those using it.

PACE ISSUES STATEMENT

Pace promptly issued a statement saying he would carry out the President's order on the basis of "carefully prepared and considered plans."

"The interests of the public will be fully protected by the Army," Pace declared. "Every effort will be made to resume full operations of this railroad. Maximum care will be taken throughout to avoid any impairment of normal services. The Army proposes to utilize the knowledge and experience of outstanding civilian and military transportation experts."

Maj. Gen. Frank A. Heileman, Army Chief of Transportation, was given the job of putting the road back into operation under Army control.

The Rock Island was 1 of 5 railroads on which the switchmen's union called out 4,000 of its members June 25. Last Thursday, when the President threatened to intervene, the strike was called off on the other four roads. The Rock Island strike was continued to determine "whether a legal strike can be called in this free country." According to union sources it was selected for the test because its territory was so well served by other carriers that no emergency would result from suspension of its operations.

Friday, the union received what amounted to an ultimatum from Federal mediators, but countered with what it termed a "very reasonable" offer to settle. Details of this offer were not disclosed.

Mr. Truman's drastic action yesterday was seen in some quarters as a move to forestall strikes threatened after July 15 by 3 unions representing 250,000 trainmen, conductors, and yardmasters. The July 15 date ends the "cooling-off" period required by the Railway Labor Act after a strike vote has been taken.

The switchmen seek a 40-hour workweek at the same pay they have been receiving for 48 hours, tantamount to a 31-cent-an-hour raise in pay. A Presidential fact-finding board recommended the 40-hour week but limited the pay increase to 18 cents. This the switchmen rejected.

Mr. DONNELL. In the New York Times of the same date, July 9, 1950, is a very interesting article by Mr. J. H. Carmical, entitled "Rail Strike Legislation Is Sought To End Frequent Work Stoppages."

I call attention to this significant language of the article with respect to the bill, S. 3463, and with respect to another bill pending in the House of Representatives:

In an effort to prevent strikes in the railroad industry, hearings already have been held on a bill by Senator FORREST C. DONNELL, of Missouri, that would make binding on both railroad management and labor organizations the decisions of independent boards appointed by the President in all cases where disputes with respect to wages and working conditions cannot be settled amicably. Generally, arbitration would be made compulsory when an agreement could not be reached under procedures of the Railway Labor Act.

In addition, a bill has also been introduced in the House by Representative WINT SMITH, of Kansas, which would prevent the railroads for 2 years from employing anyone who had participated in any concerted action calculated to force a carrier to agree to rates of pay, rules, or working conditions different from those recommended in the report of a fact-finding board.

The opening sentence of the article reads:

The threatened and actual strikes in the railroad industry in the last few years, many in defiance of recommendations of fact-finding boards appointed by the President of the United States under the Railway Labor Act, suggest the need of some legislation that will end effectively work stoppages on the Nation's railways.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be set forth at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAIL STRIKE LEGISLATION IS SOUGHT TO END FREQUENT WORK STOPPAGES

(By J. H. Carmical)

The threatened and actual strikes in the railroad industry in the last few years, many in defiance of recommendations of fact-finding boards appointed by the President of the United States under the Railway Labor Act, suggest the need of some legislation that will end effectively work stoppages on the Nation's railways.

When enacted in 1926, the Railway Labor Act included no provisions for the mandatory settlement of labor disputes within the industry. Incorporating most of the machinery developed within the industry for handling of labor negotiation, its decisions were not to be binding upon either the management of the railroads or the labor organizations. With the authority of the President and with the force of public opinion back of any decisions made by the fact-finding boards, the theory was that the decision would be accepted by both sides and that expensive and paralyzing strikes would be avoided.

RAILWAY LABOR ACT HELPED

For about 20 years, the Railway Labor Act was an effective instrument in preventing serious labor disturbances in the industry. Although some difficulty was encountered in settling labor negotiations in 1941 and also in 1944, it was not until May 1946, that a Nation-wide strike took place. However, it lasted for only 2 days. Since then, however, there have been several strikes on important segments of the Nation's railroad system.

Last fall, there was a disastrous strike on the Missouri Pacific Railroad which lasted for about 7 weeks. It stemmed from the handling of grievances by employees by the adjustment boards under the Railway Act and also from the interpretation by management of certain rules and regulations. At present, there are grievance cases pending against several railroads and threats of strikes are being made against one or two railroads.

In May the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen called a strike against four railroads in an effort to force the railroads to employ two firemen on Diesel-electric locomotives in road service. This strike was called after two fact-finding boards, one in 1943 and the other in 1949, had found there was no need for an additional fireman on these locomotives. After tying up traffic for several days on these four railroads, the strike was terminated, virtually without any gain to the firemen's organization but at a great cost to the railroads involved and to their customers.

SWITCHMEN'S UNION STRIKE

After 12 days, the switchmen's union last Friday called off a strike against four or five railroads involved. This was done only after a threat by President Truman to take drastic action if the strike was not ended soon. The switchmen's union, however, refused to direct the return of its members to the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, one of the five struck roads.

The strike against these roads was called in defiance of a decision on June 15 of a fact-finding board. This board had recommended that men doing switching work on the railroads have a 40-hour week and a pay increase of 18 cents an hour. The union had insisted on 48 hours' pay for 40 hours' work, which would have meant an increase of 31 cents an hour.

A strike of the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen will be legal under the Railway Labor Act on July 15. These two organizations had demanded among other things that a run of 100 miles of 5 hours, whichever is less, should constitute a day's work, instead of the 150 miles or 7½ hours now in effect. After lengthy hearings, the fact-finding board rejected their demands and they have refused to accept the findings.

A Nation-wide strike of pullman conductors is scheduled to begin on Tuesday. President Truman last week, however, set up a fact-finding board which must report back to him within 30 days. Meantime, the conductors are supposed to stay on the job. The pullman conductors are seeking a decrease in the number of working hours and also several rule changes.

In all cases since 1941, the railroads have accepted the recommendations of the fact-finding boards. The refusal of the unions to accept their recommendations has brought about a sharp deterioration in rail labor relations and created a situation harmful to the business of the railroads. At present the railroads are having difficulty in making ends meet and strikes and threats of strikes are diverting considerable traffic to competing agencies.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS A FACTOR

According to some railroad executives one reason for the frequency of strikes in the industry is the unemployment benefits up to about $100 a month during a strike. Under a law enacted in the 1930's, the railroads were required to contribute to a fund which among other things could be used for unemployment benefits. No contribution is required from employees, but an employee on strike or not working because of a strike is eligible for unemployment benefits.

In an effort to prevent strikes in the railroad industry hearings already have been held on a bill by Senator FORREST C. DONNELL, of Missouri, that would make binding on both railroad management and labor organizations the decisions of independent boards appointed by the President in all cases where disputes with respect to wages and working conditions cannot be settled amicably. Generally, arbitration would be made compulsory when an agreement could not be reached under procedures of the Railway Labor Act.

In addition, a bill also has been introduced in the House by Representative WINT SMITH, of Kansas, which would prevent the railroads for 2 years from employing anyone who had participated in any concerted action calculated to force a carrier to agree to rates of pay, rules, or working conditions different from those recommended in the report of a fact-finding board.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, in the Washington Post of today, Monday, July 10, is an article on the front page entitled "Wage Dispute Still Unsettled. Army Running Rock Island Railroad as Strike Ends by Court Order." It is an Associated Press dispatch from Chicago dated July 9. I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that included in this article is the following paragraph, referring to the court order having been issued in Buffalo, N. Y., by Federal Judge John Knight:

> The switchmen's union promptly complied. Arthur J. Glover, union president, told the strikers to go back to work. He said: "We have no choice now."

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article appearing in the Washington Post may be set forth at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAGE DISPUTE STILL UNSETTLED—ARMY RUNNING ROCK ISLAND RAILROAD AS STRIKE ENDS BY COURT ORDER

CHICAGO, July 9.—About 1,500 AFL switchmen ended a 2-week strike today on the Rock Island Railroad. Trains under Army bosses began rolling again, putting a shine on rusty rails.

The deadlocked tie-up of the 8,000-mile line was broken shortly before 1 a. m. (e. d. t.) by a temporary injunction. The court order was issued in Buffalo, N. Y., by Federal Judge John Knight.

The Switchmen's Union promptly complied. Arthur J. Glover, union president, told the strikers to go back to work. He said: "We have no choice now."

The switchmen and the railroad's 21,000 other employees are technically working for the Army, which took over operation of the Rock Island yesterday. The wage dispute which led to the strike still exists.

Today an Army spokesman said the Army does not plan to participate in negotiations with the union. It will retain control until union and railroad have reached a working agreement. There were no plans for immediate resumption of wage talks, but a railroad official said he believed they will be resumed in the near future.

The union president made it clear the switchmen's dispute with the Rock Island and other roads hasn't been settled. His back-to-work order was given under protest.

Earlier, Glover had turned a deaf ear to urging by President Truman that the strike against the Rock Island be ended. And yesterday, when Army officers took over the line, Glover told newsmen he would ignore them unless the Government seized "the profits of the railroad as well as the labor of free men."

In ordering the Army to take over the railroad, Mr. Truman said it was "essential to the national defense and to the security of the Nation," to get the railroad running.

Judge Knight's order set a hearing at Buffalo, the union's headquarters city, July 17 to determine whether the injunction will be extended or made permanent.

Mr. DONNELL. I call attention to the fact in this connection that injunction by a court, an order issued by a Federal court, was the only procedure that proved effective to stop the strike on the Rock Island Railroad. Notwithstanding that the Government, acting through the President, had seized it, notwithstanding the fact that the labor union had abandoned its strike on the other four railroads, notwithstanding the fact that the Army had taken possession of the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad system, we still find that until the arm of a court was extended and its order was issued, the labor union refused to permit its men to go back to work on the Rock Island system.

I call attention to the fact that in Senate bill 3463 there is a section under which it is provided that—

> Any United States district court within the territorial jurisdiction of which any violation of this section—

That is to say the new section 10 (a) of the Railway Labor Act, if the bill be passed—

> shall have been committed or shall be threatened shall also have jurisdiction, at the instance of the Attorney General of the United States, or the attorney general of any State affected by such a violation or a threatened violation of this section, or of any interested carrier or aggrieved party, to grant the remedy of injunction, prohibitive or mandatory, which may be appropriate in the premises;

I call attention to the fact that the interests of the public are involved in a controversy in a strike such as this. It is unnecessary, of course, to amplify and multiply the illustrations. But I should like very briefly to mention a few of them which have come to my attention in the press reports. Some of them may have been mentioned earlier in the accounts which I have given to the Senate. But they come to us here from a somewhat different angle, as I see it.

In the Salt Lake Deseret News of July 3, 1950, before the strike had been called off as to the four railroads and before the Army had taken possession as to the fifth, it is stated:

STRIKE IDLED IN UTAH RISE—SULFURIC ACID SHORTAGE THREATENS NEW FACTORIES

A creeping paralysis of Utah industrial activity was continuing Monday after AFL switchmen refused the Government's request to call off its week-old strike.

R. D. Bradford, general manager of the idled Garfield smelter of the American Smelting & Refining Co., said closing of the plant also has stopped production of sulfuric acid essential in a number of Mountain West fertilizer, vanadium-uranium, and oil-refining operations.

Geneva Steel Co. said there will be no change in its operations before July 10, but officials could not say what would occur after that date. They said coal had been stockpiled in anticipation of the coal miners' 10-day national holiday which began Saturday.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

DEPENDS ON RAILROAD

Geneva's Utah County operations, employing 5,000 workers, depend on coal mined in its Carbon-Emery field mines and normally hauled by the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad.

The switchmen's strike, which came after the union rejected a Presidential fact-finding board's recommendations in a wage and hour dispute, is directed against D. & R. G. W., Western Pacific and three other rail roads.

The walkout and three contract disputes, have idled nearly 11,000 workers in Utah.

BLOCKED BY PICKETS

Out of work are 4,000 Utah railroad workers, 4,000 coal miners, 1,200 Garfield smelter workers and 80 construction workers who have refused to cross picket lines at the A S. & R. plant, and 50 Geneva Steel employees at the firm's Keigley limestone and dolomite quarry near Payson.

In addition contract disputes have idled 1,330 at the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co.'s properties at Midvale, Bingham, and Lark, 123 at the Structural Steel & Forge Co. in Salt Lake City and 76 at the Illinois Powder Manufacturing Co. plant in Spanish Fork Canyon.

Another 100 construction workers employed by Utah Construction Co. to build a tunnel between Lark and Bingham as a United States Smeltering, Refining & Mining Co. facility refused to cross the CIO picket lines at Lark Saturday. They were off the job Monday as the company closed for the Independence day week end.

S. Lyle Johnson, Federal mediator, and Dan Edwards, State labor conciliator, were trying Monday to arrange new talks to settle the disputes.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that these articles proceeded from a somewhat different angle. I should have said that they give additional, as I see it, illustrations of the general facts to which I have called attention earlier of interference with the interests of the public as distinguished from the interests of the employees and the employers.

I hold in my hand an article from the Pueblo (Colo.) Star-Journal of June 27, 1950. The headline is:

D. & R. G. W.—

That is the Denver & Rio Grande Western—strike hits shipment of fruit corporation.

I read as follows:

While the switchmen on the D. & R. G. W. Railroad continued into the third day of striking—

That was only the third day, Mr. President, and the strike continued for almost 2 weeks. I continue to read—the other railroads not affected by the walkout and the trucking firms in and around Pueblo began feeling a heavier increase in business.

Probably hardest hit by the strike are the farmers on the western slope. Cherries, apricots and some of the other fruit are not arriving in Pueblo as they were scheduled. The railroad strike can cause a general tie-up of produce if the trucking companies can not handle all the business. The perishable items are getting into about the peak yield of the season and the already short crop will see a serious loss if the fruits and vegetables are not brought to the market almost immediately.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article from the Pueblo Star-Journal may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

D. & R. G. W. STRIKE HITS SHIPMENT OF FRUIT CROP

While the switchmen on the D. &. R. G. W. railroad continued into the third day of striking, the other railroads not affected by the walkout and the trucking firms in and around Pueblo began feeling a heavier increase in business.

Probably hardest hit by the strike are the farmers on the western slope. Cherries, apricots, and some of the other fruit are not arriving in Pueblo as they were scheduled. The perishable items are getting into about the peak yield of the season and the already short crop will feel a serious loss if the fruits and vegetables are not brought to the market almost immediately.

The only movement in the Rio Grande terminal is the arrival and departure of the Missouri Pacific Eagle. The train that ordinarily runs from St. Louis to Pueblo on the MoPac and from Pueblo to Denver on the Rio Grande, has been forced to lay over all day in Pueblo and then return to St. Louis. No attempt is being made by supervisors to get the train on through the local yards to complete the run to Denver.

The airlines are beginning to feel an increase in volume of inquiries and reservations from Pueblo to Denver and to many eastern points that are affected by the strike.

The switchmen have nothing in view for a rapid settlement of the strike but it was reported that important negotiations will be held Thursday. The strike is laying off approximately 600 employees in Pueblo.

The switchmen are striking for a 40-hour week and a 31-cents-an-hour wage increase. The demand has caused an absolute shutdown of the Rio Grande's 2,700 miles of track throughout Utah and Colorado. It is the first complete halt of activities in the companies 70-year-old history.

Officials of the railway company and trucking firms hoped that they could transport the Colorado spinach and pea crop to market by truck but expressed doubt that the peach and fruit crops could be handled in time.

Trucking firms said the bulk of the business is centering around the Grand Junction, Alamosa, and Durango areas—hardest hit by the strike as there is no other railroad in the area.

Some of the additional trucking volume handled by the local terminal included Colorado Fuel & Iron Corp. shipments, and the truck terminal today is scheduled to make deliveries of Continental Oil Co. products.

Mr. DONNELL. Then, Mr. President, I have an article from the Des Moines Register of July 6, 1950, which is short, and I shall read it:

INDUSTRIES HIT BY RAIL STRIKE

MUSCATINE, IOWA.—The strike of switchmen on the Rock Island Railroad is expected to curtail the operation of industry here by next week.

A survey Wednesday indicated that several manufacturers are planning slow-downs for next week, and one looked for a complete shut-down if the strike isn't settled.

The Milwaukee Railroad operates through Muscatine, but freight service here has been halted because Muscatine switching is handled by the Rock Island.

The New York Journal of Commerce under date of July 7, contains an article all of which I shall not read, which comments on various industrial fats and has this very very interesting statement:

DRYING OILS

The drying oils market was rather featureless yesterday with trading mostly on the dull side. The railroad strike still held the linseed trade in the grip of a transportation dilemma. Most, or all, crushing is in the strike area and major producers were still finding it difficult taking care of nearby shipments. Oil for immediate was priced at the same figure 17.5 cents, August at 17.3 cents and September and September-October were without change.

Mr. President, I call attention to an editorial appearing in the Detroit News of June 30, 1950. It is not long and I shall read it:

IN SUCH A CRISIS, THEY STRIKE!

In view of the commitment of American armed forces in the ominous Korean hostilities, there hardly could be a worse time than now for a strike disrupting transcontinental rail transport.

All five of the roads affected by the walkout of A. F. of L. switchmen are in that service. Four have suspended operations and the fifth is running on crippled schedules.

This strike, like that of the firemen earlier this year, is against the findings of a Presidential board on the issues in dispute. It represents another failure of the Railway Labor Act to fulfill its designed purpose of protecting the public interest in uninterrupted operation of the railroads.

That sentence and the next one I am going to read bear repetition:

Rail transport is vital—

Says the writer—

to national health and safety at all times. The News—

That is the Detroit News, Mr. President—is convinced the Railway Labor Act must be supplanted by one consigning rail labor disputes to impartial, compulsory arbitration, binding on labor and management.

I pause at this moment to state that the bill which I introduced and advocate does not supplant the Railway Labor Act. It amends it. But it does consign these disputes under the Railway Labor Act to—quoting from the editorial—"impartial, compulsory arbitration, binding upon labor and management."

The editorial concludes with this sentence:

The present strike, in the shadow of possible world war, may convince others of the need for this means of settling such disputes without strikes.

Mr. President, I now hold in my hand an editorial entitled, "One More Stage?" published in the Providence (R. I.) Journal of July 1, 1950. I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE MORE STAGE?

Since its passage in 1926, the Railway Labor Act has been applied in a variety of ways to maintain or restore labor peace on the Nation's railroads. One by one, new steps were added to the act's dispute-settling machinery of mediation and delay as the powerful railroad unions became more familiar with—and less impressed by—the original devices.

But throughout its history, the act has been dependent on the pressure of public opinion for its compulsive power over the unions. Sometimes when the formal machinery failed to produce settlement of an emergency strike, this pressure had to be exerted through Government seizure of the roads and once even through the angry threat of a President to draft strikers into the Army. Now we seem once again to have reached a point where a new stage will have to be added to the railway labor peace machinery, or a new channel found for the expression of public opinion, if the law's effectiveness is to be preserved.

AFL switchmen have struck four western railroads after proceeding fruitlessly through the entire sequences of cooling-off periods, mediation efforts and fact-finders' reports. Their action was in disregard to the recommendations of a presidential appointed board of inquiry. Two more strikes also threaten, as the conductors' and trainmen's unions wait out the final 30-day delay specified by the Railway Labor Act.

The mediation and fact-finding boards represent the nearest thing to an impartial expression of public opinion on the issues in the strike. In the case of the switchmen's walk-out, the board had recommended a seemingly liberal compromise of the union's initial demands and the railroads had accepted that basis for settlement. But the union continued to insist on 100-percent compliance with its demands and the strike went on.

Public interests is so closely identified with the railroads that many of the factors usually involved in labor strife are ruled out. There can be no retaliatory lock-out by the road managements, for example. And the public interest normally cannot tolerate any prolonged suspension of service on main lines, whatever the reason. Thus we cannot sit back to let the participants in a rail strike battle it out between themselves.

Yet if our intervention in the form of mediation and fact-finding boards fails to impress the unions with the public viewpoint, what else must we do to safeguard the clear national interest involved in maintaining rail service? What other, and perhaps stronger methods of expression ought we to adopt?

Before they continue their defiance of public opinion as thus far so reasonably expressed, it seems to us that the unions involved ought to weigh the possibility that the country may insist upon some surer method for preserving peace in the rail industry. Further abuses may force the American people to consider whether strikes ought not to be forbidden altogether in certain vital sectors of the economy. If such a question is raised, the rail unions will have to shoulder a large share of the responsibility for bringing it up.

Mr. DONNELL. I call particular attention to the concluding two sentences of that editorial, reading as follows:

Further abuses may force the American people to consider whether strikes ought not to be forbidden altogether in certain vital sectors of the economy. If such a question is raised, the rail unions will have to shoulder a large share of the responsibility for bringing it up.

In the Washington Post of July 10 appears an editorial entitled "Rock Island Seizure." I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in full at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROCK ISLAND SEIZURE

To end the strike against the Rock Island and no doubt for the purpose of heading off threatened strikes of major proportions by conductors, trainmen, and yardmen, the President ordered the Army to seize the road. The union remained defiant, however, until the Department of Justice obtained a temporary injunction directing the strikers to return to work. Arthur J. Glover, head of the Switchmen's Union, protests the action on the ground that the President has said the United States is not at war. "Is the democratic President of a democratic country saying that no railroad union can conduct a legal strike in peacetime?" he asked. The answer is that the United States is technically still at war with Germany and Japan. Since the President has no power to seize struck railroads in time of peace, he is relying for justification of his action on a law passed in 1916 authorizing seizure of any transportation system if it becomes necessary in time of war. That forgotten statute was unearthed more than 2 years ago when the Army seized the railroads to prevent a Nation-wide strike of engineers, firemen, and switchmen.

In an editorial of May 11, 1948, discussing the seizure order this newspaper said:

"Technically the country is still at war, but the President justified his action in the name of 'public health and the public welfare.' The indisputable fact is that an extended Nation-wide railroad strike would be disastrous in time of either war or peace. The President ought to have well-defined powers for dealing with such an emergency, without having to rely upon a wartime measure that may soon be inapplicable. * * * It is a problem that will have to be met and the national interest would be served best by meeting it before rather than after a peacetime emergency has arisen."

In another editorial of July 3, 1948, written a few days before the roads were restored to their owners, we characterized Government seizure as "a devious, clumsy, inadequate device for dealing with a problem that should be tackled in forthright fashion." We also pointed out that seizure does not insure settlement of disputes, and if it becomes a recognized means of dealing with strikes it may lead to permanent Government ownership and control of the railroads.

We have quoted these opinions at some length to emphasize our conviction that unless railway unions forego their right to strike in defiance of the recommendations of impartial fact-finding boards, legislative banning of strikes and provisions for Government seizure in peacetime as a last resort will be necessary. There is reason to believe that public opinion will strongly support such drastic measures if transportation tie-ups continue. It is worth noting that in the Rock Island seizure order the danger to the national security of the strike against that road is only one of the reasons advanced for the action taken to end it. Now, as in 1948, the President stressed the effect on public health and welfare of interruptions to rail transportation. In other words, the seizure order can be justified as a peacetime measure, although circumstances compelled the President to rely on his powers as Commander in Chief of the armed forces and on the 1916 seizure statute.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I now hold in my hand an article from the Salt Lake City Deseret News of June 27, 1950. The article refers to the stoppage of certain Utah coal production as a result of the railroad tie-up. I shall read one or two sentences from the article, as follows:

Coal mines in Carbon County were virtually all idle as shipments are mainly dependent on D. & R. G. W. trackage. In other areas, several mine operators were preparing to close down or curtail production if the strike is extended.

I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAIL STRIKE IDLES MINES—UTAH COAL PRODUCTION STOPS AS RESULT OF TIE-UP

The costly shutdown of two Mountain West railroads entered its third day Tuesday as Federal mediators in Chicago were striving to snap the deadlock in the AFL Switchmen's Union strike.

Railroad yards of the Denver & Rio Grande Western and the Western Pacific in Salt Lake City remained idle as employees of the two lines "sat it out" in four States.

Coal mines in Carbon County were virtually all idle as shipments are mainly dependent on D. & R. G. W. trackage. In other areas, several mine operators were preparing to close down or curtail production if the strike is extended.

In Price, 14 union mines in the Carbon County area were reported closed. Two independent mines, Knight Ideal and the Coal Creek Co., halted work because of the rail problem.

All mines indicated stockpiles are low and cannot be filled until the mines are back in full production.

Plans are being made to withdraw pickets at the D. & R. G. W. Garfield yards, F. W. Macaulay, secretary-treasurer of the switchmen's local said. Apparently no operations are being attempted there, he added.

The Garfield site was the only one picketed when the strike broke Sunday morning.

"As long as there are no attempts to run trains, there will be no pickets," Mr. Macaulay declared, "but we will continue to keep a check on the various yards in the Salt Lake area."

He said he has received no word from C. E. McDaniels, local chairman for D. & R. G. W. switchmen, since Monday. At that time, Mr. McDaniels, who is in Chicago, urged local switchmen to be ready for work at any time.

Federal mediators planned Tuesday to meet with representatives of the five railroads hit by the strike. Monday night the Government men held talks with officials of the switchmen's union.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I now hold in my hand in an editorial entitled "Drastic Action," from the Chicago Journal of Commerce of July 7, 1950. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in full at this point of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DRASTIC ACTION

Yesterday President Truman, a good friend of organized labor, threatened to take drastic action unless members of the AFL Switchmen's Union end their strike against five major railroads.

Presumably the President's threat is also intended for the ears of the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, who say they will strike on July 15 unless they get what they want.

What the unions want is a 40-hour workweek for the same wages they now are getting for 48 hours on the job—plus various other concessions. What a Presidential fact-finding board granted them was a good deal less.

Harry Truman is not the sort of man who would select fact finders with an antilabor bias. An outspoken adversary of the Taft-Hartley Act, the President owes his election in large part to the labor vote. Any benefit of doubt would be given to the unions if the master of Blair House had his way.

But unfortunately for the case of the railway labor bosses there seems to be no doubt whatsoever in the President's mind that the unions are dead wrong in their attitude. In the earlier years of the Railway Labor Act fact finding worked smoothly. But, once President Roosevelt set a precedent by rejecting a fact-finding board's report and demanding a new set of recommendations more favorable to the unions, such arbitration became largely discredited.

The brothers Pasquel, owners of the ill-starred Mexican Baseball League, used to rush out on the field and insist that the umpires reverse close decisions which happened to displease the Messrs. P. As a result, the umps became a laughing stock. The analogy with F. D. R. and his fact-finding boards is painfully obvious.

Mr. Truman is apparently trying to repair the damage done by his predecessor. But what sort of drastic action he will take to quell the defiance of his fact finders is not known at the moment. One course we might suggest is support of the Donnell bill, providing for compulsory arbitration in railroad labor disputes.

Reluctantly, management has endorsed the Donnell bill. Compulsion has a foreign flavor to a free-enterprise society. But there are worse things—such as chaos in the Nation's transportation industry at a time when our bandit-chasing exercises in Korea may demand swift, large-scale use of American transport.

Last year 43 cents out of every dollar distributed by railway management went for wages and salaries. Six cents went to stock and bond holders. Earnings dropped 36 percent from the preceding year. But such considerations weigh lightly with the brotherhood officials compared with their personal ambitions.

Time was when the great railway tycoons—the Hills and Harrimans and Goulds and Vanderbilts—ran their business with a high-handed disregard for the public welfare. Their counterparts of 1950 are to be found, not in the carpeted sanctums of management, but in the halls of labor.

Justice, the Nation's commerce, public safety, and common sense—all demand that the brotherhoods' power to paralyze part or all of America's rolling stock be ended. The Donnell bill will do it. It should be a "must" on the calendar of Senator LUCAS, majority leader. Congress still has time to pass the Donnell bill. It should do so.

Mr. DONNELL. I call particular attention to the concluding paragraph of the editorial, which bears upon Senate bill 3463:

Justice, the Nation's commerce, public safety, and common sense—all demand that the brotherhoods' power to paralyze part or all of America's rolling stock be ended. The Donnell bill will do it. It should be a "must" on the calendar of Senator LUCAS, the majority leader. Congress still has time to pass the Donnell bill. It should do so.

Mr. President, I wish to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as being historically interesting and important and relevant, a very interesting and rather short article entitled "Government Is Old Hand at Railroading," appearing in the Washington Post of July 9, 1950. It tells something about the previous experiences, beginning in World War I, of the United States Government in operating railroads. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in full at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT IS OLD HAND AT RAILROADING

Running a railroad is no new experience for the United States Government. Here are some of the important occasions when railroads have been seized:

In World War I: The Nation's railroads were operated by the Government from January 1, 1918, to March 15, 1920, for greater efficiency in the war. This seizure was not caused by a labor dispute.

In World War II: President Roosevelt seized the railroads just before Christmas, 1943, to prevent a strike over wages, and the Army kept possession until mid-January 1944.

1942–45: The Government kept the Toledo, Peoria & Western in its possession for more than 3 years to block a strike.

1946—Seizure of the Nation's railroads on May 17, 1946, failed to prevent a 48-hour strike of engineers and trainmen May 23–25. President Truman broke the strike by giving the strikers an ultimatum to get back to work or the Army would operate the trains.

1948: Mr. Truman again seized the railroads on May 10, 1948, in a dispute over wages and working rules, involving the engineers, firemen, and switchmen. This time he succeeded in preventing the strike altogether by getting an injunction. The railroads were restored to their owners on July 9 of that year, after a settlement had been reached.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I shall not trespass longer upon the time of the Senate this evening. To my mind I have brought to the attention of the Senate, from day to day, including this evening, facts which demonstrate beyond peradventure of doubt that the public interest demands action to prevent strikes in connection with disputes arising out of or connected with the Railway Labor Act. The interest of the public is predominant and paramount. I most earnestly insist that the observation, in one of the editorials I have presented, in regard to the importance of early enactment of Senate bill 3463 is sound and should be followed.

RECESS

Mr. McCLELLAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, July 11, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JULY 10, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou eternal God, our Father, who art unchanging in Thy greatness and goodness, Thy wisdom and power, Thy mercy and love, hitherto we have dwelt in safety under the canopy of Thy divine providence.

Thou hast been mindful of all our ceaseless needs and faithful unto all Thy promises, not withholding from us any needed blessing. May the memory of Thy loving kindness hallow all our days and inspire us to carry on calmly and courageously.

Grant that in the deliberations and decisions of this day we may have the guidance of Thy spirit, placing our hands in Thine and following Thy ways, for Thy ways are those of pleasantness and peace.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, July 7, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3876. An act to provide free postage for members of the Armed Forces of the United States in specified areas.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER INDUSTRY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, this Government should proceed forthwith to reactivate its entire synthetic-rubber industry which was built up during World War II. Great disaster could have been our lot in World War II had it not been for the development of our synthetic-rubber program.

It was apparent following the war that the administration was preparing to junk this entire industry. We would today be without any part of our synthetic rubber facilities if it had not been for the actions of the Congress. I feel that we should have gone further than we have during these past 5 years. We should have used every possible means to give a greater share of the domestic market to the producers of synthetic rubber.

This proposal is not made by me as a war-hysteria move. It is rather a realistic long-range plan for our own defense and, at the same time, it can be used to stabilize agriculture and lessen the effect of the problem of agricultural surpluses.

While it is true that synthetic rubber made from petroleum is cheaper, we still should have given part of the market to synthetic rubber derived from agricultural surpluses. The administration's hostile policy toward the synthetic-rubber industry since World War II has deprived the Nation of many scientific and industrial advances which would have made synthetic rubber less expensive. A full-scale domestic program would have made synthetic rubber produced from surplus agricultural products economically efficient.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement by J. Edgar Hoover, head of the FBI.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 40 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

COMMUNISM

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to address my remarks to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman need a quorum?

Mr. RICH. No; I do not. All I want to do is to take recognition of the statement that the gentleman made on the floor here a minute ago, and I am wondering what our Committee on Un-American Activities is doing at the present time to do everything possible to corral every Communist in the United States and know just what they are doing, because this is a most important time in our history that we ought to be investigating them. Everyone who wants to overthrow our Government. When they took the gentleman from Mississippi off that committee, they did this country a great injustice, in my judgment, because he always let the Congress know what was going on. He informed the public. Now we do not know; we do not hear much about that committee, and I think that they ought to go at it and do everything possible to inform the public and to corral the Communists in this country and sew them up. Yes, lock them up, so far as I am concerned, lock up everyone who would overthrow our Government.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BATES of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 8563) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BATES of Kentucky, YATES, FURCOLO, CANNON, STOCKMAN, and WILSON of Indiana.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

FORT CAROLINE PARK

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I speak in support of H. R. 7709, before the House after receiving the unanimous approval of the Public Lands Committee.

The paramount historic significance of this land lies in the fact that it is the site of the first colony of men and women to come to what is now the United States for religious freedom. Prior attempts at colonization of what is now the United States had been essentially exclusively for the acquisition of wealth, territorial expansion and other such purposes.

When the colony was founded there were no white settlements in what is now the United States, while since that date white occupation has been continuous. The site was fortified by France, Spain, England, the Confederate States and the United States. Three international battles took place there.

In my opinion, there is a very strong sentiment among the people of the county and State for the establishment of the park. Certain of the property owners have objected and recently secured recission of the county commissioners' approval, who have objected to removing the lands from the tax rolls. Taxes involved on the land would be very small indeed. I think that the majority of the people in Duval County warmly approve of the park.

Among organizations which have urged the establishment of this historic park are: Jacksonville and regional chapters of the Daughters of the American Revolution and of the National Society of Colonial Dames of America, Jacksonville and Florida State Chambers of Commerce, Jacksonville and Florida State Junior Chambers of Commerce, Jacksonville and Florida Historical Society, various local civic clubs, including Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, Civitan, Exchange, American Institute of Architects.

I sincerely hope that this legislation will pass.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SHELLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House will be interested to know of the visit I paid our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], a few days ago. Mr. KEEFE is responding to treatment and he is gaining. It seems just a case where too much work told even on his magnificent physique. I know that you will be glad to know that he is on the way to recovery, and I think they are going to let him sit up during this week. It is hoped that there will be rapid improvement from now on.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE ACT OF 1940

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6560) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, to authorize provisions in national service life-insurance policies for increased monthly disability benefits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will not do this. This bill will not cost anything. It has been approved by the Veterans' Committee, and there is no use letting it stay on the calendar from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month. I would like to have it passed now. I do not think there is any objection to it; I do not see how there could be.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The reason for asking that it be put over without prejudice, I will say to the gentleman, is that the report, apparently, from the Veterans' Administration, reveals that the provisions of the bill would increase the liability borne by the public funds, and it is the position of the Bureau that this bill would have an adverse effect upon the national service insurance fund that is presently in existence, and I think under those circumstances it should not go through by unanimous consent. I think this is a matter that probably the House might itself concur with the position of the committee, but it does not seem to me, in view of the position taken by the Veterans' Administration, that this is a proper bill to go through by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANKIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I must object to passing it over without prejudice from day to day and week to week. So, I object to that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and insert a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, today a World War II veteran prior to age 60, upon payment of an additional premium and a showing of good health, may obtain up to $50 per month of disability protection on a $10,000 national service life insurance policy.

This bill would permit the income to be $100 per month upon payment of additional premiums and upon a showing of good health.

World War I veterans today have similar protection up to $115 per month.

Over 40 private insurance companies write this type of protection up to $300 per month.

Veterans' Administration experience on both World War I and World War II policies has been very conservative.

The committee is of the opinion that the proposed disability income provision will continue to be self-sustaining after this bill has been enacted.

Reported by committee unanimously, after full hearing by subcommittee; supported by VFW, DAV, and AMVETS.

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8236) to provide that on and after January 1, 1951, dividends on national service life insurance shall be applied in payment of premiums unless the insured has requested payment of dividends in cash.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another bill that will not cost the Government anything. It is supported by the veterans' organizations and was reported unanimously by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. It has been passed over without prejudice before, and I am going to object to its being passed over at this time. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and include a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 8236 amends the National Service Life Insurance Act to provide that any dividends payable after January 1, 1951, may be accumulated in the National Service Life Insurance Fund, unless the insured requests payment of dividends in cash.

This bill enacts the practice now followed by commercial companies; under present law can be followed on all permanent-type national service life insurance policies.

When any premium is unpaid, this bill would prevent the lapsing of a policy until dividends had been exhausted in payment of premiums.

Dividends accumulated in the fund could be withdrawn at the election of the policy holder and would draw interest.

No additional cost to the Government; no additional liability upon the National Service Life Insurance Fund.

Reported unanimously after full hearing by subcommittee; supported by the VFW, DAV, and AMVETS.

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8235) to amend further the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been carefully considered by the Veterans' Administration and it is supported by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and the AMVETS, or American Veterans of World War II. I submit that it ought not to be carried over from week to week. I object to the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and include some extraneous matter and a statement I have prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 8235 contains 10 sections of technical amendments to the National Service Life Insurance Act.

The bill was thoroughly considered by a subcommittee which held detailed hearings.

Based upon the suggestions of the American Legion, VFW, DAV, and AMVETS. These organizations strongly urged favorable approval.

Generally, the bill seeks to correct certain administrative practices and to give service-connected veterans more leeway in maintaining their insurance.

I will insert in the RECORD at this point a detailed explanation of the bill:

Section 1 authorizes waiver of health requirement as to compensable disability in application for insurance or reinstatement of insurance made prior to July 1, 1951 (present provision expired January 1, 1950, and requires disability must result from performance of active military or naval service).

Sections 2 and 3 extend the time for applying for continuance of $5,000 gratuitous insurance in certain cases to July 1, 1951.

Section 4 permits the commuted value of insurance maturing prior to August 1, 1946, and remaining unpaid at the death of the last person within the permitted class of beneficiaries, to be paid to the estate of the insured.

Section 5 provides that in any case where the insured provided for the payment of premiums by deductions from his service pay or where premiums were paid by the Government, such insurance shall not lapse or be forfeited so long as the insured remained in active service prior to August 1, 1946. This would be true despite the fact that such deductions may not have been deducted because (1) the insured was discharged to accept a commission, or (2) the insured was absent without leave but restored to active duty, (3) the insured was sentenced by court martial and if he was restored to active duty or required to engage in combat or became totally disabled or was killed in combat. Premiums in such cases would be deducted from the proceeds of insurance.

Section 6 provides for application for waiver of premium for total disability on any policy due after October 8, 1940, and prior to date of enactment of this bill; premiums paid during the time in which the waiver is effective shall be applied to payment of subsequent premiums, waiver of premium to cease upon notice sent by registered mail by the Veterans' Administration after the insured ceases to be totally disabled; in the event of the death of the insured without filing application for waiver of premium, beneficiaries may file application for waiver of premiums which were due after date of the death of insured; permits waiver in cases where the premiums are not otherwise waived because the insured died prior to the continuance of the total disability for 6 months.

Section 7 repeals section 602 (r) and is necessary as a result of section 6.

Section 8 authorizes waiver of health requirements in application for disability income coverage until July 1, 1951; existing law permits waiver only until January 1, 1950.

Section 9 protects the veteran or his beneficiary when he had ordered deductions from his service pay or compensation, pension, or retirement pay and when premiums were not paid due to an error on the part of the service department or the VA.

Public 301 of the Seventy-ninth Congress prohibited the issuance of any additional insurance to Philippine veterans. Section 10 continues this ban for any Philippine veteran who might be eligible under this bill.

GIVING MILITARY STATUS TO RUSSIAN RAILWAY SERVICE CORPS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6277) to give discharges to the members of the Russian Railway Service Corps organized by the War Department under authority of the President of the United States for service during the war with Germany.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this legislation is so important it should not be taken up here on the Consent Calendar. It ought to be taken up in the House and thoroughly aired and discussed. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Three objections are required.

Mr. RANKIN and Mr. POLK objected.

The SPEAKER. Three objections are heard, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and include a statement I have prepared on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to give military status to members of the Russian Railway Service Corps, organized in 1917 and sent to Siberia by the War Department for service immediately after World War I.

I have been asked by the American Legion to call to the attention of the House the opposition of the American Legion to this and any similar type of legislation. Previously I have objected to consideration of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the important thing about this bill is that it confers military status and thereby grants compensation, pension, hospitalization, and other veterans' benefits upon civilians. This group has been recognized as a civilian group by the Department of the Army.

It has been the historic policy of the Congress to deny veterans' benefits to any except those who were in the active military and naval forces. I can see no reason for departure from this historic and wise policy. If this bill should be enacted, there would immediately be claims for the Red Cross, YMCA, USO, and other organizations. If the door is opened, there is no logical stopping place.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore again object to this bill, since it confers veterans' benefits upon this civilian group.

PREPARATORY COMMISSION FOR THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5863) for refund of customs duties to the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I object, Mr. Speaker.

AMENDING THE BANKHEAD-JONES FARM TENANT ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7268) to amend the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act so as to provide a more effective distribution of mortgage loans insured under title I, to give holders of such mortgage loans preference in the refinancing of loans on a noninsured basis, to adjust the loan limitations governing title II loans so as to provide more effective assistance to production and subsistence loan borrowers, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to know something about this bill.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Was this a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. PACE. It was reported out unanimously by the committee.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. There was no objection from any quarter?

Mr. PACE. None that I know of.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Will the gentleman explain what is meant by "more equitable distribution"?

Mr. PACE. I will be delighted to do so.

Some 2 or 3 years ago the Congress set up a program, somewhat comparable with the city FHA law under which about $20,000,000,000 has been insured, for the benefit of farm tenants and farm workers, whereby the tenant or the farm worker puts up 10 percent of the normal value of the farm and the remaining 90 percent will be insured. We limited the amount of insured mortgages to $100,000,000 a year. We provided that this $100,000,000 should be distributed among the States on the basis of farm population and farm tenancy, thinking, of course, that the greatest demand would be where the greatest amount of tenancy was.

It has happened now that some States where the tenancy is not the heaviest, for example, Wisconsin, have already run out of insured authority.

This bill would increase the amount of insured mortgages to be issued in any one year to $200,000,000 and would provide that of that amount $50,000,000 can be distributed among the States without regard to the regular formula, that is to say, without regard to the degree of tenacy. Its direct purpose is to aid States like Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, and others, where the demand has exceeded the anticipation of the committee. I think it is very sound legislation. The program has been under way only for about a year and a half and is contributing to what the gentleman from Minnesota and I are so much interested in, and that is the building up of the family-sized farm. That is the purpose of that provision.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice there is no report from the Department of Agriculture nor any from the Bureau of the Budget. What information did the Committee on Agriculture get from the Department of Agriculture with regard to this measure?

Mr. PACE. I believe I can best answer the gentleman's inquiry this way. The Department appeared before the committee in support of the bill and aided quite materially in the preparation of the report on the bill. I am in a position to state that the bill is favorably considered by the Department.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Did the committee receive any information at all from the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. PACE. I regret I canont answer the gentleman.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Can the gentleman give us any approximate idea of the cost or the additional cost, if any, to the Federal Government?

Mr. PACE. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because it gives me the opportunity to explain to the House that this tenant purchase program, during my 14 years in the Congress, is the only program set up by the Congress which is calculated not to cost the Federal Government one penny. Under this program the borrower pays 4 percent interest on these loans which are insured. The lender receives 3 percent of the 4 percent. One-half of one percent is set aside and put in a revolving fund to take care of possible losses in years to come. The other one-half of one percent is set aside in a special fund to pay the cost of administering the program. I should like to repeat, there is no comparable provision in the city FHA loans. It is the only program I know of which has been presented to the Congress and approved by the Congress which is calculated not to cost the Federal Government one single dime.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Will the gentleman state that the bill will be advantageous to the farmer as well as to the lender?

Mr. PACE. It is very acceptable to the lender. I should say there are only some minor provisions in this bill requested by the insurance companies which make or purchase these loans. Under the present law it is provided that whenever the tenant has paid on his loan a sufficient amount to qualify for a Federal Land Bank loan he must apply there. The insurance companies that are buying this paper and are glad to do so said, "We would like to continue to do business with this man. Do not compel him to go to the Federal land bank. If he wants to, let him stay with us, and let us make him the loan at 4 percent."

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, suppose the Bureau of the Budget thinks other than the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] in reference to the cost of this legislation, and suppose the Bureau figures that it will cost the Federal Government something? As a rule you generally get this approval before you put such legislation as this into effect.

Mr. PACE. I am sorry. I do not know that we have the Bureau's approval, but may I say to the gentleman we know there is no comparable provision in the city loans, where a young man can buy a vacant lot and build a home for himself and have it insured at the expense of the Government.

As it has been since the FHA has been established, the man on the farm would have to go to town to live and have a home. We have provided here a method where he can remain on the farm and acquire a family-sized farm of his own, and secure the necessary production loans to set up his farming operations. Those loans are also provided for. I can say to the gentleman that there is no possibility of this program costing one one-thousandth as much as the city FHA loans, under which there have been about $20,000,000 of insurance issued already.

Mr. RICH. You have had public hearings on this?

Mr. PACE. Oh, it is now in effect. The revolving fund is building up to take care of any possible losses. The administrative fund is building up to pay the cost of making and servicing the loans. It should not cost the Government one single penny.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sections of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended (60 Stat. 1062), are hereby amended as follows:

Amend section 4 by striking out the period at the end of said section and adding the following words: "and for the purpose of insuring mortgages there may allotted in any fiscal year among the States and Territories, without regard to farm population or the prevalence of tenancy, such portions of the authorization provided in section 12 (b) not exceeding in the aggregate $50,000,000 as are determined by the Secretary to be necessary to insure mortgages in the States and Territories under this title."

SEC. 2. Amend section 12 (b) by striking from the first sentence the figures "$100,000,000" and substituting in lieu thereof the figures "$200,000,000."

SEC. 3. Amend section 21 to read:

"SEC. 21. (a) The Secretary may make loans to farmers and stockmen who are citizens of the United States for the purchase of livestock, seed, feed, fertilizer, farm equipment, supplies, and other farm needs, the cost of reorganizing the farming enterprise or changing farming practices to accomplish more diversified or more profitable farming operations, the refinancing of existing indebtedness, and for family subsistence.

"(b) No loan shall be made under this section for the purchase or leasing of land or for the carrying on of any land-purchase or land-leasing program. No initial loan to any one borrower under this section shall exceed $7,000 and no further loan may be made under this section to a borrower so long as the total amount outstanding, including accrued interest, taxes, and other obligations properly chargeable to the account of the borrower, exceeds $10,000.

"(c) The terms of loans under this section, including any renewal or extension of any such loan, shall not exceed 7 years from the date the original loan was made.

"(d) No person who has failed to liquidate his indebtedness under this section for 7 consecutive years shall be eligible for loans hereunder until he has paid such indebtedness in full, except that the indebtedness on loans made prior to November 1, 1946, which are being serviced and collected by the Farmers Home Administration, shall not be subject to the limitations of this section until November 1, 1953."

SEC. 4. Amend section 4 (c) by changing the period at the end of said section to a colon and adding the following proviso: "Provided, however, That in the case of mortgage loans hertofore or hereafter insured under this title, the Secretary may at his discretion delay his request for refinancing until the borrower has acquired a sufficient equity in the farm to enable the borrower to obtain a loan on a noninsured basis from the holder of the insured mortgage."

SEC. 5. Amend section 48 by adding at the end of said section the following sentence: "The foregoing requirements shall not preclude establishing the initial annual payment at a date not exceeding two full crop years from the date of the loan where the Secretary determines that farm income sufficient to make the initial payment cannot be readily anticipated at an earlier date, but this provision shall not have the effect of extending the maximum term of any loan."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GRANTING LAND TO THE CITY OF ALBUQUERQUE FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8578) to amend the act of June 9, 1906 (34 Stat. 227), entitled "An act granting land to the city of Albuquerque for public purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes conveyance by the city of Albuquerque. The city of Albuquerque was authorized to purchase the land for certain civic purposes. They are now authorized under this bill to sell part of the land, and the funds to be applied to the same purpose originally planned; that is, park and other civic purposes. In other words, it is using part of the land itself.

Mr. RICH. Did the Federal Government purchase this land in the first instance?

Mr. PETERSON. No. The city of Albuquerque purchased it in the first instance for certain civic purposes. Now they want to sell a part of the land and use the funds derived from that sale for the original purpose.

Mr. RICH. As I understand it, the Federal Government owns this land.

Mr. PETERSON. No, sir. The city owns it now, but the city got it for a park and certain civic purposes, and the city wants to sell half of it and take those funds and put those funds into the original purpose.

Mr. RICH. The Federal Government gave this land to Albuquerque for public purposes, and now the city wants to sell it?

Mr. PETERSON. No. They sold it.

Mr. RICH. Who? The Federal Government?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, to the city of Albuquerque.

Mr. RICH. What does the Federal Government have to do with it, then?

Mr. PETERSON. Because it was sold for certain specific purposes. There was the feeling that perhaps the land was bound by that use; but they want to sell half of the land and then the funds received from the sale of half of the land will be earmarked for the same uses as originally planned.

Mr. RICH. When they got this land from the Federal Government, did they pay anything for the land?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes. They paid for it. On this public area the funds they use will be used to place an auditorium on the same land. Half of the land that we gave them will be sold. In other words, it was originally 640 acres for a park and civic purposes. This would authorize them to sell 320 acres and take the cash and erect an auditorium on the other 320 acres.

Mr. RICH. Has the Department approved this legislation?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes. They approved it and the Budget approved it, and they said it was for a good purpose.

Mr. RICH. Well, perhaps it might be a good purpose, but what I want to know is why the Federal taxpayers that bought this land originally and gave it to the city of Albuquerque do not get the benefit of this sale.

Mr. PETERSON. No. It was sold by the Federal Government.

Mr. RICH. Well, they sold it for a certain purpose, and now you are going to sell it for commercial purpose.

Mr. PETERSON. No. They are going to use the funds from the sale of this land for the same purpose.

Mr. RICH. Why do you not turn it back to the Department from where you got the land?

Mr. PETERSON. They do not need it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN LAWS RELATING TO TIMBER AND STONE ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6861) to repeal certain laws relating to timber and stone on the public domain.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following acts or portions of acts are hereby repealed:

(a) Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, of the act of June 3, 1878 (20 Stat. 89), as amended (43 U. S. C., secs. 311, 312, and 313).

(b) Act of June 3, 1878 (20 Stat. 88), as amended (16 U. S. C., secs. 604, 605, and 606).

(c) With the exception of the first sentence of section 8, all the provisions of said section of the act of March 3, 1891 (ch. 561, 26 Stat. 1099), as amended by the act of March 3, 1891 (ch. 599, 26 Stat. 1093), and subsequent acts (16 U. S. C., secs. 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 611a, and 613).

(d) Act of January 11, 1921 (41 Stat. 1088; 16 U. S. C., sec. 612).

(e) Act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 1015), as amended July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 890; 16 U. S. C., secs. 614 and 615).

SEC. 2. Rights and liabilities existing under the foregoing statutes on the date of the enactment of this act shall not be affected thereby.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLASSIFICATION OF PUBLIC LANDS IN ALASKA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4542) to provide for the classification of the public lands in Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote the orderly development of the public lands in Alaska, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion, on application or otherwise, to examine and classify vacant and unreserved public lands in Alaska and to manage and dispose of such lands for use, occupation, entry, selection, or location in accordance with such classification under applicable nonmineral public-land laws. No right to the acquisition, settlement, occupation, or use of any such land may be secured until after it has been so classified: Provided, That locations, entries, and leases under the mining and mineral leasing laws may be made without regard to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. Upon the classification of land for the type of use and disposition requested by a qualified applicant pursuant to a valid application, the applicant shall have a preference right to enter, select, settle, or locate the land for the purpose specified in his application for classification, and shall be notified thereof by registered mail. Such preference right may be exercised by settlement only if the applicant notifies the district land office of such settlement within 90 days after his settlement. If the Secretary of the Interior does not act upon an application within 2 years of its filing, the applicant automatically shall have the same preference right for the purpose specified in his application even though the land has not been classified. The preference granted by this section may be exercised only within 1 year after notice thereof has been mailed to the applicant, or within 1 year after the right has accrued through failure to act upon the application.

SEC. 3. All entries made and patents issued for lands affected by the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all minerals in the lands so entered or patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

SEC. 4. This act shall not—

(1) affect any existing valid rights;

(2) affect any right of the Territory of Alaska to lands which may be identified by survey after the effective date of this act and which upon the date of the acceptance of the survey by the Director of the Bureau of Land Management would become a part of the school land reservation made by the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1214), for the Territory; or

(3) affect the granting of timber cutting or other permits or licenses, or the acquisition of rights-of-way on, or the lawful passage over, the vacant and unreserved public lands in Alaska.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "2 years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "18 months."

"SEC. 6. (a) The following language in the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat. 1028; 48 U. S. C., sec. 371), which amended the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat. 409), is hereby repealed: 'and provided further that no location of scrip, selection, or right along any navigable or other waters shall be made within the distance of 80 rods of any lands, along such waters, theretofore located by means of any such scrip or otherwise;', as well as the following language: 'and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods shall be reserved from entry between all such claims.'

"(b) The following language in section 10 of the act of May 14, 1898, as amended (30 Stat. 413; 48 U. S. C., sec. 462) is repealed: 'Provided further, That there shall be reserved by the United States a space of 80 rods in width between tracts sold or entered under the provisions of this act on lands abutting on any navigable stream, inlet, gulf, bay, or seashore, and that the Secretary of the Interior may grant the use of such reserved lands abutting on the water front', and the following language is inserted in lieu thereof: 'Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may grant the use of any lands abutting on the water front of any navigable stream, inlet, gulf, bay, or seashore.'

"(c) The following language in the act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 1059; 48 U. S. C., sec. 372), is repealed: 'reserve from sale and entry a space of at least 80 rods in width between tracts sold or entered under the provisions thereof along the shore of any navigable water, and', as well as the following language: 'restore to entry and disposition such reserved spaces and may.'"

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SLUM CLEARANCE, URBAN REDEVELOPMENT, AND LOW-RENT HOUSING IN ALASKA, HAWAII, PUERTO RICO, AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3635) to enable the governments of Alaska, of Hawaii, of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands to authorize public bodies or agencies to undertake slum clearance, urban redevelopment, and low-rent housing activities including the issuance of bonds and other obligations, to amend the low-rent housing enabling statutes for Alaska and Hawaii, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if some member of the committee can explain the bill, including the question of the broadened authority to issue bonds and other obligations?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. This bill is simply to correct certain omissions in the Housing Act of 1949 so as to place the Territories in the same situation as the States in respect to taking advantage of the provisions of the 1949 act in reference to urban development and low-rent housing programs.

There is nothing mandatory about this bill; the Territorial legislatures can follow through or they can fail to follow through; it is simply permissive. In Alaska we have several situations in which this legislation would be of great benefit. At the same time it would be for the people to decide whether they wanted it; the legislation is simply permissive.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. What restrictions now exist, and what restrictions will exist, should this legislation be enacted into law on the issuance of bonds and obligations of the corporate body?

Mr. BARTLETT. That authority, of course, would continue to exist. Under the terms of this bill they could proceed to issue bonds on their own motion for housing purposes.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. In Alaska do you have to submit a bond issue to a referendum of the people in the corporate area?

Mr. BARTLETT. It is always done, uniformly, always.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. That is not interfered with at all?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not in the slightest.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. All the restrictions on the issuance of bonds are still continued?

Mr. BARTLETT. They are continued and not altered by this bill.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this bill had the approval of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and, of course, has the approval of the Housing Administration.

I may also point out that under it there would be no cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. RICH. There will be provided you make obligations that you cannot pay. Suppose the people in these various territories and possessions agree to issue bonds, who is going to be responsible for the issuance of those bonds?

Mr. BARTLETT. The local agencies, the people of the several territories, not the Federal Government; it is an obligation upon the people of the territories concerned.

Mr. RICH. Is not the Federal Government supporting these territories?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not in respect to the payment of bonds. All our bonds are locally issued, issued by the municipality concerned. In the case of Alaska we have never defaulted on any single bond issue and never will, of course, for the people want to discharge their obligations.

Mr. RICH. I understand the Federal Government will not have any obligation so far as the payment of these bonds is concerned?

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no obligation on the Federal Government to repay the bonds under the terms of this proposed legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Territorial Enabling Act of 1950."

TITLE I—SLUM CLEARANCE AND URBAN REDEVELOPMENT IN ALASKA, HAWAII, AND PUERTO RICO

SEC. 101. The governments of Alaska, of Hawaii, and of Puerto Rico, each acting through its legislature, may create a public corporate authority or authorities and may authorize such authority or authorities or any other public corporate authority or any municipal corporation or political subdivision, acting directly or through any officer or agency thereof or through a public corporate authority, to undertake slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects and to do all things, exercise any and all powers, and to assume and fulfill any and all obligations, duties, responsibilities, and requirements, including but not limited to those relating to planning and zoning, necessary or desirable for receiving Federal assistance under title I of the Housing Act of 1949 (Public Law 171, 81st Cong.), or any other law, except that public corporate authorities (as distinct from municipalities or political subdivisions) created or authorized to operate in accordance with this act shall not be given any power of taxation or any power to pledge the full faith and credit of the people of the Territory, or municipality, or political subdivision, as the case may be, for any loan whatever. The Legislatures of Alaska, of Hawaii, and of Puerto Rico may, with respect to any public corporate authority or authorities empowered or which may be empowered to undertake slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects, provide for the appointment and terms of office of the members thereof, and for the powers of such authorities, including authority to accept whatever benefits the Federal Government may make available for slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects, and authority, notwithstanding any other Federal law, to borrow money and to issue notes, bonds, and other obligations of such character and maturity, with such security, and in such manner as the respective legislatures may provide. Such notes, bonds, and other obligations shall not be a debt of the United States, or of any Territory or municipal corporation or other political subdivision or agency thereof other than the public corporate authority which issued such notes, bonds, or obligations, nor constitute a debt, indebtedness, or the borrowing of money within the meaning of any limitation or restriction on the issuance of notes, bonds, or other obligations contained in any laws of the United States applicable to Alaska, Hawaii, or Puerto Rico, or to any municipal corporation or other political subdivision or agency thereof.

SEC. 102. The governments of Alaska, of Hawaii, and of Puerto Rico may assist slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects through cash donations, loans, conveyances of real and personal property facilities, and services, and otherwise, and may authorize municipalities or other political subdivisions to make cash donations, loans, conveyances of real and personal property to public corporate authorities and to take other action, including but not limited to the making available or the furnishing of facilities and services, in aid of slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects.

SEC. 103. All legislation heretofore enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, of Hawaii, and of Puerto Rico dealing with the subject matter of this act and not inconsistent herewith is hereby ratified and confirmed.

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO THE LOW-RENT-HOUSING ENABLING STATUES FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII

SEC. 201. Alaska: (a) The act of July 21, 1941 (55 Stat. 601), is amended to read as follows:

"That the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska may create public corporate authorities to undertake slum clearance and projects to provide dwelling accommodations for families of low income and for persons (and their families) engaged in national-defense activities within the Territory.

"SEC. 2. The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska may provide for the appointment and terms of the commissioners of such authorities and for the powers of such authorities, except that such authorities shall not be given any power of taxation, nor any power to pledge the faith of the people of the Territory for any loan whatever.

"SEC. 3. The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska may authorize such authorities to issue bonds or other obligations with such security and in such manner as the legislature may provide, except as provided in this act. Such bonds and other obligations shall not be a debt of the Territory of Alaska or any political or municipal corporation or other subdivision of the Territory other than such authorities; and such bonds and other obligations shall not constitute a debt, indebtedness, or the borrowing of money within the meaning of any limitation or restriction on the issuance of bonds or other obligations contained in the laws of the United States applicable to the Territory of Alaska or any political or municipal corporation or other subdivision of the Territory.

"SEC. 4. All legislation heretofore enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska dealing with the subject matter of this act and not inconsistent herewith is hereby ratified and confirmed.

"SEC. 5. Powers granted herein shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any powers granted by other law to or for the benefit or assistance of any public corporate authority or municipality."

(b) The title of said act of July 21, 1941, is amended to read as follows:

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL MILITARY PARK (TENN.)

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7675) to authorize the addition of certain land to Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, in the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let us have this bill explained.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to accept in connection with the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park certain lands. All of these lands will be given. None of them will be purchased by the Federal Government at all. It is a gift. It will help this particular area. I may say that the bill has the approval of the local county authorities. There are no funds to be given by the Federal Government at all. This merely authorizes the acceptance of the land.

Mr. RICH. After they get this land, will it cost more for the upkeep of it?

Mr. PETERSON. There will be no additional cost for upkeep because they already have the area down there. This does not contemplate anything additional.

Mr. RICH. Has the Department approved it?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes; and the Budget has approved it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept, as an addition to Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park donations of not to exceed 1,400 acres of land and interests in land situated generally with Moccasin Bend of the Tennessee River lying west of the city of Chattanooga.

SEC. 2. All property acquired pursuant to this Act shall become a part of the national military park upon the issuance of an appropriate order, or orders, by the Secretary of the Interior setting forth the evised boundaries of the park, such order or orders to be effective upon publication in the Federal Register. Lands so added to the park shall thereafter be subject to all laws and regulations applicable to the park.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to recondsider was laid on the table.

In the event that the Secretary shall determine it to be in the national interest, the acquired lands, upon the publication in the Federal Register of an appropriate order of the Secretary of the Interior, shall constitute the Fort Caroline National Historical Park, set apart as a memorial to the founders of the sixteenth century colony of Fort Caroline.

Such historical park, if established, shall be administered by the Secretary in accordance with the act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535), and the act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666).

SEC. 3. In the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the area would be more suitably administered as a State historical park, the Secretary is hereby authorized to transfer title to the land and improvements thereon to the State of Florida: Provided, That the State shall perpetually maintain the area for State historical park use generally in accordance with the plan formulated by the Secretary. In the event that the State shall cease to use the land for historical park purposes, or attempt to alienate the lands, title thereto shall revert to the United States. Before acquiring any lands as provided in section 1 hereof, the Secretary shall secure from the State of Florida a statement of its willingness to accept and administer the lands in accordance herewith in the event that the Secretary shall determine that the lands should be administered by the State.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF BONDS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8706) to provide for the purchase of bonds to cover officers and employees of the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill would call for an annual expenditure of more than a half million dollars and it appears to be one that might be quite controversial. At least, it is involved and would change the policy of the Government in regard to the bonding of employees. I believe it is entirely too complicated a bill to be considered on the Consent Calendar; therefore I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this legislation originated in one of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. The Hoover Commission found that there were approximately 558,000 Federal employees under bond and that the annual premium expenditure amounted to about $2,000,000, while the annual losses approximated $230,000.

The Public Accounts Subcommittee, working in close collaboration with practically all of the departments and agencies of the Government, including the Bureau of the Budget and the General Accounting Office, made a study of the existing cumbersome and expensive procedure for bonding employees of the Government and found that there are 1,103,000 Federal officers and employees—including 515,000 temporary employees of the Post Office—who are required to furnish surety bonds in connection with the performance of their official duties. The premiums paid for surety bonds by these employees for 1949 amounted to $1,685,779.90, while the recoveries from the surety companies for the same period amounted to $207,303.70. This is an expensive operation for our Government because under existing law over 1,000,000 individual bonds are required to be written and maintained. The committee found that by using blanket and position schedule bonds the number could be reduced to about 20,628 and still provide the same protection. Through this large reduction in bonds it was ascertained that the premium rate could be reduced to $960,000. In this connection the surety companies offer a discount of 6⅔ percent where the bonds are paid for 2 years in advance. That brings the cost down to $890,000. The bill provides for competitive bidding, which makes a further possible reduction of approximately 10 percent, and that brings the cost down to $801,000. In addition, there are administrative expenses of approximately $300,000 that the Government has to pay annually to keep these bonds current. In this instance, the Government is paying $300,000 a year simply to handle the records on these bonds, to be sure that the penal amount involved is correct, and that the surety company is on the approved list of the Treasury Department. We will save that $300,000 administrative expense by this bill and that brings the premium cost down to $500,000. In addition to that we will receive from the surety companies approximately $225,000 in recoveries, that is, the annual losses every year. Therefore, instead of half a million dollars in premium cost as shown by the committee report, the annual net cost should not exceed $275,000.

While it is expected the passage of the bill will result in a small initial cost, the committee believes this is a wise expenditure because in return the Federal Government will receive insurance against fraud, negligence and dereliction of duty of its employees. It will also receive the tremendous benefits of deterrence against mishandling of the Government's enormous fiscal and property operations which naturally flows from coverage by commercial bonds.

The bill has the approval of the Comptroller General as well as the Bureau of the Budget. It is supported by numerous other departments and agencies of the Government and by various employee organizations.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In view of the gentleman's explanation and the fact that it does not wholly agree with the report of the committee—and I am not questioning the accuracy of the gentleman's explanation—I am convinced by what he has said that it is entirely too complicated, I am sure, to be considered on the Consent Calendar, and therefore I renew my request, Mr. Speaker, that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

TRADE-MARK REGISTRATIONS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8792) to amend the statute relating to certificates of trade-mark registrations.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of subsection (a) of section 7 of the act of Congress approved July 5, 1946 (ch. 540, 60 Stat. 427; U. S. C., title 15, sec. 1057a), is amended by striking out "contain the statement of the applicant," so that said second sentence reads as follows: "The certificate shall reproduce the drawing of the mark, and state that the mark is registered on the principal register under this act, the date of the first use of the mark in commerce, the particular goods or services for which it is registered, the number and date of the registration, the term thereof, the date on which the application for registration was received in the Patent Office, and any conditions and limitations that may be imposed in the grant of the registration."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, beginning of line 10, insert "the date of the first use of the mark."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN NEW YORK STATE LANDS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5003) to authorize War Assets Administration or its successor to reimburse the people of the State of New York for certain lands at Manhattan Beach, Kings County, N. Y., in pursuance of an agreement between the people of the State of New York and the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this bill is about.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill provides for an exchange of lands. Two parcels of land are in dispute; 36 acres occupied by the maritime station at New York and 14 acres formerly occupied by a Coast Guard station, since abandoned. Both New York and the United States make claim to these 50 acres or important portions thereof. The end effect of the bill is that the United States Government gets 36 acres of land and the State of New York gets 14 acres of land, the latter to be used for a public park. The 36 acres that the Government receives is part of the maritime station up on Manhattan Beach, in the Rockaway Inlet, on Long Island. There has been considerable controversy between the State of New York and the United States as to the title to those lands. By this bill the United States acquires full and undisputed title to its present maritime station, in return for which the United States Government gives to New York full and undisputed title to these 14 acres. The 14 acres have been declared surplus. They were formerly used, in part, as a Coast Guard station, which has since been abandoned. The Housing and Home Finance Administration has jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. RICH. Why was not this bill referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and let them make an investigation of the War Assets Administration lands?

Mr. CELLER. Because this bill involves a compact, a treaty, between the State of New York and the Federal Government, and that is why it goes to the Committee on the Judiciary. The matter was gone into very carefully. All departments are agreed that the bill should be passed. There was no objection to it. There was a unanimous report of the subcommittee, a unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary, and a unanimous report by all departments involved.

Mr. RICH. Who checked up for the benefit of the Federal Government on the action that is being taken now by the War Assets Administration; what department of Government?

Mr. CELLER. The Maritime Commission, the Housing and Home Finance Administration, the Office of the Attorney General, the War Assets Administration. Also the office of the attorney general of the State of New York and the commissioner of parks of the State and city of New York.

All departments involved are agreed that the bill should be passed.

Mr. RICH. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas a dispute has arisen between the United States of America and the people of the State of New York as to the title to certain lands at Manhattan Beach, Kings County, New York, formerly under the waters of Rockaway Inlet and now filled in, and which said lands comprise approximately 50 acres, lying south of the high water line as the same existed in 1878; and

Whereas approximately 36 acres of said land are now occupied by the United States Maritime Commission as and for a permanent maritime training station; and

Whereas the balance of said land, approximately 14 acres, lies within the former United States Coast Guard training station and together with the other lands formerly comprising the whole of said former United States Coast Guard training station are now under the jurisdiction of War Assets Administration as surplus property; and

Whereas the United States of America is desirous of obtaining from the people of the State of New York a cession of exclusive jurisdiction over all of the lands now occupied by the United States maritime training station, including the 36 acres claimed by the people of the State of New York; and

Whereas the laws of the State of New York preclude consent to a cession of jurisdiction over such lands until such time as the United States of America is possessed of a clear and complete title thereto; and

Whereas the Attorney General of the United States and the Attorney General of the State of New York have endeavored to reach an amicable settlement of the aforementioned dispute through the exchange of the lands claimed by the State of New York and now occupied by the United States Maritime Commission for the lands formerly occupied by the United States Coast Guard training station and now held as surplus by the War Assets Administration; and

Whereas upon the consummation of such settlement the people of the State of New York shall consent to a cession of exclusive jurisdiction over all of the lands now occupied by the United States Maritime Commision as and for its maritime training station; and

Whereas it has been determined that such proposed amicable settlement cannot be consummated due to lack of authority in War

Assets Administration to execute a deed of conveyance to the people of the State of New York, to the said land comprising the former Coast Guard area and now held as surplus: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby determined and declared to be in the public interest that the dispute between the United States of America and the people of the State of New York as to such title be settled amicably and that the United States of America obtain from the people of the State of New York a cession of exclusive jurisdiction over all of the area now occupied by the maritime training station, and the Administrator of War Assets Administration or its successor is hereby authorized to execute and deliver to the people of the State of New York a deed to so much of the lands formerly occupied by the United States Coast Guard training station at Manhattan Beach, as are now under the jurisdiction of War Assets Administration as surplus property; in exchange for a grant of all of the right, title, and interest of the people of the State of New York in and to the land now occupied by the United States Maritime Commission as and for a maritime training station; and be it understood that upon consummation of such settlement through the exchange of such lands the people of the State of New York shall consent to a cession of exclusive jurisdiction to the United States of America over the land so granted by the people of the State of New York.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all before the enacting clause and insert the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized to convey to the State of New York all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any real estate (except buildings and improvements thereon under contract of lease between the Public Housing Administration and the State of New York) at Manhattan Beach, Kings County, N. Y., formerly used by the United States Coast Guard and at present under the jurisdiction of the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

"(b) The conveyance authorized by subsection (a) shall be made only (1) in exchange for a conveyance by the State of New York to the United States of all right, title, and interest held or claimed by that State in or to any real estate at Manhattan Beach under the jurisdiction and control of the United States Maritime Commission or the Administrator of General Services, and (2) when the Attorney General of the United States is given assurances satisfactory to him that the State of New York will cede to the United States appropriate jurisdiction over all lands at Manhattan Beach under the jurisdiction or control of the United States Maritime Commission or the Administrator of General Services."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the exchange between the United States and the State of New York of certain lands and interests in lands at Manhattan Beach, Kings County, N. Y."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ST. ELIZABETHS HOSPITAL

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2227) to amend the act approved July 18, 1940 (54 Stat. 766; 24 U. S. C., 1946 ed., sec. 196b), entitled "An act relating to the admission to St. Elizabeths Hospital of persons resident or domiciled in the Virgin Islands of the United States," by enlarging the classes of persons admissible into St. Elizabeths Hospital and in other respects.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved July 18, 1940, entitled "An act relating to the admission to St. Elizabeths Hospital of persons resident or domiciled in the Virgin Island of the United States," is amended as follows:

(a) Clauses (1) and (2) of the first paragraph of such act are amended to read as follows: "(1) Persons who are permanent residents of the Virgin Islands of the United States and who (A) are citizens or nationals of the United States or nondeportable aliens and (B) have been legally adjudged to be insane in the Virgin Islands or while temporarily in another insular possession or a Territory of the United States or in the continental United States; and (2) persons who are present in but not permanent residents of the Virgin Islands and (A) have been legally adjudged to be insane in the Virgin Islands, (B) are citizens or nationals of the United States or nondeportable aliens, and (C) are persons whose legal residence in one of the States or Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia it has been impossible to establish."

(b) The second paragraph of such act is amended to read as follows:

"Upon the ascertainment of the legal residence of persons who have been transferred to St. Elizabeths Hospital and who are not permanent residents of the Virgin Islands, the Superintendent of the hospital shall transfer such persons to their respective places of residence, and the expense of transfer shall be paid from the appropriation for the support of the hospital."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3582) to authorize revision of the procedures employed in the administration of certain trust funds administered by the Veterans' Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs explain the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill establishes special deposit accounts at each Veterans' Administration station in which would be collected personal funds of patients and funds due incompetent beneficiaries.

It is a change from central administration in Washington to field administration with expected savings in time and service to veterans and their dependents.

Its passage has been urged by the Veterans' Administration and that recommendation has been concurred in by the Department of the Treasury, General Accounting Office, and Bureau of the Budget. There is no cost involved.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Does this involve the individual trust funds of the veterans themselves?

Mr. RANKIN. No; it does not involve trust funds. It relates to personal funds of the patients and funds due incompetent beneficiaries.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Is the officer who is in charge of these funds bonded?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, he is bonded.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all cash balances in the personal funds of patients and the funds due incompetent beneficiaries' trust funds administered by the Veterans' Administration, and all moneys hereafter received which are properly for deposit into these funds, may be deposited, respectively, into special deposit accounts with the Treasurer of the United States for credit to the several disbursing officers of the Division of Disbursement, Treasury Department, and such balances and deposits shall thereupon be available for disbursement for properly authorized purposes without covering into the Treasury of the United States and withdrawal on money requisitions: Provided, That when any balances have been on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States for more than 1 year and represent moneys belonging to individuals whose whereabouts are unknown, they shall be transferred and disposed of as directed in the last proviso to subsection (a) of section 20 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act of 1934, as amended (31 U. S. C. 725s).

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8619) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a Department of Medicine and Surgery in the Veterans' Administration," approved January 3, 1946, to provide for the appointment of dental specialists, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, we are to have legislation up here today relative to establishing a Department of Health. Is this bill in opposition to the bill that is coming up later today?

Mr. RANKIN. No. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill, H. R. 8619, merely authorizes the appointment of dental specialists in the same manner and under the same conditions as now apply to medical specialists in the Veterans' Administration. Such specialists would be appointed only after they had met the requirements of an American Specialty Rating Board, and would thus be eligible for the 25-percent allowance in addition to the basic pay, but in no event to exceed $12,000 per annum.

The passage of this bill is urged by the American Dental Association. The Veterans' Administration advises that the maximum cost would be $15,000 a year.

Mr. RICH. Has the Veterans' Administration approved this legislation?

Mr. RANKIN. They have no objection to it. I cannot say that they favor it, but they have no objection to it.

Mr. RICH. What I am trying to get at now is, if this legislation goes through, will it not interfere with the President's reorganization plan to set up a Department of Health?

Mr. RANKIN. It will not affect it in any way.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that there is no report from the Veterans' Administration or the Bureau of the Budget concerning the enactment of this bill.

Furthermore it is not in accord with the program of the President. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Michigan is wrong about there being no report. The report from the Veterans' Administration is in the report itself and you will find it on page 2.

Mr. FORD. I believe it is in regard to a different bill, I might say to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The report is on two bills, but on the same subject. It is the same subject matter.

Mr. FORD. Nevertheless, this bill is not in accord with the program of the President; is that not correct?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; that is what the report says.

Mr. FORD. Nevertheless, and despite the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXCLUSION FROM THE MAIL OF INDECENT, OBSCENE, AND LASCIVIOUS MATTER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8767) to authorize the exclusion from the mails of all obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, or vile articles, matters, things, devices, or substances, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will somebody explain why we need this bill? Is there not adequate legislation at the present time? Under what authority is such offensive matter controlled?

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, under existing law the Postmaster General has the right to return mail that is obscene, lewd, or lascivious that is sent under a false, assumed, or fictitious name; but under the present law he does not have authority to return obscene, indecent literature that is sent by a person under his own true name, or by some corporation. This bill merely amends existing law so as to give the Postmaster General the right to return obscene and scurrilous letters or literature of any kind sent by a person under his true name, or under some corporate name.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Under what authority is he presently returning material of that kind?

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. He has no authority now to return obscene matter when the sender uses his true name or a corporate name. He cannot return it under the present law unless it is sent under a false, assumed, or fictitious name. That is the purpose of this bill. It is to give the Postmaster General that authority.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, upon evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster General that any person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association is obtaining, or attempting to obtain, remittances of money or property of any kind through the mails for any obscure, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, or vile article, matter, thing, device, or substance, or is depositing or is causing to be deposited in the United States mails information as to where, how, or from whom the same may be obtained, the Postmaster General may—

(a) instructing postmasters at any post office at which registered letters or any other letters or mail matter arrive directed to any such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, or to the agent or representative of such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, to return all such mail matter to the postmaster at the office at which it was originally mailed, with the word "Unlawful" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such mail matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe; and

(b) forbid the payment by any postmaster to any such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, or to the agent or representative of such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, of any money order or postal note drawn to the order of such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, or to the agent or representative of such person, firm, corporation, company, partnership, or association, and the Postmaster General may provide by regulation for the return to the remitters of the sums named in such money orders or postal notes.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "obscure" and insert the word "obscene."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8816) to provide for the conveyance of certain hospital supplies and equipment of the United States to the city of Gulfport and to Harrison County, Miss.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to convey without consideration to the city of Gulfport, Miss., a municipal corporation, and to the Board of Supervisors of Harrison County, Miss., acting for and on behalf of the supervisors' districts Nos. 2, 3, and 4, and the New Hope, Poplar Head, and West Creek election districts of supervisors' district No. 5, all in Harrison County, Miss., for use in the Memorial Hospital at Gulfport, Miss., all of the personal property and equipment the use of which was granted to the city of Gulfport, Miss., and the county of Harrison, Miss., by a revocable permit executed for the United States on August 19, 1947, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRESERVING COMPENSATION AND LEAVE BENEFITS FOR POST OFFICE CUSTODIAL EMPLOYEES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4709) conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts to hear, determine, and render judgment upon claims arising out of certain blasting operations on the Merrimack River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts to hear, determine, and render judgment upon any claim against the United States for damages sustained as a result of blasting operations conducted on the Merrimack River during the year 1937 in connection with the prosecution of a flood-control project under the supervision of the Army engineers.

SEC. 2. In the determination of such claims, the United States shall be held liable for such damages, and for any acts committed by any of its officers or employees, to the same extent as if the United States were a private person.

SEC. 3. Suit upon such claims may be instituted at any time within 1 year after the enactment of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings for the determination of such claims, and appeals from and payment of any judgment thereon, shall be in the same manner as in the cases of claims over which such court has jurisdiction under the provisions of paragraph "twentieth" of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 11, strike out "paragraph 'twentieth' of section 24 of the Judicial Code", and insert in lieu thereof "section 1346 of title 28, United States Code."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CALIFORNIA WORLD PROGRESS EXPOSITION

The Clerk called the resolution (H. J. Res. 434) providing for recognition and endorsement of the California World Progress Exposition.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of this resolution?

Mr. McKINNON. This is right down your line of thinking. The exposition at San Diego will stand on its own feet and will not cost the Government any money at all.

Mr. RICH. Well, what is it you want?

Mr. McKINNON. What we want is endorsement so that our representatives may go to Europe and abroad to other foreign countries and bring them over to participate in the exposition.

Mr. RICH. Are we to pay the expenses of those people to come here to participate in the expositon? We usually do pay for everything.

Mr. McKINNON. It is not going to cost you or the Government one penny. That is why I say this bill is right down your alley, because it is not going to cost the Government any money at all.

Mr. RICH. You are not asking the Government to assist in financing this fair?

Mr. McKINNON. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the city of San Diego, Calif., with formal approval and endorsement of the State of California, has stated its intention to build and present the California World Progress Exposition in the year 1953; and

Whereas in 1915–16 and again in 1935–36 the city of San Diego did successfully hold international expositions that contributed to the development of the Nation and the western empire; and

Whereas the city of San Diego has, since 1915, perpetuated, maintained, and continually improved the buildings, grounds, landscaping, and facilities in which said expositions were held; and

Whereas said facilities have been supplemented by the people of San Diego and placed in readiness and are available for the presentation of the California World Progress Exposition in 1953; and

Whereas the California World Progress Exposition will define the economic and political "freedoms of choice" enjoyed under our democratic system, and will demonstrate these freedoms of choice through exhibits and events portraying better designs for living in the United States and everywhere in the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested, by proclamation or in such other manner as he may deem proper, to grant recognition to the California World Progress Exposition, its date, theme, and purpose, and to invite the participation of the nations of the democratic world in the celebration.

DISPOSITION OF REMAINING GOVERNMENT LOTS AT ST. MARKS, FLA.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8028) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of the remaining Government lots in the town site of St. Marks, Fla.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may dispose of the remaining public land within the Government town site of St. Marks, Fla., established by the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 664), as amended by the act of March 9, 1928, (45 Stat. 254), under the provisions of Revised Statutes, sections 2381 and 2382 (43 U. S. C., secs. 712 and 713).

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill add a new sentence as follows: "Further, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer to the State of Florida, as a historic site, such lands surrounding and including Fort San Marcos, in such town site, as may be acquired by the Secretary through exchange of the public lands, to be disposed of by this act, for patented lands of equal value."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

REDEFINING THE UNITS AND ESTABLISHING THE STANDARDS OF ELECTRICAL AND PHOTOMETRIC MEASUREMENTS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 441) to redefine the units and establish the standards of electrical and photometric measurements.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are we going to do now? Make new units, new standards of electrical measurements and so forth?

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the statutes governing the Bureau of Standards and related activities of the Bureau of Standards have not been changed in half a century. Various professional organizations of engineers who are interested in this field have come to the Secretary of Commerce and asked that certain legal definitions be changed. It is purely a technical bill. It has been recommended by the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of the Budget, the Bureau of Standards, and by scientists in the field. It is a technical bill purely and simply.

Mr. RICH. Would it change the definitions now established insofar as to create a difference of opinion or turmoil in the standards that are used?

Mr. BIEMILLER. Only those standards will be accepted that are agreed upon by the scientists and engineers.

Mr. RICH. And the Department recommends this legislation?

Mr. BIEMILLER. It is a departmental bill and a purely technical measure.

Mr. RICH. We are changing so many things nowadays that we do not know just where we are. That is the reason I am interested to find out just what some of these changes may be. Remember we even changed Thanksgiving at one time for a period.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the date this act is approved, the legal units of electrical and photometric measurement in the United States of America shall be those defined and established as provided in the following sections.

SEC. 2. The unit of electrical resistance shall be the ohm, which is equal to one thousand million units of resistance of the centimeter-gram-second system of electromagnetic units.

SEC. 3. The unit of electric current shall be the ampere, which is one-tenth of the unit of current of the centimeter-gram-second system of electromagnetic units.

SEC. 4. The unit of electromotive force and of electric potential shall be the volt, which is the electromotive force that, steadily applied to a conductor whose resistance is 1 ohm, will produce a current of 1 ampere.

SEC. 5. The unit of electric quantity shall be the coulomb, which is the quantity of electricity transferred by a current of 1 ampere in 1 second.

SEC. 6. The unit of electrical capacitance shall be the farad, which is the capacitance of a capacitor that is charged to a potential of 1 volt by 1 coulomb of electricity.

SEC. 7. The unit of electrical inductance shall be the henry, which is the inductance in a circuit such that an electromotive force of 1 volt is induced in the circuit by variation of an inducing current at the rate of 1 ampere per second.

SEC. 8. The unit of power shall be the watt, which is equal to 10,000,000 units of power in the centimeter-gram-second system, and which is the power required to cause an unvarying current of 1 ampere to flow between points differing in potential by 1 volt.

SEC. 9. The units of energy shall be (a) the joule, which is equivalent to the energy supplied by a power of 1 watt operating for 1 second, and (b) the kilowatt-hour, which is equivalent to the energy supplied by a power of 1,000 watts operating for 1 hour.

SEC. 10. The unit of intensity of light shall be the candle, which is one-sixtieth of the intensity of on square centimeter of a perfect radiator, known as a "black body," when operated at the temperature of freezing platinum.

SEC. 11. The unit of flux of light shall be the lumen, which is the flux in a unit of solid angle from a source of which the intensity is 1 candle.

SEC. 12. It shall be the duty of the National Bureau of Standards to establish the values of the primary electric and photometric units in absolute measure, and the legal values for these units shall be those represented by, or derived from, national reference standards maintained by the National Bureau of Standards.

SEC. 13. The act of July 12, 1894 (Public Law No. 105, 53d Cong.), entitled "An act to define and establish the units of electrical measure," is hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, lines 10 and 11, strike out "National Bureau of Standards" and insert in lieu thereof "Secretary of Commerce."

Page 3, lines 14 and 15, strike out "National Bureau of Standards" and insert in lieu thereof "Department of Commerce."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FUNCTIONS AND ACTIVITIES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2046) to provide authority for certain functions and activities of the National Bureau of Standards, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That funds now or hereafter appropriated to the National Bureau of Standards shall be available for the following activities: (a) The purchase, repair, and cleaning of uniforms for guards; (b) the repair and alteration of buildings, and other plant facilities; (c) the rental of laboratory and office space in the District of Columbia and in the field; (d) the purchase of reprints from trade journals or other periodicals of articles prepared officially by Government employees; (e) the furnishing of food and shelter without repayment therefor to employees of the Government at Arctic stations or other stations located outside the continental United States; and (f) in the conduct of observations on radio propagation phenomena in the Arctic region, the appointment of employees at base rates established by the Secretary of Commerce which shall not exceed such maximum rates as may be specified from time to time in the appropriation concerned, and without regard to the civil service and classification laws and titles II and III of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1945.

SEC. 2. Within the limits of funds which may be appropriated therefor, the Bureau is authorized to make improvements to existing buildings, grounds, and other plant facilities, including construction of minor buildings and other facilities in the District of Columbia and in the field to house special apparatus or material which must be isolated from other activities: Provided, That no improvement shall be made nor shall any building be constructed under this authority at a cost in excess of $25,000, unless specific provision is made therefor in the appropriation concerned.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "or other stations located outside the continental United States."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide authority for certain functions and activities in the Department of Commerce, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OMNIBUS MEDICAL RESEARCH BILL

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3943) to amend the Public Health Service Act to support research and training in rheumatism and arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy and epilepsy, and other diseases, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the bill explained.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, there have been some 28 bills introduced in this session of Congress asking that the activities of the National Institute of Health be extended into other fields and to cover other diseases than those for which specific institutes have been created, namely, cancer, heart, mental health, and dental research. The committee in charge saw fit to consolidate those 28 bills into 1 bill.

The House bill simply gives permissive authority to the Surgeon General to set up additional institutes.

The Senate bill made the authority mandatory for two new institutes and gives discretionary power for other institutes.

There is no money involved. Any money that may be needed was earmarked in an amendment to the budget bill that was proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] and which the House adopted.

If this bill passes I purpose to offer an amendment to substitute for the Senate bill the provisions of the House bill, giving us a chance to go to conference on the minor differences between the two bills.

Mr. RICH. There is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. BIEMILLER. It was reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. RICH. And the department approves it?

Mr. BIEMILLER. Yes; the department approves it.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the purpose of this act is to improve the health of the people of the United States through the conduct of researches, investigations, experiments, and demonstrations relating to the cause, prevention, and methods of diagnosis and treatment of rheumatism and arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy and epilepsy, and other diseases; assist and foster such researches and other activities by public and private agencies, and promote the coordination of all such researches and activities and the useful application of their results; provide training in matters relating to such diseases; and develop, and assist States and other agencies in the use of, the most effective methods of prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of such diseases.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ADDITIONAL INSTITUTES

SEC. 2. (a) The heading of title IV of the Public Health Service Act (42 U. S. C., ch. 6A) is amended to read "Title IV—National Research Institutes."

(b) Title IV of such act is further amended by adding immediately after part C the following new part:

"PART D—OTHER INSTITUTES

"ESTABLISHMENT OF INSTITUTES

"SEC. 431. The Surgeon General is authorized with the approval of the Administrator to establish in the Public Health Service one or more additional institutes to conduct and support scientific research and professional training relating to the cause, prevention, and methods of diagnosis and treatment of particular diseases or groups of diseases (including rheumatism and arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, and epilepsy) whenever the Surgeon General determines that such action is necessary to effectuate fully the purposes of section 301 with respect to such disease or diseases. Any institute so established may in like manner be abolished and its functions transferred elsewhere in the Public Health Service upon a finding by the Surgeon General that a separate institute is no longer required for such purposes. In lieu of the establishment of an additional institute with respect to any disease or diseases, the Surgeon General may expand the functions of any existing institute established under this act so as to include functions with respect to such disease or diseases and to terminate such expansion and transfer the functions given such institute elsewhere in the Service upon a finding by the Surgeon General that such expansion is no longer necessary. In the case of any such expansion of an existing institute, the Surgeon General may change the title thereof so as to reflect its new functions.

"ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCILS

"SEC. 432. Upon the establishment of an institute pursuant to section 411, the Surgeon General may, if he finds it necessary, also establish a national advisory council to advise, consult with, and make recommendations to the Surgeon General on matters relating to the activities of the institute. Any such council shall consist of the Surgeon General ex officio, and of 12 members appointed without regard to the civil-service laws by the Surgeon General with the approval of the Administrator. The 12 appointed members shall be leaders in the field of fundamental sciences, medical sciences, education, or public affairs, and 6 of such 12 shall be selected from leading medical or scientific authorities who are outstanding in the study, diagnosis, or treatment of the disease or diseases to which the activities of the institute are directed. Each appointed member of the council shall hold office for a term of 4 years except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term and except that, of the members first appointed, three shall hold office for a term of 3 years, three shall hold office for a term of 2 years, and three shall hold office for a term of 1 year, as designated by the Surgeon General at the time of appointment. None of such 12 members shall be eligible for reappointment until a year has elapsed since the end of his preceding term. Every 2 years the council shall elect one member to act as chairman for the succeeding 2-year period. In lieu of appointment of an additional advisory council upon the establishment of an additional institute or upon expansion of the functions of an existing institute, the Surgeon General may expand the functions of an existing advisory council established under this act so as to include functions with respect to the particular disease or diseases to which the activities of the new institute or the new activities of the existing institute are directed. In the case of any such expansion of an existing council, the membership thereof representing persons outstanding in activities with which the council is concerned may be changed or increased so as to include some persons outstanding in the new activities. Such new council or expansion of an existing council may be terminated by the Surgeon General at, before, or after the termination of the new institute or expansion of the existing institute which occasioned such new council or expansion of an existing council. In the case of any such expansion of an existing council, the Surgeon General may change the title thereof so as to reflect its new functions.

"FUNCTIONS

"SEC. 433. (a) Where an institute has been established under this part, the Surgeon General shall carry out the purposes of section 301 with respect to the conduct and support of research relating to the disease or diseases to which the activities of the institute are directed (including grants-in-aid for drawing plans, erection of buildings, and acquisition of land therefor), through such institute and in cooperation with the national advisory council established or expanded by reason of the establishment of such institute. TOLL ROAD THROUGH WILDLIFE REFUGE LOCATED IN PRINCESS ANNE COUNTY, VA.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7043) to provide for the granting of an easement for a public road or public toll road through the wildlife refuge located in Princess Anne County, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill a question. It is not consistent with the policy of the Roads Committee of Congress to authorize toll roads. This measure once easement is granted to the State of Virginia would authorize the building of a road through a national park to be paid for by toll or otherwise. The question I would like to ask the gentleman is whether or not the laws of the State of Virginia would require that once the road is paid for from tolls it would become a free road to the public?

Mr. HARDY. The situation is that this road will be built in a very sparsely populated area. The State would not be justified in building this road with State funds; therefore the State has authorized a toll road authority to sell bonds. When those bonds are paid the road becomes a toll-free road under State control and operation.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Is that the result of action on the part of the Legislature of the State of Virginia?

Mr. HARDY. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to convey to the Commonwealth of Virginia or to a public toll road authority which may now or hereafter be created by the Commonwealth of Virginia a permanent easement for the construction of a public toll road (together with rights for such other uses as may be customary or necessary in connection with the construction or operation of such a road) through the wildlife refuge located in Princess Anne County, Va., upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, after line 2, insert the following: "Provided, however, That the conveyance authorized by this act shall be made only upon payment to the United States of a sum equal to the value, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of the lands included therein and any such sums shall be credited to the migratory bird conservation fund and shall be available for expenditure in accordance with authorizations relating thereto."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2160) to amend the Public Health Service Act to authorize annual and sick leave with pay for commissioned officers of the Public Health Service, to authorize the payment of accumulated and accrued annual leave in excess of 60 days, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if someone on the committee will explain the bill.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessary because when we passed, during the Seventy-ninth Congress, a comparable bill for officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, we did not take such action for the commissioned officers of the Public Health Service. The bill affects only the commissioned officers of the Public Health Service; it does not affect those under the classified civil service.

It provides basically two things, that any commissioned officer who has over 60 days of accumulated annual leave may be paid for such in cash, as we did with all other officers of the armed services. Secondly, it provides that in the future not more than 60 days may be accumulated, so that in the long run we will be saving money.

There is no money involved, because there is enough money left in the appropriation of the Seventy-ninth Congress to pay the officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps for whatever money will have to be paid out.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I note on page 5 a provision is made to exempt this payment from taxation. It is my understanding that we have in the past exempted some kinds of payment from taxation, but what we are in effect doing here is saying to a person who earns money during vacation, that that money is not going to be taxable, and it seems to me inconsistent, as far as our tax policy is concerned. I am wondering if the gentleman would have any objection to an amendment to strike out the tax exemption feature of this bill.

Mr. BIEMILLER. May I state that the provision is identical with that in the law passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress, but if there is strong feeling about that provision I certainly do not want to endanger the bill by getting into a controversy about it.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. This is merely to equalize the officers in this branch with those in the armed services.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I might say to the gentleman that the tendency is to do away with tax-exempt status. I understand that the bill itself accomplishes a very laudable objective, but I am raising the question as to whether the payments are entitled to a tax-exempt status, and I wonder if the gentleman has any objection to the removal of that exemption.

Mr. SHORT. The others are exempt. Why not have these exempt? Why should there be any difference?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. My point is, Mr. Speaker, that just because we do it in one instance in the Federal Service is no justification for an extension of that principle. We certainly do not exempt from taxation the income that the average individual gets during vacation time, and that, fundamentally, is the theory involved here. I can see no sense of exempting this income from the income taxes.

Mr. BIEMILLER. In the legislation passed in the Seventy-ninth Congress, which benefited some tens of thousands of people, this tax-exempt provision was in the bill. I repeat again, while I would like to see it stay in the bill, but so as not to endanger its passage, I will not oppose the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman appreciates that the policy recently has been to do away with these tax exemptions granted to different classes and to different groups. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of subsection (c) of section 208 of the Public Health Service Act, as amended (42 U. S. C., ch. 6 A), is amended to read: "In accordance with regulations of the President, commissioned officers of the Regular Corps and officers of the Reserve Corps on active duty may make allotments from their pay."

SEC. 2. Title II of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"ANNUAL AND SICK LEAVE

"SEC. 219. (a) In accordance with regulations of the President, commissioned officers of the Regular Corps and officers of the Reserve Corps on active duty may be granted annual leave and sick leave without any deductions from their pay and allowances: Provided, That such regulations shall not authorize annual leave to be accumulated in excess of 60 days.

"(b) When an officer described in subsection (a) of this section is absent without leave, he shall forfeit all pay and allowances during such absence, unless such absence is excused as unavoidable.

"(c) Except in cases of emergency, no annual leave shall be granted to an officer described in subsection (a) between the date upon which such officer applies for, or the service directs, his retirement, separation, or release from active duty, whichever date is the earlier, and the effective date of such retirement, separation, or release from active duty. If such officer is credited with unused accumulated and accrued annual leave on the date of his separation, retirement, or release from active duty, he shall, in the event that his application for such leave is approved by the Surgeon General, be compensated for such leave in a lump-sum payment on the basis of his base and longevity pay, his allowance for subsistence, and the allowance for rental of quarters whether or not he is receiving such allowance on such date: Provided, That no lump-sum payment shall be made for such unused leave to an officer whose commission expires or is terminated but who, without a break in active service, accepts a new commission, or to an officer who is retired for age in time of war but who is continued on or recalled to active duty without a break in active service, or to an officer who is transferred to another department or agency of the Government under circumstances where, by other provision of law, such leave is transferable.

"(d) For purposes of this section the term 'accumulated annual leave' means unused accrued annual leave carried forward from one leave year into a succeeding leave year, and the term 'accrued annual leave' means the annual leave accruing to an officer during one leave year."

SEC. 3. The foregoing amendments to the Public Health Service Act shall be effective on July 1, 1949. Any officer who, on June 30, 1949, is credited with more than 60 days of accumulated and accrued annual leave, shall be compensated for such leave in excess of 60 days, but not exceeding 120 days, in a lump-sum payment on the basis of his base and longevity pay, his allowance for subsistence, and the allowance for rental of quarters to which he would be entitled as an officer not assigned to Government quarters, under provisions of law in effect on June 30, 1949, except that the preceding provisions of this sentence shall not be applicable to an officer who has, prior to July 1, 1949, been placed on terminal leave preceding separation, retirement, or release from active duty. All amounts received pursuant to this section shall be exempt from taxation.

SEC. 4. Funds appropriated by the act of August 8, 1946 (60 Stat. 910), to enable the President to carry out the provisions of the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946, are hereby made available for carrying out the provisions of section 3 of this act and may be allotted to the Public Health Service by transfer to and merger with appropriations thereof or otherwise, in such amounts as may be determined by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

SEC. 5. Except insofar as the provisions of this act are inconsistent therewith, leave regulations adopted prior to the enactment of this act, pursuant to the Public Health Service Act, shall remain in effect until repealed, amended, or superseded.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "(c)" and insert "(b)."

Page 3, strike out lines 1 through 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "sum payment on the basis of his basic pay, his allowance for subsistence, and the allowance for rental of quarters whether or not he is receiving such allowance on such date: Provided, That the number of days upon which such lump-sum payment may be computed shall not exceed 60 days: Provided further, That no lump-sum payment shall".

Page 3, strike out beginning with line 18 down through line 8, on page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. (a) Sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be effective on July 1, 1950.

"(b) Any officer who on June 30, 1949, was credited with more than 60 days of accumulated and accrued leave shall be compensated for so much of such leave as exceeds 60 days but does not exceed 120 days, in a lump-sum payment on the basis of the base and longevity pay, the allowance for subsistence, and the allowance for rental of quarters (whether or not he was receiving such allowance on such date), which were applicable to him on such date under provisions of law then in effect: Provided, That there shall be deducted from the number of days upon which such lump-sum payment is otherwise authorized to be computed the number of days of leave in excess of 30 days taken during the period from July 1, 1949, to June 30, 1950. Payments authorized pursuant to this subsection shall be due and payable on July 1, 1950, and shall be exempt from taxation.

"(c) The provisions of this act shall not be applicable to an officer who has, prior to July 1, 1950, been placed on terminal leave preceding separation, retirement, or release from active duty."

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

SEC. 2. Section 8 of the act of January 19, 1942, as amended (33 U. S. C. 852b), is further amended by deleting the words "Director or" where they appear in the first proviso of said section.

With the following committee amendment:

DISTRICT JUDGE IN PENNSYLVANIA

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FULTON. Reserving the right to object, may I ask what this bill does on the transfer of judgeships? How does it affect the western district of Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALTER. It in no wise affects any of the districts. We have one roving judge, which position was made necessary due to the fact that we were short two judges in Philadelphia in the eastern district. Those judges were provided, but now the roving judge will become a permanent judge in the middle district.

Mr. FULTON. It does not affect the district judgeships that are there in Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALTER. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved July 24, 1946 (ch. 600, 60 Stat. L. 654), be, and it hereby is, amended to read as follows:

FISH RESTORATION AND MANAGEMENT PROJECTS

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return for immediate consideration to Consent Calendar No. 564, the bill (H. R. 6533) to provide that the United States shall aid the States in fish restoration and management projects, and for other purposes. At the time the bill was called, I asked for an explanation and then requested that the bill be passed over without prejudice, since no one responded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to cooperate with the States through their respective State fish and game departments in fish restoration and management projects as hereinafter set forth: No money apportioned under this act to any State, except as hereinafter provided, shall be expended therein until its legislature, or other State agency authorized by the State constitution to make laws governing the conservation of fish, shall have assented to the provisions of this act and shall have passed laws for the conservation of fish, which shall include a prohibition against the diversion of license fees paid by fishermen for any other purpose than the administration of said State fish and game department, except that, until the final adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature held after passage of this act, the assent of the governor of the State shall be sufficient. The Secretary of the Interior and the State fish and game department of each State accepting the benefits of this act shall agree upon the fish restoration and management projects to be aided in such State under the terms of this act, and all projects shall conform to the standards fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of this act the term "fish restoration and management projects" shall be construed to mean projects designed for the restoration and management of all species of fish which have material value in connection with sport or recreation in the marine and/or fresh waters of the United States and include—

(a) such research into problems of fish management and culture as may be necessary to efficient administration affecting fish resources;

(b) the acquisition of such facts as are necessary to guide and direct the regulation of fishing by law, including the extent of the fish population, the drain on the fish supply from fishing and/or natural causes, the necessity of legal regulation of fishing, and the effects of any measures of regulation that are applied;

(c) the formulation and adoption of plans of restocking waters with food and game fishes according to natural areas or districts to which such plans are applicable, together with the acquisition of such facts as are necessary to the formulation, execution, and testing the efficacy of such plans;

(d) the selection, restoration, rehabilitation, and improvement of areas of water or land adaptable as hatching, feeding, resting, or breeding places for fish, including acquisition by purchase, condemnation, lease, or gift of such areas or estates or interests therein as are suitable or capable of being made suitable therefor, and the construction thereon or therein of such works as may be necessary to make them available for such purposes, and such preliminary or incidental costs and expenses as may be incurred in and about such works; the term "State fish and game department" shall be construed to mean and include any department or division of department of another name, or commission, or official or officials, of a State empowered under its laws to exercise the functions ordinarily exercised by a State fish and game department.

SEC. 3. To carry out the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated an amount equal to the revenue accruing from tax imposed by section 3406 of the Internal Revenue Code, effective October 1, 1941, as heretofore or hereafter extended and amended, on fishing rods, creels, reels, and artificial lures, baits, and flies during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and each fiscal year thereafter. To carry out the provisions of this act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000. The appropriation made under the provisions of this section for each fiscal year shall continue available during the succeeding fiscal year. So much of such appropriation apportioned to any State for any fiscal year as remains unexpended at the close thereof is authorized to be made available for expenditure in that State until the close of the succeeding fiscal year. Any amount apportioned to any State under the provisions of this act which is unexpended or unobligated at the end of the period during which it is availabe for expenditure on any project is authorized to be made available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior in carrying on the research program of the Fish and Wildlife Service in respect to fish of material value for sport and recreation.

SEC. 4. So much, not to exceed 8 percent, of each annual appropriation made in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of this act as the Secretary of the Interior may estimate to be necessary for his expenses in the conduct of necessary investigations, administration, and the execution of this act and for aiding in the formulation, adoption, or administration of any compact between two or more States for the conservation and management of migratory fishes in marine or fresh waters shall be deducted for that purpose, and such sum is authorized to be made available therefor until the expiration of the next succeeding fiscal year. The Secretary of the Interior, after making the aforesaid deduction, shall apportion the remainder of the appropriation for each fiscal year among the several States in the following manner, that is to say, 40 percent in the ratio which the area of each State including coastal and Great Lakes waters (as determined by the Secretary of the Interior) bears to the total area of all the States and 60 percent in the ratio which the number of persons holding paid licenses to fish for sport or recreation in the State in the second fiscal year preceding the fiscal year for which such apportionment is made, as certified to said Secretary by the State fish and game departments, bears to the number of such persons in all the States; but in the event that the licenses to fish in any State are combination hunting and fishing licenses, the number of fishing license holders shall be limited to 50 percent of the number of such combination licenses certified to the Secretary of the Interior by the State fish and game departments: Provided, That such apportionments shall be adjusted equitably so that no State shall receive less than 1 percent nor more than 5 percent of the total amount apportioned to all of the States: Provided further, That where the apportionment to any State under this section is less than $4,500 annually, the Secretary of the Interior may allocate not more than $4,500 of said appropriation to said State to carry out the purposes of this act when said State certifies to the Secretary of the Interior that it has set aside not less than $1,500 from its fish-and-game funds or has made, through its legislature, an appropriation in this amount for said purposes. So much of any sum not allocated under the provisions of this section for any fiscal year is hereby authorized to be made available for expenditure to carry out the purposes of this act until the close of the succeeding fiscal year, and if unexpended or unobligated at the end of such year such sum is hereby authorized to be made available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior in carrying on the research program of the Fish and Wildlife Service in respect to fish of material value for sport or recreation.

SEC. 5. For each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, the Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to each State fish and game department, the sum which he has estimated to be deducted for administering and executing this act and the sum which he has apportioned to each State for such fiscal year. Any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall notify the Secretary of the Interior to this effect within 60 days after it has received the certification referred to in this section. The sum apportioned to any State which fails to notify the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided is authorized to be made available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of the fish-research program of the Fish and Wildlife Service.

SEC. 6. Any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall, by its State fish and game department, submit to the Secretary of the Interior full and detailed statements of any fish-restoration and management project proposed for that State. If the Secretary of the Interior finds that such project meets with the standards set up by him and approves said project, the State fish and game department shall furnish to him such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates therefor as he may require: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior shall approve only such projects as may be substantial in character and design, and the expenditure of funds hereby authorized shall be applied only to such approved projects and if otherwise applied they shall be replaced by the State before it may participate in any further apportionment under this act.

Items included for engineering, inspection, and unforeseen contingencies in connection with any works to be constructed shall not exceed 10 percent of the cost of such works and shall be paid by the State as a part of its contribution to the total cost of such works. If the Secretary of the Interior approves the plans, specifications, and estimates for the project, he shall notify the State fish and game department and immediately certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon set aside so much of said appropriation as represents the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such project, which sum so set aside shall not exceed 75 percent of the total estimated cost thereof. No payment of any money apportioned under this act shall be made on any project until such statement of the project and the plans, specifications, and estimates thereof shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 7. REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 27 OF 1950, TO CREATE A DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND SECURITY

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 647) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that debate on the resolution may continue not to exceed 2 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 647) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950, with Mr. McSWEENEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 647) disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950, having considered the same, report unfavorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this proposal to create a new executive department, and I trust that my colleagues will support Reorganization Plan No. 27 by rejecting House Resolution 647 and thereby help in establishing a more effective instrumentality for the essential well-being of our country, a Department of Health, Education, and Security.

In general Reorganization Plan No. 27 creates a new executive department to be known as the Department of Health, Education, and Security. To this new department are transferred all the functions and agencies of the Federal Security Agency. In this fashion, recognition at Cabinet level would be given the fields of health, education, and social security; thus these programs would be placed on a parity with other vital elements of our national economy, such as labor, commerce, and agriculture. If we were to choose a time when the Congress should pass favorably this matter, and if it were left to me who believes in the creation of this department, in the light of past history we could not choose a better time than now.

In the light of past history there could not be a more opportune time for the Congress to consider this matter than the present time. When we consider what happened at the beginning of World War I, when we consider what happened at the beginning of World War II and the great force and influence that were exerted upon this Nation after the declaration of those two great wars and preparing for those wars, when we know of the great work that was done by the Federal Security Agency in aiding our war effort, I said, Mr. Chairman, that we could not render a greater service to this Nation than to create this Department of Health, Education, and Security at this time when once again it seems that this Nation of ours is faced with troubles upon foreign battlefields.

You can go back in your mind and remember the condition of this Nation at the beginning of World War II, you can remember the number of doctors that were needed, you can remember the number of nurses that were needed; you can remember the number of other trained personnel that were needed in the war effort that were furnished by the Federal Security Agency. Suppose at that time this great Agency had Cabinet status during those trying years when the President called together his Cabinet? Certainly there should have been someone at that Cabinet meeting whose duty it was to report to the President the condition of the human resources of this Nation. We made that mistake in those days. But you can see the work that was done by comparing the size of the Federal Security Agency after the war with what it was before the war. Today that agency has 34,000 employees, which reaches into every home and every hamlet in this land. Today it is working in harmony with the States on education, on health, and on security. Certainly as we face these trying times we want to place the head of this agency that is charged with these responsibilities on a rank as a Cabinet member to meet with our President.

So I say to you that the time is opportune to do this in the light of past history. Past history is useful only when you use it as a light to guide your steps in the present and in the future. If you are going to profit by past history, then I say to you that unanimously we ought to vote today to reject this resolution and to establish the Federal Security Agency as a Cabinet status under the title of Health, Education, and Security—health, education, and security that reach down to every home in this Nation. Certainly if we are interested in agriculture, the welfare of cows, certainly if we are interested in promoting business, the time has come, in the light of past history, when we have got to be interested in the human beings and their relationship and their welfare in this Nation of ours.

So, I am saying to you that if we do our duty this day and House Resolution 647 will have been rejected by this Congress, a new department, the Department of Health, Education, and Security, will have been created and the head of it will be given Cabinet status. Now, who are those who oppose it? We had unlimited hearings. We certainly sent out invitations to every Congressman to send in those who wished to testify, whether they were pro or con. As chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, let me ask you as to where the main opposition came from. It came from the same source that should be standing here today advocating this measure, in the light of past experience. The doctors of this Nation are organized; they are against it. They came in and as an organization said they were against it, but when we asked them, "Why are you against it?" they said "Because we want a health department and we are not going to vote for this until we get our health department." That is what they said, and they are concerned only with their own little group.

I know they have canvassed this Congress. I have received letters from them advocating the defeat of this plan, not because they are human beings involved, and more Americans involved under this act than many other departments so far created, but for their own personal profession they want a department of health.

Mr. Chairman, I submit to you that if they want a department of health this has nothing to with it. What we are doing today is taking an existing agency and giving it Cabinet status, because it is entitled to it by every rule that you can apply. Then, if they deserve their department of health, let them come in as all others have come in and let them fight for it. But, no, like a dog in a manger, they stand there; they cannot eat the hay but they will not let the horse eat it because they cannot eat it. That is the position they are taking in this matter. I say to you that if you love your country, I say to you that if you have the welfare of the people of this nation at heart, then you will defeat this resolution and you will let this Presidential plan go into effect. Why should you not let it go into effect?

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES. As I understand, all in the world you are doing here is to put the Federal Security Agency in a Cabinet status; is that correct?

Mr. DAWSON. That is not correct.

Mr. REES. That is about the whole picture, is it not?

Mr. DAWSON. Twice the President has sent down plans to Congress advocating the Hoover Commission recommendations, to make a department of it, but twice the Congress has raised objections, and those objections are met in plan 27. Every objection raised by the Congress heretofore in turning down other reorganization plans has been met in this plan and so, sir, it is not exactly turning the agency over. You turned down one plan because you said you wanted professional men at the head of each of these bureaus. So, the President here gives you professional men at the head, and every objection raised in turning down previous plans has been met in this plan. Now, I wonder what the new objection is that you are going to bring in. You say it does not agree with the Hoover Commission. Well, the other plans did, and you turned them down, but this is a plan that meets every objection that has been raised up to this day by the Congress.

Mr. REES. I am seeking information. I am asking whether this measure that you are advocating today provides for giving the Social Security Agency head Cabinet status. That is right, is it not?

Mr. DAWSON. The head of the new department will have Cabinet status, yes.

Mr. REES. The new department is practically the same as the present Social Security Agency?

Mr. DAWSON. Practically, yes. There are some variations.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Can the gentleman tell us whether this plan as it is now before the Congress conforms with all the recommendations made first by the Hoover Commission, and second by the Citizens Committee which was later formed to put into action the recommendations of the Hoover Commission?

Mr. DAWSON. To answer that question is to answer the question of all those who seek to hide behind the Hoover Commission's report in one breath and fight a plan in the other.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Tell me "yes" or "no." I would like to know.

Mr. DAWSON. The gentleman cannot put words into my mouth. I will answer his question. No; it does not contain a medical administration. The health department is not taken out. The Hoover Commission recommended a health administration. We have before our committee now, and are hearing testimony on it, a bill which, if it is passed by the House, would give you that recommendation. But no President, no Congress, no Senate, can write any one bill that embraces all the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. So you will find them coming in here and saying, "I would be for it but it does not agree with the Hoover Commission recommendations in some detail." The Citizens Committee said that. They said, and I will get the testimony to show it, "If you dropped an atomic bomb it could not change us on our stand. We will not dot an 'i' or cross a 't.' If anything is not word for word with what the Hoover Commission said, then we are not going to take it."

Certainly this Congress will never be governed by some outside agency that has not been charged by the people of this Nation with the responsibility of passing legislation. In the final analysis you are not going to hide behind anything but your actions. I say to those who have made the recommendations of the AMA a part of their policy that the people of this Nation want this legislation. For every doctor there are 300 persons, including many doctors that want this legislation. You set it up in your platform. Your candidate for President said he would create it. Now what holds you from going through with your platform and the words of your then potential President? Thank God, the present President said he would do it, President Truman said he would do it, and today we are here submitting it to the Congress according to the platform and according to the promise of the Democratic nominee for President at the last election.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The only reason we do not want this legislation is that we do not want socialized medicine. We know we do not want to socialize this country.

Mr. DAWSON. There you are. Of course, we do not want socialized medicine. The opposition put that up as a reason why they will not vote for this. There is not a thing in this that can give anybody socialized medicine. You can never have socialized medicine unless the Congress passes the necessary legislation. But why not cross that bridge when you come to it? You know you are merely raising a smoke screen. There will never be socialized medicine in this Nation until the people and the Congress itself passes the necessary legislation, and you know it.

Mr. RICH. The reason that we do not want this is that we are afraid, because you are just starting in, going one step further, one step further, one step further, and the first thing you know you will be there. My colleague from Illinois has been fooled so badly he does not know what it is all about.

Mr. DAWSON. When 1,000 American soldiers over there in Korea were surrounded by 10,000 North Koreans, they were not afraid to face the future. They tried to settle the problem which faced them then.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] states the truth when he says they are opposed to it because of their fear of socialized medicine. Fear—those same gentlemen opposed social security because of that same fear. Those same gentlemen opposed minimum-wage legislation because of that same fear. Those same gentlemen oppose every progressive piece of legislation because of fear. If we were legislating on the basis of fear we would be living in the Dark Ages today.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield to the distinguished member of my committee.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate the courtesy of my distinguished chairman. I want to say to the distinguished majority leader that the public of this country have a right to fear because of the things you have been doing to this Nation. You have it pretty near wrecked now and they have to fear the things you are doing because we and the country at large do not know where we are at now and it is things like that that will wreck this Nation.

Mr. DAWSON. This Nation economically and industrially is in better shape than it ever has been. We are producing more than we have ever produced. Our national income is higher than it ever was, and yet you shout "fear."

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. If we were to follow the leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] much as we like him personally——

Mr. DAWSON. I admire the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. If we were to follow his leadership, this country would certainly be in a tough position.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. How much money will this save?

Mr. DAWSON. I will give you something of a breakdown. In the tabulating department we aim to save $10,000. In the mail service department we aim to save another $25,000. On payroll, leave and retirement we aim to save $15,000. In procurement, storage and issue we mean to save $20,000. On centralization of accounting for the Bureau, and so forth, we expect to save another $30,000. In addition, there are many other areas where savings can be had.

Mr. Chairman, we believe we can do that—and that is just the beginning.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman has been talking about doctors and characterizing them, if I understood him correctly, as dogs in the manger.

Mr. DAWSON. That was merely an illustration from the classics. I did not write that. I am not the author of that expression. That is in the classics—about a dog who would not let these animals eat the hay.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the plan goes through, the doctors will still be treating the sick, will they not?

Mr. DAWSON. If the plan goes through, the doctors will be benefited more than they have ever been benefited by any one piece of legislation in the history of this Nation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And if the plan goes through, then the doctors will be under the control of a politician—the people will suffer.

Mr. DAWSON. The doctors will be just like big business. Big business did not want social security, and now they would not give it up for anything in the world. They are benefited by it.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. O'TOOLE. I do not remember the gentleman from Pennsylvania crying socialism when we made it possible to insure bank accounts.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself just a half a minute to call attention to the fact that I did not quite finish my question to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON]. The proposition was this: the gentleman was talking about the selfishness and the greed of the doctors, but whether the plan goes through or whether it does not, the people of this country who are ill will still be treated by the doctors.

Mr. DAWSON. And they will be paid for it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Just a moment. May I make my statement, please?

The only difference will be if the plan goes through, so far as socialized medicine is concerned, that the doctors will have as a top boss some politician.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I should refer to this or not, but the gentleman from Massachusetts, the majority leader, said that if this had not happened, or that had not happened, we would be in trouble today. Well, I read the paper this morning and I came to the conclusion that we were in trouble today. I am really troubled about the situation in the world today, so I do not believe I would pass that off by saying we would be in trouble.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a brief statement as to why I shall vote for the pending resolution to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 27 to establish a Department of Health, Education, and Security.

In truth, this is not even a reorganization plan. It reorganizes nothing. It would be much more accurate to call it a political-promotion plan for the advancement of socialized medicine. I do not see how anyone can reach any other conclusion.

In my judgment, this plan conforms to none of the objectives of the reorganization act for efficiency and economy. It does not abolish a single agency or function. It does not transfer a single agency or function. It does not consolidate agencies performing similar functions. It does not propose any regrouping of agencies in accordance with their major purposes. It does not eliminate overlapping or duplications.

Instead of reducing expenditures, this plan will lead to increased spending. Instead of less government, this plan proposes more government. Instead of promoting efficiency, this plan will bring about political control in those fields, such as education and public health, where there should be a very minimum of such control.

I ask that you take a good hard look at what this plan actually does. It simply takes all the agencies and their functions now constituting the Federal Security Agency and makes a Department out of the Federal Security Agency. It thereby promotes the Federal Security Administrator, Mr. Oscar Ewing, who incidentally is one of the leading advocates of socialized medicine, to the highly desirable rank of a cabinet officer, with the salary and prestige commensurate with that rank.

By its terms the plan also creates three additional high-salaried positions; an Under Secretary of Health, Education, and Security, an Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Security, and an Administrative Assistant Secretary.

We know from experience with Government budget matters that a host of other jobs to serve these new high rank officers would, in due course, be set up. We also know that each of these new Secretaries would undoubtedly use the power and prestige of their respective offices to try to enlarge upon the various programs that come under their jurisdiction. There is hardly any doubt that Mr. Ewing would use the prestige and influence of his new rank of Secretary in the President's cabinet to promote the socialized medicine program he has been vigorously advocating as Federal Security Administrator.

In more ways than one, Mr. Chairman, plan No. 27 is not a reorganization plan but a political promotion plan, not only for certain individuals but also for the socialized medicine program. If that is not the undisclosed purpose of the plan, I do not know what its purpose possibly could be. The plan not only does not conform to the Hoover Commission recommendations, it runs counter to them.

In a supplemental task force report issued in March of last year, the Hoover Commission gave special consideration to the very question before us in plan No. 27. It definitely recommended that the health activities of the Federal Government not be included in a new Cabinet-level department embracing health, education, and security. On the contrary, it recommended that the health activities be consolidated in an independent agency.

It has been said that at some subsequent date the health functions could be taken out of the proposed new Department. You and I know that if this plan becomes effective, we would never be able to transfer the health functions to an independent agency. Mr. Ewing has publicly expressed his opposition to the establishment of any independent medical administration. Obviously, President Truman has no intention to submit any plan to do this; and obviously if we should attempt to pass legislation to this end, the bill would be vetoed on the recommendation of the new Secretary of Health, Education, and Security.

Unless we reject this plan the important health-promotion activities of the Government will be frozen in a multipurpose department, and as the Hoover Commission task force pointed out, the health functions will be impeded by collateral considerations pertaining to welfare and insurance.

As I stated at the outset, there is nothing proposed by this plan that would affect a much-needed reorganization to effectuate economy and efficiency. The raising of the Federal Security Agency to the status of a Department will not, for example, achieve the improved management that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service recommends in a report it filed last month. This report shows that the Federal Security Agency is now overstaffed. It points out that there is much the Agency can now do by administrative action to accomplish savings and promote efficiency. This plan will not accomplish that objective. On the contrary, it will result in still further increases in personnel and increased expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, we are today faced with a very grave international situation. We do not know what extraordinary expenditures we will be called upon to make for national defense. Even without these unforeseeable financial demands for our own safety, we are now operating in the red and our people are bearing a heavy tax load.

I earnestly urge the House to reject this plan. It will not save a cent. On the contrary, it will add still further to the high cost of government. This we cannot afford.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I hope to bring some light to this subject in the time which has been allotted to me.

In the first place I want to say that this decision today has nothing to do with socialized medicine. It does not change the statutory functions of the three main divisions of the Federal Security Agency one iota. The Divisions of Education, of Social Security, and of Health will continue to function just as they do now within the same statutory authority; so the bringing up of socialized medicine as a smoke screen against this particular plan, in my opinion, is wholly reprehensible.

What is the reason for this plan No. 27? In the first place, for the past 30 years different commissions, such as the Brookings Institution, the Joint Committee on Reorganization in 1924, many Presidents such as President Harding as far back as 1923, have all agreed that the social security agencies which deal with these functions should have Cabinet status, and that is what this plan does. This plan gives to the Federal Security Agency Cabinet status, and it would make the head of that administration a Cabinet member. Why is that desirable? It is desirable for many reasons. We have a Department of Labor which is for the purpose of promoting and fostering the welfare of labor in this country. We have a Department of Commerce to foster and promote business in this country. We have a Department of Defense for its obvious purpose. We have a Department of the Interior to serve and promote and preserve our natural resources. Where then is there anything objectionable in having a Department which deals with human beings, specifically with the welfare of human beings, whether it be in the field of education, in the field of health, or in the field of social security? That is what we are trying to do here with plan No. 27; we are trying to give to human beings, the welfare of human beings in these three fields, the same dignity, the same consideration in the eyes of the Nation and in the status of accessibility to the President, in the status of dignity before the people of the United States that we give to the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Natural Resources, and all the other Cabinet status Departments.

This is not anything new; this has been recommended for 30 years by impartial organizations, by practically every President from President Harding on up to the present President, including ex-President Hoover, who in his testimony before the Senate committee specifically said that these functions that are now in the Federal Security Agency should have the dignity of Cabinet status.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman will, of course, admit that the recommendation of the Hoover Commission was for the creation of a united medical administration apart from this Cabinet status.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That is exactly right. I will ask the gentleman if he will answer me the question: Would he vote for a united medical administration in face of the known views of every veterans' organization and practically every other organization in the country?

Mr. HALLECK. The fact of the matter is the issue before us is whether or not these health functions shall be joined with the other functions.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The gentleman has not answered the question. They are already joined. In the present status they are joined in the Federal Security Agency and they are not changed by this plan. So the gentleman has evaded the question. He does not want to say he will vote for a united medical administration but he will use that as an excuse for not voting for this plan.

Mr. HALLECK. Let me point out to the gentleman that in the last session you had legislation to create this new department. You did not bring it up because you knew you did not have a majority of the votes to pass it. The question today is whether or not there will be 218 here to vote against this plan. We are passing on this plan today and I propose to vote against it.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I know the gentleman would vote against plan No. 27 but I want to say to the gentleman we had a plan, plan No. 1, in 1949 that embodied the substance of the legislation that was reported from the Expenditures Committee. That plan was rejected in the Senate. Why was it rejected? It was rejected on the ground they did not want to put in the head of the Federal Security Agency the authority and the functions and the responsibility of these three different departments.

So the President, in trying to meet the objections that were made at that time, and I can read them to the gentleman, sends us down now a plan which meets those objections and retains autonomous control in these departments. Immediately some of the gentlemen who voted against the plan last time which comprised the organizational set-up of the Hoover Commission report will not vote for this, they say, because it does not comply. What is sauce one day happens to be something else the next day. But you cannot ride both sides of the same horse at the same time.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman who advocates the views of the American Medical Association.

Mr. JUDD. I have not even read the American Medical Association's views on this resolution, but I have been a physician for over 25 years, and my views are based on that experience. I am opposed to this, not because I am a physician but because of what I know as a physician about the conditions essential for good care of the sick. The gentleman from Illinois said that American doctors, like a dog in the manger, have opposed this when actually it is in their own interest. I am glad that the great majority of the American medical profession still is concerned more with the welfare of humanity, than of itself, and does not put its own interest ahead of that of the people and advocate something that it knows would be to the disadvantage, not the benefit of the people. The gentleman says that this bill has nothing to do with socialized medicine. Does he know the opinions regarding socialized medicine or nationalized medicine of most of the top men in the Federal Security Agency, including the present head of it?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Let me say to the gentleman whether I know that or not is immaterial because the appointment of the heads of these different agencies will have to meet Senate approval. If at the time when this department is created these gentlemen do not meet the approval of the majority of the members on the other side of the Capitol they will not be accepted. Also I want to point out this plan makes it mandatory that professional qualification be had by the different heads of these three departments or they cannot be confirmed. That is something which does not exist at present.

Mr. JUDD. Will the gentleman please answer my question as to whether the leading people in the Federal Security Agency, not just Mr. Ewing but the men who run it, are in favor of a nationalized medical system? The gentleman heard their testimony before his committee. Did they not frankly testify before the committee that they did favor such a system?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Whether they did or not does not concern itself with this plan today.

Mr. JUDD. But you can understand why people who are opposed to that type of medical service because they believe it is a step backward instead of forward, hesitate to give such increased power to an agency which they know in advance favors that step.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. If the gentleman from Minnesota has read the plan he knows that no increased power is given to the Federal Security Administrator in a statutory or functional way in either one of the three departments.

Mr. JUDD. It gives it standing, prestige and influence that it does not have now.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The gentleman because he is opposed to a different system of health insurance would deprive the people aided by Social Security and the people aided by education, of a cabinet status administrator, who could plead their case at high level.

Mr. JUDD. No; I would not deprive them of Cabinet status for the two you mentioned. I cannot see why your committee does not take out the health services and bring in a bill for education and security if it wants to. I am for that. I am not in favor of including in the same department the health features because I think it would be bad for the people of the country. It is not the way to get the better medical care you and I both want.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. You cannot set up a separate department for each agency.

Mr. JUDD. That would not be necessary. The medical profession has favored a department of health since last century, but I want at least a United Medical Administration, as the Hoover Commission recommended.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. You cannot have one for education, one for health, and one for security.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is the Department of Education that they fear more, and properly so, because of the fear of control of our schools in our States. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota this question: Does the gentleman think that social-security legislation is socialism?

Mr. JUDD. No.

Mr. McCORMACK. No; but 15 years ago the cry against it was that it was socialism. I was a member of the subcommittee that drafted it and I was on the full committee that reported it out. You took the same opposition then that is being made now to progress, that it was socialism.

Mr. JUDD. Will the gentleman indicate why this proposed plan is progress?

Mr. McCORMACK. What is progress?

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman will admit that we have the best medical standards in the world, and they have been achieved by the medical profession on its own. Why is it progress to scrap that system?

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman know the number of families in America having a family income of $3,000 a year or less? Does the gentleman know that? Does the gentleman think that with a family income of $3,000 or less you can afford a physician when you are sick or seriously ill? Over 40 percent of the families of America have a total family income of $3,000 a year or less and 5,000,000 families in America have a total family income of $1,000 a year or less.

Mr. JUDD. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of socialized medicine?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am in favor of progress.

Mr. JUDD. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of socialized medicine?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am in favor of progress, just like I favor social security against the opposition of your party.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. I want to thank these gentlemen for having used up a large part of my time. The fact that we adopt plan 27 today does not mean that further changes cannot be made. It does not mean that further changes in compliance with the Hoover Commission recommendations cannot be made. If this Congress desires to take the health function out of the Social Security Agency and pass the United Medical Administration recommendation, I assure you that our committee will see that you have an opportunity to vote on the United Medical Administration's recommendations.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I cannot yield further because of lack of time. Now, if the Food and Drug Administration should be taken out and separated into two different departments that the recommendation calls for, I say that you may have opportunity to do that. You have got to take these steps one step at a time. You cannot comply with all of the Hoover Commission recommendations in any one plan, and we have already shown, in making several changes, that we have taken consecutive steps. And, I call your attention to a specific measure. We transferred the Public Roads Administration over into General Services Administration, notwithstanding that it was specified that it should go to the Department of Commerce. Now later on we sent it over to the Department of Commerce. Why? Because we had to take it a step at a time and do that which was administratively possible at that time. So then, when you make the complaint that this does not go all the way with all of the recommendations, you are simply evading the point; you are clouding the issue. You are refusing to go as far as you can go at any one time, and I say that setting this up into a department and giving it departmental status is going as far along the Hoover Commission line as there seems to be any chance of Congress allowing it to go. When you had the opportunity last year to go the whole way as far as organizational authority was concerned, you turned it down. They turned it down in the other body. So this plan comes back making this an executive department but still retaining some autonomous controls, statutory function controls in these different agencies which cannot be interfered with, mark you, unless by an act of Congress, by the present Federal Security Administrator or the man who would take his position.

So I say if you want to be fair, if you want to go along as far as you can go at this time, you will take just a step forward and allow the rest of these issues, which are wholly extraneous and have nothing to do with this issue, to be decided on their merits at the time they are presented.

Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. Is it not true there has been much overlapping, waste, and inefficiency in the way it is carried on at the present time? This reorganization plan is a means of having a coordinating program to make it more efficient.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. This is a means of making the administrative part of the present Federal Security Agency more effective. It allows it in the fields of procurement, staff service, administration, and all the other administrative functions. It allows them to follow out the Hoover Commission recommendation, which is to remove overlapping and inefficiency, and which allows them to make savings in that field. But strictly from the standpoint of compromise with those who have objected, to show that the President wants to go along, that he wants to send down a plan which can obtain the acquiescence of the Congress, he has made certain adjustments which he thought necessary in order to get this plan approved.

Some people that objected to plan No. 1 of 1949 because it gave too much authority to the Federal Security Administrator now object because we retain the authority in separate departments and retain the functional authority there; but we do give the Social Security Administrator the chance to save in the field of administration.

Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. About 12 years ago I introduced a bill calling for a department of health with Cabinet status, but the administration did not seem it advisable and therefore would not consider it. However, I believe it very essential for we all know that the strength of a nation depends greatly upon the health of its citizenry—undoubtedly this reorganization plan will be an improvement over our present situation, nevertheless I still am of the opinion that an independent health department is necessary.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. There have been many bills introduced on that point. When you bring that united medical administration bill to the floor of the House not 20 percent of you will dare to vote for it. You will not dare to put the Veterans' Administration, the Public Health Service, and the military hospital services in one basket. I will challenge you on that, and I will eat my words on it if I have made a mistake.

Mr. Chairman, Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950, proposing the establishment of a Department of Health, Education, and Security, should receive the wholehearted and unanimous approval of this Congress. The objective of plan No. 27—to give Cabinet status to important and related activities of the Federal Government affecting human welfare—has long been sought by persons prominent in American life. Presidents, special commissions, students of government, many Members of this body regardless of party, have recommended such a department numerous times within the last 30 years.

Back in 1923, President Harding proposed a Department of Welfare in a message to Congress. A similar recommendation was made by the Joint Committee on Reorganization in 1924. In 1937, both the President's Committee on Administrative Management and the Brookings Institution, in its report for the Senate Select Committee to Investigate the Executive Agencies of the Government, recommended a Department of Welfare to administer activities in the fields of education, health, and welfare. At least eight comprehensive plans for the reorganization of the executive branch developed by responsible officials and agencies in the last three decades have proposed departmental status for health, education, and welfare activities—six of them proposing to combine all these activities in a single department.

The operating nucleus for such a department was provided in 1939 by creation of the Federal Security Agency, which brought together under one roof many welfare functions scattered throughout the Government. The Reorganization Act enabling the President to set up the Federal Security Agency did not allow the Chief Executive to create a new executive department—otherwise a Department of Welfare in all likelihood would have been established in 1939.

The Reorganization Act of 1945 contained the same limitation respecting the creation of a new executive department. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1946, submitted by President Truman pursuant to the 1945 act, transferred additional functions to the Federal Security Agency. In his accompanying message the President emphasized that the 1946 plan, a second important step in building a central agency for the administration of Federal activities primarily relating to the conservation and development of human resources, should be followed by the third and final step of converting the Federal Security Agency into an executive department. Its size and scope, the importance of its functions, clearly justified departmental status and a permanent place in the President's Cabinet. As the President said:

> The fundamental character of its functions—education, health, welfare, social insurance—and their significance for the future of the country demand for it the highest level of administrative leadership and a voice in the central councils of the executive branch.

This recommendation was repeated by the President in many subsequent messages to the Congress.

The Reorganization Act of 1949 finally gave the President the authority to create a new executive department by reorganization plan. I emphasize this fact because one of the main reasons for striking out the limitation in the latest reorganization act was the anticipated transformation of the Federal Security Agency into a Cabinet department.

As Mr. Herbert Hoover said in testifying on this point:

> There is general acceptance of the idea of such a Department. (Hearings on S. 526, p. 81.)

Thereupon the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, in reporting on S. 526, the reorganization bill, stated at page 7 of its report:

> The bill deletes the prohibitions contained in subparagraphs (1) and (2) of the 1945 act against creation of new executive departments by reorganization plan. At least one agency, the Federal Security Agency, has been established by plan which obviously is of departmental magnitude and importance and should have been designated as an executive department. No good purpose has been served by the old prohibition.

In conference the Senate proposal was accepted as part of the Reorganization Act. Therefore it is plain that the Congress, in framing a reorganization act which, for the first time, allowed the President to create an executive department, had in mind the conferring of Cabinet status on the Federal Security Agency.

In the spirit of this enabling legislation, the very first plan submitted pursuant thereto, Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1949, proposed to reconstitute the Federal Security Agency as a Department of Welfare. This plan was rejected in the Senate. Sponsors of the resolution of disapproval reflected the opposition of those who expressed fear that constituent units of the department, like the Public Health Service, would be subordinated to welfare activities. They also expressed the fear that the professional direction of health and education matters would be vitiated by political considerations if full authority were conferred on the department head to organize and control his department, despite the fact that the Hoover Commission had made this basic recommendation for clear lines of authority and responsibility in all Cabinet departments—a recommendation now in effect for eight separate departments.

In submitting Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950, President Truman made a sincere effort to take account of the major objections to the earlier plan. The name of the new department—Health, Education, and Security—makes it clear that its three main elements will have coequal status. Each of the three principal constituent units, according to the plan, will be headed by a Commissioner appointed by the President with Senate confirmation. These Commissioners must have appropriate professional qualifications. The statutory functions of the units under the Surgeon General and the Commissioner of Education remain unimpaired. These officers will retain their statutory duties and will have the same relationship to the new department they now have to the Federal Security Administrator.

You will recall that Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1946, abolished the Social Security Board and vested its functions in the Federal Security Administrator. The latter thereupon promptly delegated these functions to a professionally qualified Commissioner of Social Security.

Under the present reorganization plan, the professional qualifications of this Commissioner are explicitly guaranteed, as they are for the Surgeon General and the Commissioner of Education. Heretofore, such qualifications were not legally required of the Commissioners of Social Security and Education. In the case of the Surgeon General, it was required that the President select him from the Commissioned Regular Corps of the Public Health Service, but this now becomes discretionary rather than mandatory under the plan, affording a wider opportunity for the selection of a qualified professional head of the Public Health Service.

All three officials of the constituent services in the new department will be uniformly appointed by the President with Senate confirmation, whereas formerly the Commissioner of Social Security was appointed by the Federal Security Administrator.

In specifying that the constituent units of the Federal Security Agency are to be transferred intact to the new department under the present reorganization plan, the President recognized that this arrangement falls short of the Hoover Commission recommendation that the head of each department have full control over its internal organization. However, that proposal, embodied in the 1949 plan, did not find acceptance in the other body. The President acted in a spirit of reasonable compromise in submitting the substitute plan as a large step forward in better organization and in providing the basis for the desired cabinet-status department.

I say "better organization" because the present plan will give the Secretary most of the authority he would have had under the 1949 plan as regards administrative services. Thus he will be able, whenever it will serve the purposes of economy and efficiency, to centralize for the department such services as procurement, budgeting, and accounting. This grant of authority is specifically limited so as not to infringe on the substantive professional responsibilities within the department. Nevertheless, in supplying administrative services common to the various components of the department, the Secretary will have ample opportunities to effect savings. The Federal Security Administrator, in testimony before our committee, cited economies already effected through consolidating library services and integrating the field offices of the agencies now within the Federal Security Agency. He has instituted a survey, now under way, to determine further savings that can be effected if the present reorganization plan takes effect.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, in a recent investigation of the Federal Security Agency, has concluded:

> In the holding-company type of organization like the Federal Security Agency, wherein related activities are placed under common supervision, it seems reasonable to assume that the most promising area for the development of efficiency and economy is in the common administrative staff services. Certainly less resistance would be encountered there and incalculable benefit could accrue from the welding together of these elements into a cogent whole (81st Cong., 2d sess., H. Rept. No. 2457, p. 21).

Not only cash savings but gains in the effectiveness of service are to be expected by the establishment of the new department. The Federal Security Administrator has testified that even more important than the centralization of administrative services, the plan will make possible efficient adaptation to the constantly changing requirements in personnel, procurement of supplies, and the like, occasioned by shifts in the nature and volume of work, organizational patterns, geographical dispersion, and experience.

Reorganization Plan No. 27 accords with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission in the fundamental sense that it confers departmental status upon activities now embraced within the Federal Security Agency. It departs from the recommendations of the Hoover Commission majority in that it does not effect all the organizational changes they recommended, principally the transfer of the Public Health Service from the Federal Security Agency to a United Medical Administration; the splitting up of the functions of the Food and Drug Administration, now in the Federal Security Agency, between the United Medical Administration and the Department of Agriculture; and the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs from the Department of Interior to the new department, which would include the remaining functions of the Federal Security Agency.

The fact that Reorganization Plan No. 27 does not carry out every Hoover Commission recommendation bearing upon the subject cannot fairly be taken as an argument against the plan. Reorganization is a step-by-step process. If we adopt the difficult and unreasonable position that a plan should contain "all or nothing," then we will get nothing in reorganization.

Highly controversial matters are involved in some of the various organizational changes proposed by the Commission.

Several members of the Commission presented rather persuasive arguments why they thought it would be unwise to carry out these changes proposed by the majority. But while there were differences of judgment on the merits of a United Medical Administration, and of shifting around the Bureau of Indian Affairs or the Food and Drug Administration, there was unanimity of opinion on the importance of establishing a new Cabinet department. This is what Reorganization Plan No. 27 proposes to do.

The Members of this House well know that if this plan carried with it the establishment of a United Medical Administration it would have no chance of enactment at this time and for reasons unrelated to the merits of a Cabinet department embracing welfare activities.

By adopting Reorganization Plan No. 27 we do not preclude any further decisions along lines proposed by the Hoover Commission. Through legislation or reorganization plan we can make these other changes when and if they commend themselves as good public policy. Let us proceed to effectuate a public policy which Mr. Hoover and every member of his Commission agreed was good—the establishment of a Cabinet department for important welfare activities.

In fact, we have been proceeding systematically to make a number of organizational changes in the welfare field recommended by the Commission. Thus Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1949 took the first such step in this Congress by transferring the Bureau of Employment Security from the Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor. A second step was taken by plan No. 19 of 1950, which transferred the Bureau of Employees' Compensation and the Employees' Compensation Appeals Board from the Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor. Both of these steps were recommended by the Hoover Commission.

While these reorganization plans removed functions from the Federal Security Agency considered more appropriate for administration within the Department of Labor, other steps have been taken to add functions appropriate to the Federal Security Agency. Thus Reorganization Plan No. 16 of 1950 transferred to the Federal Security Agency the functions of the General Services Administration relating to assistance to local school districts and grants and loans for water-pollution-control projects.

Reorganization Plan No. 27, which we consider today, is another step in the efficient organization of activities now within the Federal Security Agency—a step to give these programs the type of organization and status in the executive branch which their size and importance clearly demand.

The preponderant weight of testimony before our committee was in support of Reorganization Plan No. 27. The objections came mainly from spokesmen for the medical and dental professions and for part of the educational profession. These spokesmen based their objections on the ground that health and educational matters were entitled to separate departmental or agency status. Whatever the merits of these contentions—and I am willing to concede that they have some merit—it requires no elaborate demonstration to show that the creation of three separate cabinet departments at this time is completely impractical.

At some later date, if we decide that health and educational matters warrant separate organizations in the Government, we can establish such departments, just as the Department of Commerce and Labor was divided into two separate departments in 1913.

The Members' attention is called to the fact that claims for separate departmental status in health and education matters were reviewed and disapproved by a Senate committee during the Eightieth Congress, when the Taft-Fulbright bill, S. 140, was under consideration. That bill, as reported out by the Senate Expenditures Committee—Eightieth Congress, first session, Report No. 242—recommended a departmental organization substantially the same as now embodied in Reorganization Plan No. 27. It proposed to create a Department of Health, Education, and Security, including three main bureaus, a Bureau of Health, a Bureau of Education, and a Bureau of Public Welfare, each to be headed by an under secretary. The bill was also amended in committee to provide clearly that no additional functions be given to new department beyond those already authorized in previous legislation. Plan No. 27 also emphasizes that no new programs or functions are conferred.

It is instructive to note that the Senate committee deleted the provisions in the original bill setting forth specific professional qualifications for each of the under secretaries, and expressed its opinion that the President should not be restricted to limited fields in the selection of qualified administrative officers. Reorganization Plan No. 27 is more stringent in that it requires that each of the three unit heads are to be selected on the basis of appropriate professional qualifications.

The Senate committee report took cognizance of the contentions of spokesmen for medical and educational groups that each of these services was so important as to justify separate departmental status. However, the committee saw no likelihood that Congress would establish three separate new departments and pointed out that these would be contrary to economy efforts, and so forth. The committee said:

The basic effort should be to coordinate and consolidate governmental activities into one department particularly where functions are interrelated, in the interest of economy and efficiency of administration (p. 3).

Furthermore, the committee emphasized that the various fields covered in the proposed new Department are in many instances overlapping, and the public interest would better be served by an administration under the one Departmental set-up. Three separate bureaus were included in the bill in deference, as the committee said, to the wishes of the professional groups. Reorganization Plan No. 27, I may note, defers to the same wishes. The committee noted particularly that this formula was designed to encourage the medical groups to establish a comprehensive program within the proposed Department rather than to press their present efforts to create an independent health agency.

The committee report quoted Senator TAFT, a sponsor of S. 140 and related bills, as follows:

It is important that health be separate from welfare, and that they each be separate from education. It is obviously impossible to have three departments, one for each, and it seems to me proper to group them in one Department.

Senator TAFT was also quoted as follows:

I do not think the health people should object to a health agency reporting direct to a Cabinet officer, a man of Cabinet rank, because I see no reason why such a man would not feel equally obliged to take care of health, as he does of welfare.

In the debate on Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1949, Senator TAFT gave further explanation of his position on S. 140 and on the organization of a Welfare Department as follows—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 15, 1949, page 11442:

Two years ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and I introduced a bill to create a new Department of Health, Welfare, and Education, but only because we did not feel there could be three new separate departments. We carefully provided that each one of these functions be placed in an autonomous section under a separate Under Secretary, reporting directly to the Cabinet officer, who was not given a whole raft of secretaries and under secretaries. By statute, we assigned all matters relating to health to an Under Secretary of Health, all those relating to welfare to an Under Secretary of Welfare, and those relating to education to an Under Secretary of Education. We put those departments under those Under Secretaries so they could not be shifted around. We gave, as I said, practically autonomous rights to those three Departments. The Secretary became a representative of those three groups in the Cabinet of the President of the United States, where I think there ought to be someone to speak for health, welfare, and education.

Senator FULBRIGHT likened this internal organization to that of the Military Establishment where organizational integrity of the component services is maintained.

Senator TAFT indicated in this course of debate on the 1949 plan that he would not have objected to a revised plan that would take account of the organizational plan he proposed. He said—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 16, 1949, page 11554:

Mr. President, I may say that if this plan is rejected, the President will still have the opportunity at any moment to submit another plan.

The President has done exactly this. He has submitted another plan—the present one—having scrupulous regard to the organizational arrangements favored by Senator TAFT and other critics of the 1949 plan. I cannot see how any more suitable accommodation could have been devised. The President has acted in a spirit of utmost cooperation, refusing to let differences over organization stand in the way of the new cabinet Department which today commands almost universal endorsement.

Let us act today in that same spirit and approve Reorganization Plan No. 27.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 seconds to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he is in favor of or opposed to socialized medicine.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman addressing that to me? What is socialized medicine?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman declines to answer.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. He is just taking a few words out of the air. He thinks he is wise. He opposed social security, did he not? The gentleman does not answer.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to plan 27. As an educator I have come up through the ranks in the teaching profession. I know the trials and tribulations of the teacher and the school administrator, and I am not going to vote to put Oscar Ewing or any other administrator on their necks. I would take this stand even though a Republican were the administrator of the Social Security Agency today.

Instead of putting the United States Office of Education more firmly under the thumb of one of the departments we should be moving in the other direction. We should be taking the Office of Education out from under the politicians and putting it into the hands of the educators—and they should be real Americans, not just educators.

Plan No. 27 is a step backward in education. It more firmly implants partisan politics in our public-school system. The move should be in the other direction.

I am becoming a little fed up with plans. There are plans for the farmer; there are plans for labor; there are plans for little business; there are plans for minority groups—there are plans for every single group which seems to hold promise of a block of votes.

Not so long ago—out in St. Paul, Minn.—we saw the Brannan plan in operation. That is a plan to corral the farm vote.

Mr. Brannan's boys brought thousands of Department of Agriculture people to a central point to hear the message of the apostle from Washington. County agents and other personnel were brought to hear Mr. Brannan from far and wide—and the expenses were paid by the United States Government.

The United States taxpayer paid the expenses of those who attended this party convention. The United States taxpayer paid the bill to have himself sold a bill of goods.

I look with horror to the day when an Oscar Ewing can order the school teachers and school administrators to assemble to hear the message from above, with the taxpayer paying the bill.

Plan No. 27 is not good for the public-school system of the United States. It gives to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Security the authority to integrate in his office budgeting, accounting, library, legal, and other services and activities of the component agencies of the Department. It gives the Federal Security Administrator—or, as he will be called—the head of the Department of Health, Education, and Security—the authority to transfer personnel, records, and funds of the component agencies of the Department.

That means that the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Security will get the authority to transfer United States Office of Education personnel, records, and funds. In short, plan No. 27 puts the present administration on top of the budget and the personnel of the United States Office of Education.

The Federal Government's role in education should be separate and distinct from partisan political objectives and free and clear of partisan political appointees. It must be surrounded with administrative procedures which will safeguard the educational processes of the United States from partisan politics.

The United States Office of Education should be an independent agency—not a subordinate office of the Department of Health, Education, and Security or any other department or agency.

The United States Office of Education should be headed by a National Board of Education composed of educators selected on a nonpolitical basis. My bill H. R. 8161, provides this procedure. It should not be made a subordinate agency to a politically appointed, politically responsible, and politically ambitious department head.

I believe that the Federal Government must be prepared to promote public education in the United States—but promotion must not mean control.

The Federal Government can aid through research and technical advisory services. The Federal Government can give financial aid to the States—but such assistance must not be accompanied by Federal control.

Plan No. 27, in my opinion, means Federal control of education and health and heads us down the road of more controls and socialized medicine as well as Federal control of education—America wants no dose of this prescription.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this plan No. 27. After reading the resolution adopted by the American Medical Association I think it answers the question more fully than I could in my own words as to why I oppose this plan.

I will enumerate several of the reasons:

First. This plan is in direct conflict with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

Second. It renders more difficult or impossible the creation of a Department of Health at any future time.

Third. It creates a triple holding company, a conglomerate Department of Health, Education, and Security, most of whose work is not related.

Fourth. It will not be a reorganization of administration, but a renaming of an agency admittedly faulty in set-up.

Fifth. It will point toward eventual Federal domination of our voluntary hospital system.

Sixth. It will create a master organization ready and anxious to take over administration of a national compulsory health-insurance program.

Seventh. It will place administration of the Nation's health activities in the hands of a politically appointed secretary with no professional qualifications.

Eighth. It will place direct operation of medical programs in the hands of a surgeon-general who need not be a doctor of medicine.

Ninth. It does not promote economy.

I think it is about time that we began to take stock of just where we stand. It amazed me very much to hear the majority leader [Mr. McCORMACK] say that we are in a better position now than we have ever been before. If I thought that I would admit it, because I like the majority leader personally, but I do not like the things that he stands for. He is too socialistic for me. I am glad that he applauded me on that, because that shows that he thinks I believe thoroughly the things that I say. I am not here trying to criticize somebody, and I do not want to approve things they do if I do not believe in them. I am not two-faced.

I want to ask the majority leader if he thinks we are in such a good position today with the great national deficit that we created this last year, and which this administration has been in the habit of doing for the past 18 years.

A RECORD OF DEFICIT SPENDING, 1931–50

In 18 out of the past 20 fiscal years, the Federal Government has operated at a deficit. In 2 years, 1947 and 1948 the surpluses amounted to $9,173,257,504.

The public debt which was $16,185,308,299, or $131.38 per capita at the close of the fiscal year 1930, has risen to $257,357,352,351 or $1,704.50 per capita. The details of the deficits by years are shown in the table following:

Two years ago, 1947–48, we had a Republican Congress, and, of course, we did not go into the red, but in all the other years we did go into the red.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman asked me a question. Is he going to yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. All right.

Mr. RICH. Make it short and snappy.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, now wait a while. Last year the deficit was due to the Republican Eightieth Congress passing the iniquitous tax bill.

Mr. RICH. Oh, that is a lot of bull that the gentleman has been putting out around here. A bulldozer trying to smooth over the rough and tough spots.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, you do not like to hear it? You do not want to hear it? Wait a little bit. I am not through.

Mr. RICH. Well, you are through.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, you are quitting?

Mr. RICH. I do not yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. RICH. I refuse to yield.

Now, if the gentleman thinks we are in good shape with this situation we have in Korea, where the President of the United States says we are not in war, yet he sends the Army over there, and he is doing everything he can to get us into a fight. That happened in 1919, when the Democratic administration got us into war; and it happened in 1941, when the Democratic administration got us into war. You watch out if we do not have an administration now that will get us into war again. The majority leader is leading them right on as fast as he can.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; I do not yield. It is about time that we took an inventory here. This thing is so terrribly bad that the American people will wake up in a short time and they will find out that instead of having a country where we have our freedom and our liberty and independence, we will have a land of socialism and a land of dictatorship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska, Dr. MILLER.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I think the majority of the Members of Congress want to go along with the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission and by the citizens' committee. I support the Hoover Commission report in order to get some sense brought into the Federal Government and its agencies. I have studied very carefully the proposed measure for putting the Department of Health, Welfare, and Social Security under the Federal Administrator. Four years ago I introduced legislation to create a Cabinet office to handle all health problems.

As I look over the pending measure it does not conform to the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission. I am sure the gentlemen who want this legislation cannot point out where it conforms to the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission.

I do not believe that the hearings will show that anyone from the citizens' committee came before you in favor of the legislation, because it does not conform to the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission. If it did I would like to support it. I am concerned as to whether it will save money, whether we will get a better organization by adopting such legislation. I am convinced that we would not; I am convinced that we would have probably three organizations going in separate ways. It would bring more confusion. It would not save money; it would not be satisfactory to the taxpayer or even to the departments after they were formed. It has been suggested that one Oscar Ewing would head the new Department.

I just read on the ticker tape that Oscar Ewing will probably be a candidate for governor of New York. We might get him out of our hair in Congress if he would do that. I hate to wish him onto New York, but perhaps it would be a more fertile field for him there. I think really that a lot of the opposition coming to this legislation at the present time is due to the fact that a man by the name of Ewing would probably head the plan.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I rise to object to wishing him off on us in New York.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. The ticker tape might be wrong; I noticed one man by the name of Flynn had a conference with the President, and the matter was discussed and the problem was to get a strong ticket in New York. I would prefer him in New York than as a Cabinet member. He is an arch proponent of socialized medicine. He would have the Government do your thinking and planning.

I notice the majority leader was quite disturbed about his stand on socialized medicine. I think that in his heart he is not for socialized medicine; I am sure that he would not stand up here and support it. He asked: What is socialized medicine? I am sure there is not a Member here who does not know what socialized medicine is, and I am sure that he would not bring up that bill called socialized medicine and seriously urge its passage.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Nebraska see the gentleman from Massachusetts on the floor now while the gentleman from Nebraska is asking that question?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Yes; I see him in his seat; he seems discouraged. The Members should relax. Some of the Members got quite excited; I notice the majority leader spoke very loudly and vehemently; I notice that even the chairman of this committee was quite excited. That really is not good for one's blood pressure, since we are dealing with health problems.

I also realize that the question of socialized medicine is high on the agenda on the Democratic platform as is the Brannan farm plan and the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. I suppose they will be brought up between now and the first of August. Those things ought to take preference over the war—or is it a war? It is a police action—a mere police action according to the President—but soldiers are dying in Korea. It seems to me that Congress ought to clear the decks for action and forget about some of these socialistic schemes contained in this plan. We ought to forget about socialized medicine, slum clearance, and other socialistic terms and clear the deck for action, because we are facing some serious times. This resolution should be adopted and the plan rejected. It is just no good.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, Reorganization Plan No. 27, submitted by the President, is not in line with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. In fact, it is in direct conflict with these recommendations.

For example, the Hoover Commission recommended that the Bureau of Employees' Compensation, Employees' Compensation Appeals Board, and the Bureau of Employment Security be transferred to the Department of Labor, and not be a part of this proposed new agency. But here you have them under Health, Education, and Security. That is only a part of it.

This recommendation does not create a Department of Health, but provides in substance that all of the departments of the present Federal Security Agency be given a rank of Cabinet department.

Under the proposal there would be little change in the internal organization of the present establishment. There would be no substantial economies achieved. The approval of this plan will not be a saving to the taxpayers of this country. On the contrary, it will raise the cost of operating the functions now administered by the Federal Security Agency.

The mixture of Government functions dealing with health, education, employment compensation, and security will not result in a reorganization of the Administration.

It is not merely in conflict with recommendations of the Hoover Commission program, but would make the situation more difficult to provide for a real Department of Health.

This plan ignores the fact that health, a direct concern of everyone, is entitled to equal governmental status with labor, or with commerce, or agriculture, or with other activities which directly concern not only a portion of the population, but have separate Cabinet departments. Here is the most important activity affecting all people directly. We should follow the Hoover Commission recommendations and provide for a United Medical Administration that would include the present Health Service. That is the recommendation of the Hoover Commission.

Under the proposal submitted, you would have a sort of triple holding company, a conglomeration of a Department of Health, of Education, and of Security, most of whose work is underrated. This bill would not be reorganization but just renaming an agency already established.

There appears to be only two real purposes that the President and his advisers have in mind in asking for the approval of this plan. First, the plan will create a Federal department whose main operation will dominate medical education, the hospital system of the United States, and take over the administration of a national compulsory health insurance program.

The second purpose of this measure is to raise the salary of the present Administrator, Oscar Ewing, to Cabinet rank. Under this unsound proposal, his salary will be increased from $17,500 to $22,500. The salary of the Under Secretary will also be increased, and there will be three new positions of Assistant Secretary with annual salaries of $15,000 each.

This kind of legislation would place the health activities of this country in the hands of a politically appointed Secretary with no professional qualifications. A Department of Health should be headed by a person highly qualified and trained in his profession. This proposal would not in the slightest degree improve the health and welfare of the American people. As stated in the first place, it would simply give the present Federal Security Administrator Cabinet status and nothing more.

I should also add that the present Federal Security Agency does not have an outstanding record of achievement in dealing with the problems assigned to its jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, no one is more concerned about advancements in the field of health, education, and security than I. In order for the American people to remain strong in this present international crisis, it is essential that adequate measures be adopted to protect their health, to assure equal and extended educational facilities and to make reasonable advances in the field of social security. However, the adoption of plan No. 27 will not achieve these ends. As a matter of fact, the creation of this heterogeneous, disassociated and complicated hybrid of a department of Government will actually retard our achievements in this direction.

Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed and surprised with regard to statements that have been made by Members who have preceded me in their criticism of men and women engaged in the medical profession.

I realize, like other professions, it has its faults. I just cannot believe the membership of this House would intentionally support legislation that would give opportunity for the socialization of the medical profession or any other profession. It is disappointing to find men in high places in the Government who would use their influence in that direction.

Before I close this discussion, I would like to call your attention to a report of a subcommittee of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee of the House, as a result of an investigation made by that committee.

I want to pay tribute especially to the Honorable JOHN BELL WILLIAMS, of Mississippi for his fine leadership in bringing that report to the attention of the House.

The report is No. 2457, and among other things, calls attention to an agency with 34,000 employees, marked with overstaffing and with lack of fixed responsibility and faulty budget structures. The report is not a criticism against the employees of the agency, but of the manner in which it is managed.

Attention is also called to the fact that there is no clear line of responsibility and authority in the agency, and that during the 10-year period from 1940 to 1950 the number of employees increased by 52 percent, while at the same time employees working in personnel offices increased 180 percent. In other words, the total number of personnel employees serving other staff members increased three times. Mr. WILLIAMS also calls attention to the amount of money, the energy and the number of people who are used to propagandize the agency instead of attending to the business that is assigned to the agency. A reading of this report does not recommend the approval of this plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

PLAN NO. 27

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. Is it not a fact that the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, in fact, all of the legitimate veterans' organizations are opposed to this plan No. 27?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is my understanding.

Mr. Chairman, Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950 would elevate the present Federal Security Agency to the rank of a Cabinet department. Thereby, the prestige and power of the Agency which has been in the forefront of the movement for socialistic welfare schemes would be enhanced. There would be little change in the internal organization of the present establishment. No substantial economies would be achieved. The plan does not conform with recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the executive branch of the Government. It is not merely in conflict with those recommendations but would make it increasingly difficult to achieve important parts of the Hoover Commission program.

The plan should be rejected through adoption by the House of Representatives of House Resolution 647.

PROVISIONS OF PLAN

Reorganization Plan No. 27, submitted by President Truman on May 31, 1950, would establish a Department of Health, Education, and Security. All agencies of the Federal Security Agency, together with their respective functions, records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, would be transferred to the new Department.

The Department would be headed by a Secretary of Health, Education, and Security, to be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate and to whom the functions of the present Federal Security Administrator would be transferred. Provision also is made for an Under Secretary and an Assistant Secretary appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate and an Administrative Assistant Secretary appointed, with the approval of the President, by the Secretary under the classified civil service.

Three major bureaus in the new Department would correspond to the three major units of the present Federal Security Agency. The Public Health Service would be headed by the Surgeon General. The Office of Education by the Commissioner of Education, and the Social Security Administration by the Commissioner of Social Security. The three officials would be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate.

The present autonomous powers of the Public Health Service and the Office of Education would be preserved. Powers of the Social Security Administration, now vested in the Federal Security Agency, would continue to be lodged in the head of the Department.

The plan differs from Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1949, which was rejected by the Senate, chiefly in a change of the name of the new Department from Department of Welfare to Department of Health, Education, and Security and in retention of autonomous powers of the Public Health Service and the Office of Education.

DIFFERENCES FROM HOOVER COMMISSION PROGRAM

The only point at which Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950 touches the program of the Hoover Commission is in its creation of a new department. The proposed new department, however, would not be that which was recommended by the Hoover Commission.

A major point of difference from the Hoover Commission program is the inclusion of health functions in a department with education and social welfare.

Another important point of difference is in the lodging in the new Department of the Public Health Service which under the Hoover Commission program would be made a part of an independent United Medical Administration.

Still another vital point of difference is the granting of autonomous powers to bureaus within a department.

The plan for a new department would fall short of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission for a new department in several other respects.

Mr. Robert L. L. McCormick, research director of the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, whose membership is representative of a strong public sentiment for adoption of the Hoover Commission recommendations, testified that Reorganization Plan No. 24 was so much at variance with the Hoover Commission program that his committee could not give its support.

HOOVER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATION FOR NEW DEPARTMENT

The Hoover Commission in a report on social security, education, and Indian affairs recommended a new department to administer functions dealt with in the report. The report dealt with welfare, social security, and education activities but not with health functions. The latter were covered in a separate report on medical activities.

The effect of the recommendation was to propose the elevation of the education and security activities of the present Federal Security Agency to a departmental status. The health functions, however, would be divorced from the present grouping and made a part of the proposed United Medical Administration.

In discussing its recommendation for a new department dealing with education and security, the Hoover Commission said:

American concern over the problems of education, health, relief of the needy, aid to the handicapped, and assistance in unemployment and old age is as old as the Republic. Responsibilities in these fields were initially considered to be those of State and local governments.

With the growth of the Nation, these problems have become wider than local and State boundaries. There is a common interest of all citizens in the education of every citizen. There is a common interest in the advancement of science and in the common dangers from disease. There are obligations to veterans. The problems of unemployment extend beyond State borders. There is generally a recognition of the practical problems which lie in our obligation as "our brother's keeper."

All these circumstances have contributed to bring these problems more and more to the Federal level. In dealing with these matters, except in the case of veterans, the Federal Government has usually sought to preserve the responsibilities of local government and their agencies of administration in effecting the national purpose.

It is not the province of this Commission to pass upon the policies that have evolved in these matters. We are concerned with the efficient and economical organization of the Federal agencies as we find them. The organizational problems of education, health, medical care, assistance to the handicapped and aged, and aid to the unemployed permeate every department of the Federal Government.

There is no perfect organizational arrangement for these functions. Many of them must be performed by specialized agencies like the Veterans' Administration, the Armed Forces, and the Labor Department. As the problems grow, specialization in organization will inevitably grow.

In our report on Medical Services, we have recommended a separate United Medical Administration, reporting directly to the President. That agency would embrace the major hospitalization, medical research, and public health activities of the Government and, by its creation, bring about better medical care, development of medical staff, research, and protection of public health, together with large economies in administration.

In our report on the Labor Department, we recommended the return of several agencies now in the Federal Security Agency to that Department.

There remain, however, certain most important bureaus or agencies relating to education and security which must be organized into a workable department. They are now, with one exception—the Bureau of Indian Affairs—in the Federal Security Agency.

The size of these agencies, after making the changes we have outlined, is somewhat indicated by the fact that they embrace about 20,000 employees. The administrative expenditures would be roughly $50,000,000. The grants-in-aid to be distributed would approximate $800,000,000. For the calendar year 1948, the collections of old-age and survivors insurance approximated $1,688,000,000, and disbursements $550,000,000. The accumulated funds on August 31, 1948, were $10,388,000,000.

While we discuss the educational problems at greater length later, it may be said here that it has long been suggested that the educational activities of the Federal Government should be given independent or Cabinet status. However, the Federal Government is not engaged in direct educational activities except in a small way in the case of Howard University. Its function is that of stimulating educational advancement by research, issuing publications, and making grants-in-aid to the States. The administrative staff required is less than 500 persons.

We believe that the functions, including education, which we propose to assign to this Department have such an important relationship to the formation of the domestic policies of the Government that the person in charge of the functions should be a member of the President's Cabinet.

PROPOSAL FOR UNITED MEDICAL ADMINISTRATION

The Hoover Commission in its report on medical activities recommended establishment of a United Medical Administration into which would be consolidated most of the large-scale activities of the Federal Government in the fields of medical care, medical research, and public health. The purpose was stated to be to eliminate overlap, waste, and inefficiency.

The objectives were stated to be to provide better medical care for the beneficiaries of the Federal Government's medical programs, to create a better foundation for training and medical service in the Federal agencies, to reduce the drain of doctors away from private practice, to provide better organization for medical research, and to promote a better state of medical preparedness for war.

The Public Health Service, including its hospitals and functions, facilities, and personnel, would be transferred to the new agency from the present Federal Security Agency. There would also be included in the United Medical Administration the general hospitals of the Armed Forces in the continental United States, the hospital functions of the Veterans' Administration, and the nonmilitary hospitals in the Canal Zone.

The Hoover Commission in discussing advantages of its plan said:

Only the creation of a new United Medical Administration can remedy the weakness of the present organization and give the leadership, direction, and planning urgently needed. To it would be transferred the Government's major services in the field of medical care, public health, and medical research.

The Nation's vast medical services, which we have noted lack any central plan of operation, require unified responsibility. The Government must have a central plan if waste and inefficiency are to be avoided. The advantages of unification of Federal medical services include the following:

(a) The general standard of Federal medical care would be improved.

(b) There would be a central supervision of the major Federal medical care, public health, and medical research activities. Unified responsibility is the key to good management. The President, the Congress, and the public could look to one man for results.

(c) Construction costs could be standardized and reduced.

(d) Federal hospitals could be utilized to the fullest extent by eliminating present distinctions as to the particular types of beneficiaries for which each can care. After all, a patient is a patient whether he is a veteran, a merchant seaman, or in the Army, Navy, or Air Force.

(e) The medical manpower at the call of the Federal Government could be used to the fullest extent, and present deficits in skilled personnel could be greatly reduced.

(f) The need for any draft of medical manpower in time of peace would be greatly lessened.

(g) The cost of health and medical services would be clearly identified and known to Congress.

(h) The facilities of private hospitals and the skills of physicians in private life and in the universities could be utilized far more effectively than they are now.

SHORTCOMINGS OF PLAN NO. 27

The excerpts from reports of the Hoover Commission showing its reasoning in making a recommendation for creation of a new department dealing with education and security and in proposing a merger of medical activities in an independent agency are pertinent as indicating the shortcomings of Reoganization Plan No. 27.

The proposed plan does nothing at all toward achievement of the objectives of the Hoover Commission in these matters.

Proponents of the plan claim that it does not prejudice future action by Congress toward approval of Hoover Commission recommendations, specifically the creation of a proposed United Medical Administration.

It is significant, however, that Mr. Oscar R. Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, in testifying for the plan, took occasion to express his opposition to the United Medical Administration. Obviously, the increased prestige attaching to the proposed new department would give his views, if he were named to head the new department, greater weight.

At least one witness, in response to a question from a member of the committee, admitted that his support of the President's plan was very largely influenced by the belief that it would mean rejection of the United Medical Administration proposal.

Whether or not this committee and the Congress shall approve legislation creating a United Medical Administration, no step should be taken which would impede such a program unless the evidence of need of the pending reorganization plan is indisputable.

Testimony during the hearings on Reorganization Plan No. 27 has made it clear that support for it comes from groups desirous of building up the power and prestige of the present Federal Security Agency, especially with respect to its social-welfare functions.

It was made clear that some groups concerned with the Public Health Service and the Office of Education were skeptical of any advantages of the plan.

Opposition was expressed by representatives of both the American Medical Association and the American Dental Association. Both of these groups have long advocated creation of a separate Department of Health. Their spokesmen were fearful of subordination of health activities in the proposed Department of Health, Education, and Security. Similarly, a witness for the American Association of University Women objected to the plan, preferring a grouping of educational activities under an independent board. These professional groups all were distrustful of lay administrators who would have Cabinet rank above the professional experts in immediate charge of health or educational functions.

AUTONOMOUS BUREAUS

The reorganization plan by retaining the autonomous character of the Public Health Service and the Office of Education seeks to avoid the opposition of some of those who objected to plan No. 1 of 1949 for a Department of Welfare.

It is true that the status of the powers of these two agencies in a new department would be unchanged from what they are in the Federal Security Agency. The freezing of the powers in a department of higher rank, however, would make it doubly difficult to deal with the situation hereafter.

The Hoover Commission laid stress upon the undesirability of autonomous powers by bureaus within a department. Recommendation No. 14 in its report on General Management of the Executive Branch was that the heads of departments, under the President, should have full responsibility for the conduct of their departments, that there should be a clear line of authority reaching down through every step of the organization and that no subordinate should have authority independent from that of his superior.

The Commission's findings on this subject were as follows:

The line of command and supervision from the President down through his department heads to every employee, and the line of responsibility from each employee of the executive branch up to the President, has been weakened, or actually broken, in many places and in many ways.

This line of responsibility still exists in constitutional theory, but it has been worn away by administrative practices, by political pressures, and by detailed statutory provisions.

SOCIALISTIC TENDENCIES

The present Federal Security Agency has actively promoted socialized medicine and other proposals infringing upon American principles of government.

Undoubtedly the influence of this Agency with the Congress and with the public would be increased by its elevation to Cabinet rank.

The trend toward socialism might be furthered by approval of the reorganization plan.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, discussing the plan for compulsory health insurance, of which Federal Security Administrator Ewing has been the leading advocate, said:

A socialized medicine system would be a big step toward socialism in general. A huge new bureaucracy would be created, and there would be widespread destruction of our voluntary institutions. Not only doctors, dentists, and nurses would be paid—and controlled—by the Government, but countless typists, bookkeepers, and investigators would be required.

The new army of Government workers might number a half million persons or more. It could wield dangerous political power.

The assumption has prevailed that Mr. Ewing would be the President's selection for Secretary of Health, Education, and Security, in the event of approval of the present reorganization plan. Undoubtedly, he would redouble his efforts for socialized medicine.

CONCLUSION

Reorganization Plan No. 27 is the answer to the bureaucrat's prayer. It provides increased power with which to extend the activities, influence, and payrolls of existing agencies, which every bureaucrat seeks. That is virtually all it does.

The plan in scarcely any particular follows any recommendation of the Hoover Commission. Its stated objectives are not those of the Hoover Commission, more efficient organization and greater economy, but rather increased prestige and influence for particular activities. The plan departs from and is in actual conflict with the Hoover Commission program.

In the absence of conclusive evidence to show the need for elevation of the present Federal Security Agency to Cabinet rank, the House of Representatives should reject the plan by approval of House Resolution 647.

The views thus expressed are not only my views but the opinions of all Republican members of the committee as well, and, I am certain, of some Democratic members of the committee.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] stated three or four times that he was in favor of progress. Who is not? But what kind of progress—I do not favor progress toward ruin—which is what his party has been giving the Nation. We can all recall that after World War I the world was in a situation which gave every country involved in it a depression. If memory serves correctly, the candidate for President on the Democratic ticket then had an economy program, a platform which promised that he was going to cut Federal expenditures 25 percent, that he would cut Federal employment 25 percent. The people of this country, realizing that that was the only sound and permanent way out of their then troubles, elected Mr. Roosevelt President by an overwhelming majority. What happened? Although he had promised that we would not repudiate the gold standard, within 6 months we went off the gold standard, devalued every Government bond, and within 6 months we began a course of action which has given us what I assume the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] would call progress. And what has it been? A program of deficit spending. We have had bankruptcy out of it. We have had a foreign policy, if you can call it a policy, which gave us World War II, which has given us world war III. I do not go along with those who say that we are not now in war. It is my understanding that we have not had a declaration of peace or a declaration ending the President's emergency war powers. As a matter of law, we are still at war, still in World War II, and if we are not in an actual fighting war today in Korea, then I know not the meaning of that term. If that is progress, if the history of our country under the Democratic Party, taken over lock, stock, and barrel by the New Dealers and the Fair Dealers, and the Pendergast gang, is a history of progress, then my training has all been wrong. I want none of the gentleman's brand of progress, either for my country or for myself.

The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of our committee [Mr. DAWSON], a very earnest gentleman, in a very vigorous and eloquent way stated that he was in favor of advancing the interests of human beings.

Everyone with a heart, a mind, and a consciousness of his own well-being is not only willing but is anxious that all other people should prosper, be happy, free, and independent. I ask the gentleman, where in all the wide, wide world has either the individual or the people as a whole received greater consideration, had more of the things we all consider good for us or the things we all desire not only in the way of freedom and liberty, but of material prosperity? Where is there a group of people that have made the progress we have made?

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAWSON. After World War I the country was in pretty good condition. The people had a few successive Republican administrations, and we had the greatest depression in the richest country the world has ever seen. Banks failed, people were standing in soup lines and bread lines, and the Nation turned to the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party has been in power ever since because of the fact that it was concerned with human values and not with property values.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. True, we had a depression, and it came because of the war and destruction a Democratic administration under Woodrow Wilson gave us. But if what the gentleman said was all true, which it is not, of course, and which every student of world affairs knows is not an accurate statement of the situation, nevertheless the fact remains that, having been in power, except for two brief years when the Republicans had the House, having been in power since 1933, where are we today? I will not repeat at length; sufficient to say we have had deficit spending, an ever-increasing debt, regimentation, loss of personal freedom, and war—cruel war which wasted our substance, took the lives of our youth, and today men are fighting in far away Korea. Is that progress?

So much for that. Here we are today with this present war. Then the gentleman went on—and I will be very brief because I want one of the members of the Hoover Commission [Mr. BROWN of Ohio] to tell you just how much this plan does not follow the Hoover Commission recommendations—I want to pause here just one moment to pay tribute to the President of the United States who, because of his political sagacity, not only his ability through the distribution of political favors but through his ability to influence legislation, has been able to purchase the votes of first this group and then the other, and so continue himself in power—that is another kind of progress I want none of.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] said, "Who opposes this legislation?" And then he said, "The doctors."

Now, I am not, I regret to say, an extremely religious man. When the sun is shining, when everything is going all right, when I have no aches and pains, money in my pocket, I do not really get down on my knees two or three times a day and call on the Lord for help. I just forget the Lord in the prosperous, happy days, as many individuals and nations have forgotten in the past. But when I have a terrific pain around the region of the heart, when I have something in my stomach, perhaps, or anywhere else, that feels like a hot stone or when it thunders and lightnings and the sky is overcast and the winds roar and the windows rattle and the walls shake, what do I do? I do like the physically big, strong men in this House do, I get frightened, and I call on the Lord to protect me and carry me through.

So it is sometimes—and I mean no sacrilege—that I assume that even my friend from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON], if he gets a pain somewhere, if his food disagrees with him, if he thinks he has been poisoned by something he ate, I venture to suggest that he will call on one of these greedy, dog-in-the-manger, despised doctors to whom he referred for a little physic.

What is the difference between his plan of socialized medicine—I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts is not here. I cannot define socialized medicine for him the way he would like to have me do it. Apparently in spite of all the argument, in spite of all the things that have been said and written, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] does not want to recognize and give a definition of socialized medicine, because when I asked him a very short, simple question, "Are you in favor of or opposed to socialized medicine," what did he say? He comes back at me and says, "What do you mean by socialized medicine?" I am sure he is more intelligent than I. I am sure he knows what I meant. What the people understand is meant by those words.

I wish the gentleman would not speak so disparagingly of the doctors. Knowing as I do, knowing that you, if you have an ache or a pain, are going to call on these doctors, and knowing, as you do know, that, having ill health in this country, people will need doctors, why seek to discredit them? What is the difference between their manner of practice and that proposed by the advocates of socialized medicine?

The only difference is that the doctors there will be under the control of a master politician. Some fellow who knows little of medical science will be telling the doctors what to give and when to give it. Keep on with socialized medicine, and if we should be so unfortunate as to get Dr. Ewing, you may be getting medicine from a veterinarian because you do not know whether they are going to pick that kind of a doctor—a horse doctor or somebody else, to treat your ills.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; briefly.

Mr. DAWSON. Does the gentleman know about the provision in this plan which specifies that the head of the Health Bureau shall have certain professional qualifications?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, yes; I know about that, and I know that no man, no group, no legislative body, can write a law and have it interpreted and administered as it would desire. Experience has demonstrated that.

The Congress legislates but the bureaucrats interpret and administer.

Then—I will not say I was hurt—but our chairman—he is sincere, but I was grieved—I was grieved to hear the gentleman who is a champion of civil rights and who has done so much for the people of his race, from the well of this House make a talk against a group of our citizens. The gentleman from Illinois may in Chicago be acquainted with a different class of physicians than I know.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DAWSON. The gentleman and others have harped upon the fact that I mentioned that illustration of a dog in the manger. The gentleman knows that I do appreciate doctors and appreciate their qualifications. This matter has nothing to do with those qualifications, but only with that attitude as I described it toward certain legislation. No man in this Chamber appreciates the trouble it takes to become a doctor and the long years that are put in in their practice, and the place of a doctor in the community. I have a brother who is a doctor. There is nothing in my remarks or in my thinking which is in disparagement of the profession as such, whether it be a doctor or a dentist or an educator; but so far as the procedures are concerned in opposition to this particular piece of legislation the illustration would aptly apply.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I gather, then, from the gentleman's statement that he does not believe doctors, some of them at least, are honest and sincere and have the good of the people at heart, and when they prescribe and when they give of their time, they are giving not only for what they earn, but because they want to benefit humanity. Does the gentleman agree with me on that?

Mr. DAWSON. I believe that each doctor in his practice and as an individual is honest in his efforts in treating his patients. But I believe as an organized body against this legislation they are against it for selfish reasons.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The doctor I am talking about is the doctor who served in my community and in the communities of all you gentlemen who do not live in the cities—I know only the so-called country doctor, the old-fashioned doctor who gave years to acquire the knowledge of how to treat you when you were ill—the doctor of the old days, of the "horse and buggy" days, the days that you despise, when if the snows were too deep in our community for his sleigh he would wade through on snowshoes, and that is the way he got to you. The doctor who, you might say, gave of his very life's blood to administer to you when you were sick. And now to have doctors criticized—charged with opposing this legislation, solely because of selfishness is just too much for me—have their humanity questioned just because they oppose something which they think would not only perhaps injure them, but would injure the people of this country—to that I cannot subscribe—it smacks too much of class feeling.

I repeat—I am sorry the gentleman brought that up, but I am telling you it is not the doctors in my community that I am listening to—I am listening to the people and I venture the suggestion if you go through your own mail you will find that you have 10 letters or 20 or a 100 letters from the people who are not doctors to every one you have from a doctor, opposing this legislation—the people do not want it—they will not, in my opinion take it. We will be well admired if we follow these demands.

If we listen to our people this plan and the would-be little dictators who would invade your homes will be defeated.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of this resolution to reject this plan, because I have that same fear within my heart that the gentleman from Massachusetts, our distinguished majority leader, made light of a while ago, that same fear that we are placing in the hands of someone whom we do not trust the power that we do not want to have exercised. I cannot see that we should disregard all fear in considering legislation in this House, and throw all caution to the winds, simply because we do not believe in certain legislation. I think that fear is an honest thing, and I think we should take all precaution in every piece of legislation that comes before us. In our opposition to this legislation, based on reasonable fear, we certainly have grounds to oppose it.

I am going to take as my text in the few remarks I shall make a statement made by our chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON], in his remarks in favor of this reorganization plan, when he said that this plan would carry the Federal Government's activities in health, education, and security "down into every home in the land." Yes. He said, "Let us vest this power in this new department to have health, education, and security reach down into every home in the land." Get this straight. Are we going to give Oscar Ewing the power under this resolution to reach down into every home in the land to control the health of the Nation? Are we going to give Oscar Ewing the power to reach down into every home in our land to control the thinking and education of our young? That is exactly what we are doing in giving Oscar Ewing that power. Remember this, the more power over education we place here in Washington, the less may be exercised by our local school boards.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The gentleman wants to be fair, I know. He knows that this plan does not give Oscar Ewing one degree of authority more than he has at the present time. As far as the statutory functions of the Departments of Education, Health, and Social Security are concerned, they are retained in exactly their present function, so the gentleman's fears are groundless on that point.

Mr. LUCAS. Then, may I ask the gentleman why he wants this plan put into effect?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I will not take your time to do that. I took quite a little time to explain my position.

Mr. LUCAS. If you do not want more power to be vested in the chief of this new department, then why do you want the plan put into effect? I think that it is plaintly apparent that it is for the purpose of giving more power to Oscar Ewing. I cannot believe that this is merely a step forward, as someone has said, when we are by this action giving more control over purely local activities to a man, a man whom we evidently do not trust. I cannot follow such reasoning.

Further, if we are going to give the head of this agency the power to reach down into every home in the land, as the chairman of our committee has said, in our social security, and give Oscar Ewing control over that $13,000,000,000 which reposes in the Treasury to take care of our old people, are we not giving him more power than was intended when the Congress set up the social security law?

No. I do not want those powers to go down into every home in the land. I do not want the head of this bureau, whoever he may be, to have the power to go down into every home in the land and control this country and do that which we as representatives of the free citizens of this great Nation do not desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY].

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Chairman, Reorganization Plan No. 27 was designed to and does meet one of the most serious objections that was raised last year against the establishment of a Department of Welfare under Reorganization Plan No. 1. Under that plan the Secretary of Welfare would have been vested with the statutory functions of the Surgeon General including purely professional functions relating to the administration of the Public Health Service. The present reorganization plan is different and clearly safeguards the right of the Surgeon General to exercise all the functions which the Congress has conferred on him. The Secretary will have, as he should have, certain administrative authority over the whole department which should give him the opportunity to effect various over-all economies of operation—and thus increase the efficiency of the various programs. But he is not substituted for the Surgeon General in matters which are outside his competence, as a layman, to decide. This is equally true in regard to the Commissioners of Education and Social Security.

On the other hand, as a Cabinet officer he will establish a direct and continuing channel of communication between these professional fields and the President, and also the heads of the other executive departments. At present there is no such channel. For that reason alone, the establishment of this new department will be an important step forward in the direction which all sound and sensible thinking recognizes we should go.

Much of the misunderstanding of the proposed plan arises from alternative proposals: The first is the Hoover report's recommendation for a United Medical Administration; the second is the medical profession's insistence on a separate Department of Health with a professional man as Secretary of Health.

Nothing in this reorganization plan precludes later action if the Congress sees fit on either alternative proposal when and if the Congress decides to take such action. In his covering message the President said:

> The adoption of this plan will not in any way interfere with further adjustments in the functions of the New Department either by statutory or reorganization plan.

The Expenditures Committee urges plan No. 27 as the best possible way at present to meet the need.

To adopt either alternative measure would require much time and study and the reconciliation of many conflicting opinions. The present plan is offered as a simple, practical "here and now" solution—the most feasible way to give departmental status to the health functions of the Government. The Federal Security Agency is a going concern. Nothing essential is added or subtracted; Federal Security Agency becomes a department of government, coequal with the other departments and with direct representation in the Cabinet.

There are many positive advantages to proceeding on the proposed basis. It would improve and strengthen the health functions of the Public Health Service—giving it added administrative advantages while conserving its basic independence. It would maintain the equality of the Public Health Service with the education and welfare functions of government. Even more to the point, it would preserve the close association with these other activities that is so vitally important. Health authorities recognize that, to be fully effective, medical research and programs for the prevention of disease must be worked out in conjunction with education and welfare programs. From the broadest point of view, all these programs have a single objective: the development and conservation of our human resources.

To attempt to work independently in any of these fields would be to weaken this needed joint effort—not only within the Federal Government but also in States and communities. Local health authorities are working in increasingly closer cooperation with public school authorities and welfare agencies. In this day-to-day activity they recognize there is no real line of separation—that one field of activity reinforces another.

This is the real reason why a separate Department of Health would not be a forward step. To remove the Public Health Service from its present close association with problems of education and security would be to seriously cripple its total effectiveness. A professional Secretary of Health, concerned with purely medical matters, would be very unlikely to have the broad understanding of social and economic problems which a Secretary of Health, Education, and Security should be expected to have. As a Cabinet officer, although functioning well, he would be limited to concentrating solely on matters in his own profession. No provisions for related programs in education and social security would be provided. He could not contribute the broad scope needed in Cabinet consultations.

The importance of giving departmental status to the Federal Security Agency now—through the simple and direct means offered by the President's proposal—cannot be overestimated. Over the past 15 years there has been a dramatic expansion in the services rendered by its Public Health Service. Before the Social Security Act was passed in 1935, the functions of its Public Health Service were confined largely to medical care of seamen and other groups, and to interstate and foreign quarantine services. Since 1935, in addition to the program of assistance to State public health services, Congress has urged development of a vital program of medical research through general health grants to universities and other institutions. Cancer, venereal disease, tuberculosis, mental disease, dental disease—one program after another has been added. All are showing concrete results. In addition, the Federal Security Agency administers a vitally important program of hospital construction sponsored by the Federal Government. And it is embarking on a much-needed program to control water pollution. All this is in addition to its day-to-day work of strengthening local public health services in the fields of sanitation and control of communicable diseases.

All these activities are directly related to the health of this Nation—and the health of this Nation is a matter of private concern. We must take every possible step to improve health conditions in this country. The proposal to create a Department of Health, Education, and Security offers the most immediate and practical way in which we can all work effectively toward this objective.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUCAS] is still in the Chamber, because on page 2, section 6 of the report at the bottom is the following quotation from the plan:

Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the Secretary to transfer or remove from the control of the Surgeon General, the Commissioner of Education, or the Commissioner of Social Security any professional or substantive functions vested in them respectively under the provisions of this reorganization plan or of law hereafter enacted.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAURIELLO].

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Chairman, it is vitally important that the President's Reorganization Plan No. 27 be permitted to become law. This plan gives departmental status to the present Federal Security Agency.

The real significance of the proposal lies in giving official recognition to the fact that the health, education, and social and economic security of our people are matters of supreme importance to the strength and well-being of this country. And they must, hereafter, be considered at the very top level, of direction in our Government.

This is quite different from saying merely that the Federal Security Agency has earned the right to enjoy the prestige of departmental status. The positive advantages which are derivable will extend far beyond such prestige considerations.

A Secretary of Health, Education, and Security would be able to function far more effectively in his job than can the Federal Security Administrator. As a Cabinet officer, he would have a close and continuing contact and interrelation with the President and other top officials of the executive branch. In the give and take of Cabinet discussion he would be able to better present the point of view of his Department and that of his professional associates in the Department who are responsive to the needs of the people in their respective fields. And he would, in turn, be in a better position to pass to his departmental associates the circumstances in the problems of the Nation-problems of economics, of labor, of agriculture, of international relations, and of military security, as brought out in Cabinet discussions by the top officials of the executive departments.

A Cabinet officer can also act as a spokesman for that vast army of men and women who, in State and local agencies and voluntary groups, are working in all the related fields of public welfare. There has never been an effective channel for presenting the special problems of these agencies and groups for top-level administration consideration. This plan would establish and furnish such a needed channel.

Of course, there are many educators who, understandably, would like to see a member of their own profession in the Cabinet as Secretary of Education. Many doctors would like to see a member of the medical profession as Secretary of Health. And I do not doubt that many welfare workers would like to see a professional Secretary of Welfare. But to argue for separate representation in all these fields is to miss the essential point. To my mind, it would serve no useful purpose to have a Cabinet officer occupied solely with matters of education, or one concerned solely with matters of health, or one concerned solely with matters of social and economic security. In addition, it would add to the total of governmental agencies rather than reducing it as persistently urged by the Commission on Organization.

One of the objectives of this new Department will be to emphasize the relationship of all these problems as they touch the day-by-day lives of our people. The Federal Security Agency has already made sound progress in integrating and coordinating the work in these separate fields. I believe that a unified Department of Health and Education and Security which continues this progress will serve well the best interests of the Nation.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BLATNIK].

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman, I think the arguments both for and against this reorganization plan have been pretty well discussed by the committee. It is clear that the opponents of this Reorganization Plan No. 27 have gone to great lengths to confuse the issue and ignore its merits.

This is not a policy issue; it creates no agency; it gives no new functions or powers to existing agencies; it is primarily coordinating in an effective administrative manner scattered agencies that deal with closely related subjects. This is a sound administrative move and I am supporting Reorganization Plan No. 27 and opposing this resolution to turn down this plan.

I support this plan for two reasons. In the first place, it will provide cabinet status to each of these three major functions—health, education, and security—through one secretary and at the same time preserve and guarantee the identity of each function. In this way it gives recognition to the importance of these functions in our society without jeopardizing the separate existence of the Public Health Service, the Office of Education, and the Social Security Administration.

In the second place, this plan will integrate similar functions, coordinate these program activities, and produce greater administrative efficiency and economy of operation.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLATNIK. I yield.

Mr. TAURIELLO. I am as opposed as any other Member of this House to socialized medicine. Can the gentleman show me wherein in this plan there is any semblance of socialized medicine?

Mr. BLATNIK. That is entirely an extraneous issue which has been injected by those who have attempted to confuse this whole matter. There is not an iota of socialized medicine involved in this administrative reform.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. When the debate has been closed, the motion is then that the committee rise and report back to the House; that is the usual and customary motion and does not in any way affect the passage of the resolution itself.

The CHAIRMAN. That is voted on in the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Do I also understand that those who oppose the plan should, when the resolution comes up in the House, vote "aye"?

The CHAIRMAN. In the House their vote would be "aye."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious as this debate has progressed that a great many Members are concerned about the socialization of medicine, and on the defensive side there have been statements calculated to allay the fears of those who might have that concern in respect to this particular measure. For myself, let me say that I am against socialized medicine in any form in which it may be presented or in any guise under which it may masquerade. Also I am opposed to measures which seem to me to be leading us directly on the road to socialization of medicine.

I recognize, as I think everyone does, that we do not have as good medical attention in this country as we would like. We do not have as good schools as we would like. We do not have as many hospitals as we would like; we do not have as many good teachers as we would like, but we are striving always to improve ourselves in that regard. That is the American spirit. But socialization is not the course to pursue if we want to achieve those better goals.

Now, mark it well, your vote on this proposition is going to put you on one side or the other of this great issue of socialization of medicine. I do not think anyone can affirmatively deny that, although I have listened to these other statements.

I suppose it does not make too much difference, but the majority leader made a great point of the vote on the social security measure. I took occasion to get the RECORD out of that day in April 1935 when that measure was before us. As a freshman Member of this body I made a speech for that measure and supported it. There were only 33 votes against it, and I think half of those, as I look over the list and if my memory serves me correctly, were Democrats. So why that phony issue? It is as phony as to say today that everything is good in the country. Well, if it is, the credit cannot go to Mr. Truman and his program, because his program, including socialized medicine, has not been enacted by this Congress. For you folks who support that program to claim credit for anything good in the country today reminds me of the story of the fellow who said he had just saved a man's life. He shot at him and missed him.

The fact of the matter is that the Eightieth Congress cut the cost of government, balanced the budget, had something to apply on the national debt, reduced the people's taxes, brought some equity and fairness into labor-management relationships, and did a lot of other constructive and desirable things. What the Eightieth Congress did was so good that this Democratic Eighty-first Congress has not undone any of it. The good that started to flow from that fine action in the interest of the country is still with us today. So if things are good in the country, if you can forget that we are in a shooting war, if you can forget a lot of things like the $257,000,000,000 debt—forget all those things and say that the country is in good shape—well, the credit goes to those of us who dared to put the program of the Eightieth Congress into effect and those of us who have blocked repeal of that program and prevented the enactment of the radical, socialistic, reckless, ill-timed, and spendthrift proposals that have been sent up from the White House in this Democratic Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. Chairman, specifically on this issue before us today I have sat here and heard lots of Members argue for this measure or that measure that has been turned down by the Congress in times gone by because it was stated it carried out a recommendation of the Hoover Commission. Time and again I have heard that argument. Yet here you are today arguing for a plan that flies right straight in the face of the Hoover Commission recommendations. In my opinion, you cannot blow hot and cold on this.

The gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] stated that if what we do today turns out to be bad we can undo it tomorrow. In substance that is what the gentleman stated. He said we do not have the united medical administration in this program and if putting the health functions in this new department turns out to be bad we can come along with another measure. Then you seek to draw a phony proposition here as to the united medical administration and how we might vote on it. The fact of the matter is the President has not recommended adoption of the Hoover Commission recommendation in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VURSELL].

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to plan No. 27, and I will support the resolution to kill it.

This plan proposed by the President under the guise that he is trying to carry out the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, in fact was condemned by the Hoover Committee. It is contrary to the recommendations of that committee.

One purpose of this plan is to elevate Oscar Ewing, head of the Federal Security Agency, to Cabinet status. It would increase his salary from $17,500 a year to $22,500; it would make necessary three new assistant secretaries at a salary of $15,000 a year; it would greatly increase his power, and might be helpful to him politically as he is now being considered for the nomination for governor on the Democratic ticket in New York.

Another result, if plan No. 27 is approved, would be to put at the head of all Federal educational and medical services, increasing his power and control over medical services, hospitals, and so forth, the great champion of socialized medicine, Mr. Ewing.

It would give him greater power to promote socialism than he has heretofore had, and would place a politician, rather than a medical man, in charge of the Federal Government's present limited control over the health of the people.

It would coordinate three or four great governmental services, bringing them under his control with his power and prestige increased by being elevated to the position of a member of the Cabinet.

He has done too much harm now.

The Government would profit if he was dismissed from the Government's service. The people would profit if his power is curbed. To adopt plan No. 27 would be to make one great further step down the road to socialism.

The purpose of the Hoover study and report was to bring about greater efficiency and economy in Government. This plan No. 27 would not increase efficiency, and would increase the cost of administration.

Seven out of ten of the committee that made this particular study, voted against the very policies embodied in this plan; yet the administration garbled the real plan and purpose of the Hoover Commission and brings this political plan in which will suit their purpose better, and tries to claim they are seeking the adoption of one phase of the Hoover report.

This body should, and I believe will bury this socialistic attempt with a heavy majority of votes against it. Many organizations in the United States are opposed to this particular plan. Veterans and business organizations generally are opposed to it. Of course the medical men who have done such a remarkable job in protecting the health of the people are against it. The various dental societies of Illinois and the Nation are against it.

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS DENTAL SOCIETY

I had a letter this morning from the Southern Illinois District Dental Society, signed by its president, J. Alden Langenfeld, of Centralia, Ill., and its secretary, Glenn W. Ozburn. I should like to quote two paragraphs of this letter as follows:

> The Southern Illinois District Dental Society is opposed to Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950. We believe that this plan continues to subordinate the health activities of the Government to the control of lay persons. The testimony presented by the American Dental Association in a hearing before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Department contains a number of citations which conclusively prove this point.
> Further, the Southern Illinois District Dental Society cannot help but believe that the cause of compulsory health insurance will be greatly enhanced if the Federal Security Agency is advanced to Cabinet status with the Public Health Services as one of its component parts.

Mr. Chairman, this plan is no good for the American people any way you look at it. It would give much greater power to a political bureaucrat who has too much power now. It continues to centralize power in Washington. It is contrary to the Hoover report recommendations. It should be defeated.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to socialized medicine. I think the doctors have done more for nothing than any of our professions.

They have always been alert to every improvement that would be for the benefit of individual health and also for public health. Nobody can justify a wholesale indictment of the doctors of the Nation in my hearing without my making an objection.

A few days ago I was talking to a very learned individual who had thought this matter through and he advanced an idea that I had not thought much about. He brought out the fact that if we should adopt socialized medicine and an individual was placed under the care of a certain doctor, that then that man would be compelled to continue to stay with that doctor. In other words, if he would become dissatisfied with the doctor to whom he had been assigned, he could not stop going to that doctor until he got an assignment to another doctor from some clerk or secretary. In other words, the matter of assigning patients would be simply a routine matter to be taken care of by a clerk. And it is likely that the doctor to whom this man would like to go would not then be free to take him because this socialized medicine would operate in such a way that the individual would be compelled to stay where he had been assigned.

I maintain that it is part of the freedom of an American to be free to select his own doctor, especially if he has the money with which to pay the doctor. Likewise I maintain that it is the right of the doctor to accept whatever patients he wishes and not be compelled to work for the Government for socialized medicine which will in effect make all doctors employees of the Government. For instance, if a doctor were not permitted to select his own patients then it would not pay a man to prepare himself to be a specialist. If a man prepared himself to be a brain specialist, he would not want to be compelled to do work that would be entirely inconsistent with his specialty. Socialized medicine will invariably result in the medical profession lowering its standards of efficiency.

As to this whole program becoming a bureaucracy, I have had some very positive experience in this respect. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] this afternoon implied that the social-security law was a law favored only by Democrats, his implication was entirely erroneous and unreasonable. I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee when the social security bill was passed. I spent 9 weeks with the other members of the committee in preparing that bill. I spent 2 weeks on the floor of the House when the bill was being debated, and I spoke on it at great length. I voted for the bill. Without boasting, I want to claim that I was in reality the author of what is known as section 10 of the law. That is the section that provides aid for the blind.

With reference to whether this may develop a bureaucracy that will control our every action, let me say that I had an experience under the present social security law that convinces me that socialized medicine could be used to favor the wishes and prejudices of a person who was inclined to arrogate power to himself. The first social security law passed provided that the Social Security Board in Washington could require certain exactions from the State authorities. I think that the Social Security Board should have some power to enforce some of the basic provisions of the social security law by the States, for instance they should have the right to enforce a uniformity of the residence qualification of an applicant for old-age pension. But the case I have in mind was a case in which Mr. Altmeyer, who was then and is yet connected with the Social Security Board, in a most arrogant and bureaucratic manner withheld from the State of Ohio $1,338,000 which was due the State of Ohio from the Federal Government as its part of the fund going to old-age pensioners. I shall not go into detail with reference to the situation except to say that because Ohio's Governor at that time, Mr. Davey, who was a Democrat, had quarreled with Mr. Harry Hopkins over some civil-service matters, Mr. Altmeyer acting for the Board withheld the payment of this large sum of $1,338,000, which should not have been withheld. It is likely that Governor Davey and Harry Hopkins were both wrong but the rights of the old-age pensioners in Ohio should not have been violated because of a personal disagreement between a couple of New Deal office holders.

After Mr. Altmeyer had made his ruling and withheld this large sum, I took steps to correct the matter by proper legislation and was successful in securing passage of this legislation in the House and in the Senate. But under pressure from Mr. Altmeyer, President Roosevelt vetoed the action of Congress and although Congress was overwhelmingly Democratic and New Dealish we came very near overriding the President's veto.

But the fact still remains that we were not able to override the President's veto and the State of Ohio was successfully robbed of this $1,338,000 and that this amount with interest is today a just obligation of the Federal Government to the State of Ohio. In other words, the power of an arrogant bureaucrat thwarted the wishes of Congress.

With a President who favors socialized medicine and with a Department Chief such as Oscar Ewing whose views and practices indicate he would go the limit if he had a chance, I am opposed to risking the liberties of our people and the health of our people in the hands of such a man, or for that matter in any other man.

I come back to where I started and say that I have the greatest confidence in the doctors of our country and I shall not vote for any legislation that would compel them to become employees of the Government, to be pushed around at will by some bureaucrat.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOLDEN].

Mr. GOLDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this reorganization plan. I think it is the first step down the road to socialism insofar as the medical and dental professions are concerned, and I also think it will tend to extend Federal control over our common school system of America in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. It will certainly be a great discouragement to the medical and dental professions.

This plan is not in accordance with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. In fact, it violates their recommendations. It does not contribute anything to efficiency or economy. On the other hand, should it be enacted into law, it will give some civilian, who is neither a physician nor an educator, the power to control through numerous Federal employees and bureaucrats the practice of medicine and dentistry and it will tend to inject Federal control into our school system here in America. Furthermore, it will put in one department the administration of a social-security program, the educational program, and the health program of the United States. These three great segments of our society are not necessarily so closely allied with each other as to make it feasible, proper, or advantageous to place them in the same department.

If we are to have the free practice of medicine and dentistry under the American free-enterprise system, we will have to defeat this plan. The physicians and dentists and great medical authorities throughout this country are opposed to it because they know that it will necessarily bring Federal control and bring that large segment of our citizens nearer to socialization.

The accomplishments of the medical profession in their fight against diseases and in their discovery of many far-reaching cures for the maladies of mankind and their rapid stride in recent years to benefit and improve the health of the American people and to prolong life generally has all been accomplished when the minds and energies of these scientifically trained physicians and scientists were free and not under Federal control and while they were not regulated by any socialistic scheme.

If we are to encourage our physicians, dentists, and scientists to continue their marvelous progress, we should defeat this plan. What we need in this country is an expansion of our great medical schools and our hospital centers so that more physicians, surgeons, dentists, and nurses could be educated and trained to serve our people under the free system of medicine that has prevailed in this country since the organization of our Federal Government. We do not need anything that begins or even approaches Federal control and Federal limitations that will stifle the ambitions and inspirations of this great group of our American citizens. The same thing is true of our schools and our American school teachers.

What they need is more funds to pay the school teachers that operate the schools and without any Federal control. Every time we give up any of the freedoms of any class of people or forfeit any of the rights of the States, or surrender any liberties of any individual to the Federal Government, to that extent we are killing the free-enterprise system in America that made this greatest and most productive Nation on earth.

Many bills are being brought before Congress in recent years that have the tinge of socialism and Federal control in them and while any one of them may not be sufficient to load us down with the shackles of socialism, if several of them are passed and enacted into law, the first thing the American people will know will be the realization that they have traded their liberties and freedom away and in their place we have assumed the burdens of Federal control and socialism. When that happens, the springboard to further accomplishments under the free enterprise system in America will be broken.

It is my sincere opinion that there are a sufficient number of Members of this House who are devoted to and believe in the free American system to obtain the necessary 216 votes to defeat this plan, and when that is done it will be an encouragement to the people who love America and will let the medical, dental, and teaching professions of this great country know that they are still free and that they can continue to serve our people as free men.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS].

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this plan and all the evils that will inevitably follow its adoption. The ultimate cost of this proposed socialization of medicine, surgery, and dentistry will pyramid into billions of dollars annually.

The cost in the health of our people may well become appalling.

The effect of the blow to the incentive and individual initiator that inspires men in the private practice of medicine, surgery and dentistry cannot be calculated.

The people of this country are not yet ready to give up the right to select their family doctor, surgeon, or dentist.

From my youth to this good hour, I have learned to trust the able and consecrated members of these great professions. I do not wish to swap them for a man who is under any manner of Government control.

Socialized medicine has miserably failed in Britain. Its failure would be more ghastly in free America. I shall vote against this plan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, my opposition to this plan stems primarily from my unalterable opposition to socialized medicine. It represents a second effort by the President to raise the status of Mr. Oscar Ewing's job to the Cabinet level. His first try failed when Congress turned down the previous plan which he sent up here last year. Now we are confronted by this proposal, differing in minor details, but aimed at the same objective.

Those who favor the plan have been at great pains to point out in detail why they think it does not represent a step down the road toward socialism. I want no part of any plan which requires a labored argument to prove that it is not an effort on the part of Government officials to get control of the medical and dental professions and the education of our youth. If there is even a danger that the acceptance of this plan might further a trend toward socialism, I do not want to take a chance. I fear that such a step might be a tragedy.

Moreover, we have heard a lot of lip service paid to the Hoover Commission. We have been led to believe that the President supports the recommendations of that bipartisan group of devoted men who labored so long and faithfully to prepare suggestions for bringing about greater efficiency and economy in the operations of the Federal departments and agencies. Yet the President asks us to approve this plan which flies squarely in the face of these recommendations. The Hoover Commission recommended that health functions be kept entirely separate and apart from any department dealing with education and social welfare. They also were most emphatic that autonomous powers should not be granted to various bureaus within a Government department. Both of these principles, as well as other minor ones, are violated by this plan. The Citizens' Committee for the Hoover Report, drawn from all walks of life and a wide cross-section of our citizenry, appeared in opposition to the plan.

Nothing could be more important than the health of our citizens. Their health depends in large measure on specialized scientific knowledge. If there is to be a separate Department of Health, it should be headed by a medically trained administrator. The important function of health should not be subordinated to the unrelated problems of education and welfare. Fundamentally, there is no reason for the adoption of this plan, except the indefensible and indirect objective which does no credit to its authors.

I shall support the resolution to disapprove this plan and hope it commands the necessary constitutional majority.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIEHLMAN].

Mr. RIEHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is generally known, I believe, that I have consistently worked for constructive reorganization of the executive branch of the Government. Prior to submission of reorganization plans to the Congress by the President, I proposed legislation most of which was subsequently enacted consolidating several agencies of the Government now known as the General Services Administration.

By this time it must be apparent to most people that many of the reorganization plans thus far submitted by the President do not follow the recommendations of the Hoover Commission and do not provide for economy and efficiency in Government.

Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950 calls for the formation of a combined "Health, Education, and Security Department," as an outgrowth and expansion of the present Federal Security Agency. The inner workings and expansionist claims of that Agency were fully aired and then clearly illustrated by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in its current report on overstaffing of executive agencies. This thoroughgoing analysis of the philosophy and practice of our present Federal Security Office produced a rather disturbing picture. The tabulations, diagrams, and appendices of that 48-page document on "overorganization" will illustrate the new dangers imminent in the enlargement, coordination, and intensification of functions which now lurk in the proposed giant department. It would be to the advantage of all Members of the House to read that report. The Administrator of Health, Education, and Security would undoubtedly endeavor to carry out the theories of Fair-Dealism with all its miracles and public cures. Its sponsor, Federal Security Administrator Ewing, must at one time have been inspired by the concept of holding companies, but now—no longer completely satisfied with that pattern—he seems to favor the doctrine of fascism. This proposed bundle of a combined "Health, Education, and Security Department" would impose on the American people an astounding piece of totalitarian legislation.

Far from being in conformity with the Hoover plan, the project of the new department calls for an interlocking of Federal controls of health, education, and social welfare. That move is, indeed, expressive of a distinct aspect of totalitarianism. It is contemplated to allow a Secretary of Health, Education, and Security to exercise a series of functions which from infancy up would reach into the lives of all age groups. For some time it has been quite obvious that the Federal Security Agency has on all occasions been active in the promotion of socialized proposals. These and related schemes of compulsory welfare systems have in a number of hearings been found to be infringing upon American principles of government. The proposed departmental supervision of such all-inclusive matters as those relating to health, education, and security would readily provide, among other things, an opportunity to launch an all-embracing compulsory health insurance plan—socialized medicine.

A number of sound critical opinions were offered by professional and private representatives—all of them fearful that the problems of health would be subordinated to all-inclusive rules likely to issue from the office of a Secretary of Health, Education, and Security. The Hoover Commission in its report on medical activities recommended a considered and judicious approach to the Federal concern in the problems of health—the establishment of an independent United Medical Administration. Therein would be consolidated most of the large-scale activities of the Federal Government in the fields of medical care, research, and public health. The development of these functions within a professional administrative system would be in accordance with the major purpose of the Hoover plan—that is, to eliminate overlapping, waste, and inefficiency.

This brings me to my final objection to the creation of an executive Department of Health, Education, and Security. The purpose of the Hoover Commission was to provide instruments for the achievement of broad and substantial economic principles and efficiency in Government. Mr. Ewing's statement before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments on June 20—emphatic as it is in its enthusiasm for the new giant executive establishment—contains only two specific observations on economies and savings. It does not meet the essential tests of the Hoover report. That, again, was fully brought out by the appraisal of the proposal undertaken by the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report in its desire for greater efficiency and economy in Government.

In conclusion, let me refer you to the introductory portion of the minority views as summarized in the committee report—House Report 2320, page 11. I am in full agreement with the criticism that the elevation of the Federal Security Administrator to Cabinet rank would enhance the prestige and power of an agency which has been in the forefront of the movement for socialistic projects. Furthermore, that no substantial economies or advantages would be achieved by the proposal, and that, generally speaking, Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950 would make it increasingly difficult to effectuate the important parts of the Hoover Commission recommendations.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have risen in the well of the House numerous times to speak in favor of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission and the reorganization plans submitted by the President under such recommendations and in line with them.

This House honored me at the time that the Hoover Commission was created through the unanimous action of the Congress, by naming me as a member of the Commission. And it is not a pleasant duty and responsibility that I feel has been placed upon me this afternoon, to rise here for the first time to oppose, actively, and by my voice and my vote, a plan for governmental reorganization, Reorganization Plan No. 27, which has been submitted to the Congress by the President of the United States under the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1949, which I helped enact into law. Yet I feel compelled, ladies and gentlemen of the House, to oppose with all the vigor and ability at my command the President's Reorganization Plan No. 27 because it is not in line with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

In my studied opinion, the adoption of this plan will work a real hardship on the American people and will make more difficult, in the future, the proper reorganization of the executive branch of the Government.

We have heard a great deal of discussion today as to whether we have made progress or have not made progress under this administration or that administration. We have heard a great deal of talk about war, past and present, and about dogs in the manger, and this and that, none of which bears on the issue we have before us. We have heard some partisan speeches, too, but in my opinion this is not a partisan issue, and I am sorry that some partisanship has crept into the debate. We have a very simple and a most important question before us today. It is whether we are going to create a Department of Welfare constituted as recommended by the Hoover Commission, for good and sufficient reasons, or whether we are going to create a Department of Welfare made up according to the desires of President Truman and Oscar Ewing, and the others who have been favoring some far-reaching changes in the organic laws of our land.

Let me say, to the credit of the Hoover Commission, which was a bipartisan commission, as you all know, made up of six Democrats and six Republicans, six of whom were from private life and six from public life, that never once was there a division within the Commission on any question or issue, along party or political lines. Never once was there any division between civilians on the one hand and officials of the Government on the other.

In considering what should be done as to the creation of a Department of Public Welfare and what should be done in an effort to find solutions for the great social and security problems which confront the Nation, the Hoover Commission did not approach or consider the issues involved from a partisan or political standpoint. Our long studies of all of the various questions which came before us convinced the great majority of the Commission, 9 out of 12, I believe, that the Federal Security Agency, in which the Public Health Service is now located, was already overburdened, and that we should create a new agency, the United States Medical Administration, entirely separate from all other facets and divisions of social welfare, to cope with the important responsibilities of looking after health, hospitalization, and medical problems at the national level; also that we should have a new department of Cabinet status, probably to be called the Department of Welfare, to consist of Indian Affairs, Council of Federal and State Relations, Social Security—and I want to remind you that this House last October passed a new social-security bill that will place greatly increased responsibility upon the head of that agency of Government—Old Age and Survivors Insurance, Public Assistance, the Children's Bureau, and then we gathered into the department, under the Department of Education, the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration, the American Printing House for the Blind, Columbia Institute for the Deaf, and the Howard University. We did not include the Public Health Service in the new department because we believed our public health activities were and are of such great importance to every individual American that they should be considered and handled separately. Therefore, the Commission recommended the Public Health Service be taken out of the Federal Security Agency when this new Department of Welfare, or new department of Cabinet status, was created, and be placed over in a different organization, the United States Medical Administration, in which we would include all of our health activities, including our Federal hospitals, under a board which would have over-all supervisory authority, but would not actually fix policy, as far as the operation of its different divisions was concerned. For instance, the Veterans' Administration hospitals to be fitted into this general United States Medical Administration, but would still be administered by the Veterans' Administration; the Army and Navy hospitals would fit in, and yet to be administered by the armed services, as would all the others, with Public Health Service as a division of that new agency, so we could correlate and coordinate all of the public health activities of the Nation, get greater economy and efficiency, and still render better service to the people.

We found some very strange things in our studies of the Federal Security Agency.

We also found a great deal of inefficiency, waste, and extravagance. Our findings have been fully supported, in just the last 2 or 3 weeks, by a report of a subcommittee of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, which has been making an investigation under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] of overstaffing and waste and inefficiency in various Government departments. They, too, found gross inefficiency and gross waste and extravagance and overstaffing in the Federal Security Agency, which is now under Mr. Ewing.

For instance, we found in one social-security office or division several thousand Government employees patiently and faithfully keeping records which the law had not required to be kept for many years. There were five or six thousand employees who were not needed at all.

I say to you with all the sincerity at my command if any man heads up the Department of Welfare, as we propose it be created under the Hoover Commission recommendation, he will have a man-sized job.

Why do we say that he should not also have Public Health under him, too? Because whenever we put all of the educational activities, all of the social-security activities, and all of these other activities of the Government, plus all of the health activities of the Nation, under one man, you have given that individual more power than any one person should exert or should be endowed with, for the good of the people.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Does not the gentleman feel if this Reorganization Plan No. 27 goes into effect it will make one individual, the Secretary of Welfare, an all powerful superpolitical medicine man; a superpolitical dictator of public education, and a superpolitical Santa Claus?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Yes, I agree with the gentleman. As I just said a moment ago I think this plan which has been brought here places entirely too much power in the hands of one man.

Mr. Chairman, if I can I want to simplify the questions before us. We may talk all we please, and discuss these problems from the political angle, from the party angle, or from any other angle, but there are just two questions before us today—first, do you want to support the Hoover Commission recommendation; or do you want to support a plan which is different? Do you want reorganization according to that plan which has been recommended to you by the Hoover Commission, by a bipartisan or nonpartisan vote? Remember there were nine members of the commission who recommended the Public Health Service and all other health activities be taken from under the Federal Security Agency, and not placed in the Department of Public Welfare under Mr. Ewing or whoever else might be in charge, but under a separate agency, because health is so important to the people it should be considered and handled on a separate basis from almost anything else.

Three Commission members went the other way—two of the Democratic faith and one of Republican. Ours was not a partisan action in any way. Do you want to support the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, or do you want to support the recommendations of the President as outlined in this plant which he has submitted, and which is not in keeping with the Hoover Commission recommendation?

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. In many respects Benjamin Franklin was our greatest American. He said, "He who surrenders his liberty for temporary security, deserves neither, and will soon lose both."

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, the second question before us is whether we want to vote so as to further, if you please, certain present plans which have been underway to put into effect in America some sort of a compulsory medical-insurance or health-insurance program, as some may call it, or socialized medicine, as others may call it.

I think the greatest insurance we can have that we will not move further toward compulsory health insurance or socialized medicine, and that we will have a continuation of free enterprise in medical practice, with all the benefits that has been given to America under the greatest medical system ever known to mankind, is to vote in favor of this resolution. These are the only true issues we have to vote on.

If you want to reject this plan, then vote for this resolution. If you want to have the President put his proposal into effect, then vote against the resolution.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER].

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Chairman, of all of the attempts that have been made today to becloud the issue, the most serious one has been the effort to impute that those who favor the President's plan somehow dislike all doctors. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I have tremendous admiration for the day to day work that has been done by doctors, as was so adequately described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON]. The important point to be remembered today is this: The medical politicians of this country, the leaders of the American Medical Association, who presume to speak for all the doctors of America, have gone into politics with a vengeance. They have been fighting all of the advances that have been made in public health, all of the advances that have been made in social legislation in recent years. In the near future I am going to put the complete story in the RECORD. Today I have just time enough to point out that the American Medical Association opposed the original institution of local public health services throughout the country. They fought the reporting of communicable diseases. They fought the establishment of venereal disease clinics. They fought the workmen's compensation law. And they fought dozens of other forward steps.

In other words, they have fought all advances that have made possible the splendid public health record that we have today.

That legislative record should not be overlooked when you remember that such is the opposition to the President's plan.

Nor should you forget a speech that was made about 10 days ago opposing every single action that has been taken by the Democratic administration in the past several years—a speech that came from the incumbent president of the American Medical Association.

Now, let us recognize the facts of life. We are not really fighting a political battle on the question of health insurance, and certainly not on the bogy of socialized medicine. May I point out that within the past several weeks I have put into the RECORD a speech by Oscar Ewing unalterably opposing socialized medicine. May I point out that as one of the two authors of the President's health program in this House, I have made speech after speech opposing socialized medicine. Particularly have both Mr. Ewing and myself criticized the British Government for socializing hospitals. We want no such action here. Curiously enough, those of you who speak, sometimes guardedly, for a united medical administration, come closer to talking for socialized medicine than anyone else on this floor. Where you have socialized medicine today is in the veterans' hospitals, in the Army hospitals, and in the Navy hospitals. Yes, in Bethesda Naval Hospital, my colleagues, where you go when you are sick. That is where you have socialized medicine. Only this morning, before a committee in the other body, the Director of the Veterans' Administration testified that the socialized medicine in the Veterans' Administration was the best medical care in the world, and it was better than any other medical care you could get in the United States.

Let us not get this issue fouled up. All the President's proposal does, as the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] pointed out, is to give you a chance to do away with inefficiency and overlapping in the Federal Security Administration. There is nothing more nor less involved in the whole plan. Reference has been made to the Williams report. If there is any validity to the Williams report—and I am not passing judgment on it at this time—but if some of the strictures made are valid, they stem from the fact that you cannot do away with overlapping between the three bodies that now exist inside the Federal Security Administration. We want to do away with that overlapping and we want to bring about efficiency, and that is all that there is to this plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, when my good friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] made what appeared to be a very strong point that only 33 Members of the House in 1935 voted against the passage of the Social Security Act, thereby attempting to negate the assertion that I had previously made that the main opposition to it came from the Republican side in those days, my remembrance of those days remaining somewhat true to me prompted me to look at the RECORD. I have before me the RECORD of April 19, 1935, page 6068, where appears the following:

Mr. Treadway moves to recommit H. R. 7620—

That was the Social Security Act—to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendments:

Page 2, line 10, strike out "$49,750,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$69,750,000."

And on page 4, line 25, strike out "$30" and insert "$40.00."

And beginning—

And note this—

And beginning with page 7, line 18, strike out all of title 2 down to and including line 9, on page 15.

And then further:

Beginning on page 40, line 10, strike out all of title 8 down to and including line 19 on page 47.

What is title 2? Title 2 of the Social Security Act is the heart of the bill. Strike that out and you cut off contributory old-age annuities. Title 2 is Federal old-age benefits, that is, survivors' insurance, that is your earned annuities.

On that motion to recommit the vote was 149 for and 253 against. As I look through this list of 149 I see mighty few Democrats who were here in those days voting to recommit. It is true that on passage the vote was 372 to 33; but the old trick was resorted to of trying to destroy the bill by a motion to recommit. That is where the damage is usually attempted by those who oppose progressive legislation.

There is no question involved in this resolution today or in the question before the Committee or the House today of any of our hospitals. That question is raised simply to try and befog the issue; it is raised because of reasons we all know. The only question is whether or not we have the courage because of a few or some who in good faith and who are honestly deceived living in districts might have asked Members to vote against this resolution or vote for this resolution, the effect of which would be to prevent the Federal Security Agency from having departmental status.

We hear the argument made about greater power. Whoever is the head of this agency, if the President is sustained by Congress and it becomes of departmental status, will have no greater power than he now has; no rights are conferred upon him; he will possess only those powers he now possesses; so this idea of a great octopus is not a correct argument, is not fair. These three agencies that will constitute the department are not part of the Federal Security Agency.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman agree that if we do enact into law the social security bill, H. R. 6000, and it adds some 11,000,000 to social security, whoever is in charge of social security will have greater responsibility and greater power?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly, and if that is enacted into law it goes to this very agency. It does not go to any other agency. So that this agency without departmental status will have jurisdiction over it and it will have jurisdiction if it has a departmental status. Does my friend agree with me in that statement?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I agree with what the gentleman said provided he will permit me to add that the Hoover Commission, recognizing the fact that the responsibility and the power of the head of the Federal Security Agency which we recommended be made into a department of welfare, will be greatly increased by the Congress, as we too have recommended, and we therefore suggested and recommended that we divide up this responsibility and put public health somewhere else because we did not think he could take care of all the job that we were placing upon his shoulders.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with my friend. He made a temperate speech, a nonpolitical speech, which is very unusual for my very good friend. Of course, he made it because he did not think it necessary or wise to make a political speech. I agree that the Hoover report, except the minority, including some distinguished members of the Hoover Commission, does not agree completely with this proposal. But what proposal can? It does substantially. The great part of it agrees with the Hoover recommendation, and my friend was a member of that Commission. I fought shoulder to shoulder with him to have the Commission created and when his own party would not give him enough money I fought shoulder to shoulder with him to get the million dollars. Does the gentleman remember?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to give the gentleman full credit for that.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not want credit. I want to show that once in a while I agree with my friend from Ohio when he is on the right side.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I appreciate that and I want to give the gentleman credit for being one of the most responsible fathers for the entire Hoover Commission program because he led the way in supporting the legislation.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad to say I followed the gentleman from Ohio. I tried to be right close to him.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to get back to the gentleman's reference of me and to the fact that I made a very temperate, nonpolitical speech, and to assure the gentleman I made it in the hope it might prove to be an example worth following.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman made it in the hope that it might be a little palative. My friend is the greatest Republican politician in the House. Why, of course, I admit that publicly.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Who is going to buy the other fellow the dinner tonight?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman owes me several dinners.

Let us come down to other questions. They talk about socialism. Why, the great majority of my friends—not all of them—confuse dynamic democracy with socialism. They oppose, as I said, social security, they oppose the minimum wage law, they oppose public housing, they have opposed everything during the last 16 or 18 years; but one thing is certain and that is as long as they maintain that kind of leadership we Democrats need never fear about election.

The American people want progressive government, the American people are thinking for themselves. There are one-hundred-and-fifty-odd million Americans and they are thinking for themselves. They have their hopes, they have their aspirations. For example, 45 percent of the families of America have a family income of $3,000 a year or less in this land of bounty. There are 16,600,000 Americans that go home every night to their homes. I do not know where it is, but it is their home, the same as my home is mine, the same as the home of a millionaire is his. They go to their homes tonight with all their joys and with all their sorrows, their sickness and everything else. They leave in the morning, the mother and the wife usually left behind, as in our homes. There are 16,600,000 Americans in families with a total family income of $1,000 a year or less. There are 20,600,000 Americans, members of families, whose total income is between $1,000 and $2,000. Yes; some people can smile at that, but when there is serious illness they want their loved ones to have the best care possible; they want the best medical treatment. They are human beings just the same as you and I. And, they are thinking. Do not think they are not. You can make all the arguments you want here that come to your mind to try to inflame, but they are thinking of their loved ones. There are 28,700,000 Americans today, family people, that have a total family income of between $2,000 and $3,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Just a moment. The gentleman does not like these figures.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to know where we are making progress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Just a moment. Let me complete it. Twenty-eight million five hundred thousand Americans, human beings, are member of families whose total family income is between $3,000 and $4,000 a year. Eighteen million one hundred thousand human beings, Americans, are members of families whose total family income is between $4,000 and $5,000 a year. If that is not a challenge to constructive statesmanship, I do not know what is.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman not think that those people are concerned about their loved ones the same as he is?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I agree with the statement, the challenge to constructive statesmanship.

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly, and that is all I say.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And that is the reason why, as a Member of the Eightieth Congress, I voted to reduce taxes for these people, the only time Federal taxes have been reduced in the last 20 years.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope in the interest of progress that this resolution offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] will be defeated and that the reorganization plan, so far as this House is concerned, will go into operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. 27 transmitted to Congress by the President on May 31, 1950.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it be not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand, the vote on this motion is just the usual vote on the motion to rise and has no effect on whether we accept or reject the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The House will decide that question.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCSWEENEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the resolution (H. Res. 647) against the adoption of Reorganization Plan No. 27, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it be not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. 27 transmitted to Congress by the President on May 31, 1950.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 249, nays 71, answered "present" 2, not voting 108, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

SERVICE TO COUNTRY

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, the recent unveiling in the Veterans Affairs Committee rooms of a beautiful portrait of our valued friend and esteemed colleague, Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, served to bring into brilliant focus the completion of her 25 years of outstanding service in this body.

In this brief time it is not possible for me to elaborate upon her work: First and foremost in her heart and mind, next to the security and well-being of the Nation itself, the welfare of our veterans has occupied a preeminent place. During her tenure, and particularly during her chairmanship on the Veterans Affairs Committee, the beloved gentlelady from Massachusetts has worked unselfishly and tirelessly for the boys who, in offering their all in the name of freedom, were wounded, maimed, and disabled. She has spoken and fought for all the veterans. In her, the veterans have had a strong loyal friend, truly dedicated to their interest, who ably sponsored their cause and who never failed them in carrying on the battle to secure justice and generous consideration for those who sacrificed so much for the Nation. Certainly no one in or out of the Congress has served the veteran and the Nation with more real devotion, sincerity, and unflagging zeal.

Of course, she has striven for all the people, regardless of class, race, or creed, and regardless of petty partisan influences. She has invariably shown a deep humane feeling for our less fortunate brethren.

Always ready to cooperate with her colleagues in a worthy cause, friendly, considerate, cheerful and gracious, the distinguished gentlelady has built an enviable reputation in the House as an efficient and effective public servant.

I am happy to congratulate her first upon the fine portrait which now so fittingly adorns our halls, and secondly, upon the very successful completion of 25 years of devoted service to the veteran, the people of her district, and the country. May she continue to enjoy good health, energy, and strength for many years to come. And may she find in the gratitude of those for whom she has worked so unselfishly lasting satisfaction and happiness.

LOUIS P. MURPHY

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 3506) for the relief of Louis P. Murphy, United States immigrant inspector, El Paso, Tex., with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell me what the nature of the bill is and what he is trying to do?

Mr. BYRNE of New York. The bill as passed by the House appropriated the sum of $725.50 and the Senate reduced the amount to $225. The author of the bill, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] requested that the House disagree with the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BYRNE of New York, LANE, and JENNINGS.

MRS. SIRVART ARSENIAN

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3532) for the relief of Mrs. Sirvart Arsenian, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after "Act", insert ": Provided, That passage of this act shall not be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the Government of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

GHOST SHIPS AND GHOST MEN OR IRON SHIPS AND IRON MEN?

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the time of Theodore Roosevelt, when our proudest boast was that great Navy which swept the seas and by its very presence stopped the threat of wars, was borne the slogan "Iron ships and iron men." But in the wake of those iron ships, through all the seven seas, there sailed a prouder fleet—a tragic fleet of ghostly ships manned by the ghosts of men. Prouder because it had conquered, not by force of arms, but by sheer courage, daring, and human ingenuity. Tragic, because both it and its great heritage were long vanished from reality. The ships were the ghosts of the famed Yankee Clippers and the ghostly sailors the reminders of a tradition which once was America's pride.

However, the real tragedy embodied in that spectral fleet was not the death of a tradition—but the deaths of American fighting men which an American merchant marine in the great yankee tradition would have prevented. Men who died because the ships needed to supply them and to bring them reinforcements were still on the ways or on the planning boards. Men who died—God help us—while we were frantically trying to build the ships which would let them live.

That happened in World War I, gentlemen and gentlewomen, when, despite our best efforts, hardly a ship authorized for the war program carried a cargo before the war was already won. It happened again in World War II to our great cost in blood and tears. I am here today to ask, "Are we—we, the United States Congress—going to let it happen again?" For the burden rests with us, as Members of Congress, and we do not now dare entrust it to other hands. War may not be inevitable, but the responsibility for preparing for it is inevitably ours.

World Wars I and II are now behind us—but the lessons for which we paid so high a price in lives and money must not be forgotten. The fleet finally built as a result of the War I program was scrapped, sold, or allowed to become obsolete without replacement. In 1936 a few men of vision, remembering the lessons of that war, succeeded in forcing the passage of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 which laid the ground work for a long-range program designed to prevent a repetition of the needless losses we had suffered. We may thank God they did, for had it not been for the minimum amount of preparedness which we had achieved through the effectuation of the act's provisions we have no way of knowing how terrible the consequences might have been. I take nothing from the magnificent accomplishments of the merchant marine and the men and women who built and sailed her ships in World War II when I say that we could and should have been better prepared to service her for the needs of war. It took a tremendous expenditure of time, money, men, and supplies to overcome the basic deficiencies with which we entered the war, and the hard fact is that we are now well on the way toward being again in the same predicament. In Wars I and II we were blessed with the buffers of time and strong allies to enable us to emerge victorious, and, in the case of War II, to eventually contribute the enormous flow of supplies and men which spelled the difference between defeat and victory. We have no assurances that such will be the case again. In fact, we can be morally certain that, if the onslaught come, there will be little to stand between ourselves and the enemy. We cannot depend on friendly allies to supply us with transport and to hold off the opposing armies while we build ships, train men, and manufacture arms. We must be ready when the gates of destiny open lest we be trapped behind them.

It has been said time and time again that in this new era and for any new war, air transport could be relied upon to move supplies and troops wherever and whenever we need them far faster than the older, outmoded methods of transportation. But let us look at the picture realistically. At the present time our troops fighting in Korea are held up, losing men, and falling back, for lack of reinforcements, and for lack of military supplies. Where are the airplanes which can, supposedly, solve all our logistics problems? Where are the landing fields, closer to the front lines than the nearest ports, which could be utilized for this purpose if we had the planes? Ships are now providing the major portion of troop and matériel transportation, and they will continue to do so in the foreseeable future. It is up to us to see to it that we have the ships, and to see to it that they are ready now, in every respect, to back up our fighting men in the front lines—in Korea now, and on any other front where the necessities of the future may force us to fight.

The American merchant marine is truly the fourth arm in our Military Establishment. At present—and in the midst of crisis—that arm is woefully weak and near paralysis in some of its sinews. Let me tell you what is needed to make it strong from shoulder to fingertips:

Firstly, we must have ships, ships, and more ships. Here we are now seriously deficient in important aspects. I shall presently elaborate on that.

Secondly, we must have men to man them; and without a flourishing fleet in time of peace we will not have the nucleus of experienced men and apprentices upon which to build the crews we need for war.

Thirdly, we must have the materials and equipment to build and outfit the ships.

Fourthly, and I urge you to consider this most carefully, we must have enough properly dispersed ship-building and ship-repair yards and facilities with skilled men to man them to meet all possible demands for new construction, replacement, and repair. I cannot emphasize too strongly the gravely critical position in which we now find ourselves in this respect. It is this need and this deficiency which impel me to take the floor of the House today and ask that something be done about it.

Let us examine the first and fourth requirements more closely. Ships, and the facilities and personnel with which to build and repair them:

At the end of the war with Japan the United States War Shipping Administration controlled fleet numbered 4,221 vessels, with a dead weight tonnage of 44,940,000 tons. This after the tremendous loss of ships and men, particularly heavy in the early years of the war. As of December 31, 1949, the active United States-flag seagoing merchant fleet, vessels of 1,000 gross tons or over, numbered 1,212 ships with a dead weight tonnage of 14,550,000 tons.

These are the latest figures supplied by the American Bureau of Shipping for which I have tonnage verification. I am informed that since the first of this year the number of privately owned vessels in active service has decreased by 24 and the vessels on charter from the Maritime Administration have decreased from 101 on the 1st of January to 53 on the 1st of July. The trend has been, and still is, consistently downward. Three years ago there were over 1,000 vessels on charter from the Maritime Commission—now we have 53 in active service.

We may ask if this severe reduction is due to the ending of the war and the consequently reduced world-wide trade. If this were so there might be some justification for it. However, in terms of percentage of total American export and import business carried in United States flag vessels, the picture is nearly as black. In 1946 we carried 68 percent of our own over-all foreign trade—by January 1, 1950, this had been reduced to 38.2 percent of dry cargo and 49.5 percent of our oils, and the trend is still downward.

It has been estimated, and this can only be an estimate, that in the event of another war, our merchant marine would be called upon to supply 60,000,000 dead-weight tons of ships to properly service the armed forces. In addition to this we would be required to overcome the losses by attrition.

In view of the figures which I have quoted, we may properly ask where the required tonnage would come from, within the time we may have, if war should come. Three possible sources are available to us:

First. By acquisition from friendly powers;

Second. The laid-up or reserve fleet;

Third. By new construction.

I shall proceed to examine these sources: With regard to acquisition from friendly powers, much of our own wartime fleet has been sold to these nations under very favorable terms, and, in addition, we have, through the permitted use of ECA counterpart funds, encouraged the development of their domestic ship construction industries. This is true, not only of our allies in the war, but of defeated countries within our sphere of influence, including Japan, Italy, and Germany. High sources within this Government have intimated, very recently, that even now our own fleet is too big by one and one-half million tons, and that we should foster further development of allied merchant fleets so that they may carry more of our trade, earn more of our dollars, and so bolster their own economies. This is justified on the ground that in event of war the ships of their fleets would always be available to us. Ignoring for the moment the disastrous effect of such a policy on the economy of our own maritime industry, let us look at the facts and figures for this aspect of the last war. We were supplied by friendly foreign powers, through charter or acquisition, with ships aggregating 715,000 dead-weight tons. We supplied to them ships of 5,500,000 dead-weight tons. Before the war's end we made available to our allies $4,200,000,000 worth of ships and shipping services through lend-lease. Do these figures look as though we can depend on them for aid? Further, should war eventuate, we are likely to be in a far less favorable position to acquire their ships. Firstly, the now potential enemy will strike more swiftly and overrun more quickly the countries which are now our friends; and secondly, by reason of infiltration of Communists into ships' crews, far more of their ships are likely to be destroyed by sabotage or delivered into enemy hands than ever reach us. We cannot and should not rely on friendly merchant fleets as a source of wartime shipping. We cannot and should not sap the vitality of our own merchant marine in a well-intentioned but short-sighted policy of fostering the development of others.

The second and third suggested sources of emergency shipping capacity—the reserve fleet and new construction—are so interrelated through many factors that I shall discuss them together. The laid-up merchant fleet, supposedly available for wartime use, numbers as of May 31, 1950, a total of 2,267 ships. Their approximate dead-weight tonnage is 17,500,000 tons. The number of ships is as obtained from the American Bureau of Shipping Bulletin and the tonnage is approximated from Maritime Commission reports. At first glance here would seem to be a veritable wealth of ships awaiting use. Closer examination disillusions us: Item 1. Approximately 1,600 of these ships are Liberty ships. I need not elaborate on the characteristics of the Liberty ship, nor need I discuss the fact that some of the very circumstances with which we are now confronted forced the construction of these ships in World War II whereas speedier ships of more modern design would have been far preferable. A Liberty would be like a sitting duck for the new schnorkel type submarines.

Item 2: The approximately 1,000 ships of the laid-up fleet which have been designated by the armed services as most urgently required for possible wartime service all must have, before recommissioning, varying amounts of repair to hulls and machinery. Of this 1,000 approximately 400 have been designated by the Joint Chiefs of Staff as having high priority as auxiliary vessels to the fleet. It has been estimated that the total dry-dock capacity now available in private shipyards in the United States would be taken up for one full year to repair the ships alone, while still maintaining normal service to the merchant fleet. This is under peacetime conditions.

Here lies the crux of the problem facing us if we are to maintain a flourishing maritime industry capable of conversion to a war basis. The problem exists in the ship-construction and in the ship-repair segments of the industry—both of which are closely interrelated. The figures I have just quoted indicate the staggering magnitude of the job the ship-repair industry would be asked to do in rehabilitating the laid-up fleet. Now, let us consider the new ship-construction phase. I shall then discuss our present position with respect to our capability of doing the job.

At the peak of World War II construction in 1943, the United States private shipyards turned out 1,692 vessels totaling 18,600,000 dead-weight tons. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, completed ship production from United States commercial yards amounted to only 18 ships of 389,957 dead-weight tons. As of April 1950 a total of 28 ships of 1,000 gross tons or over in new construction in hand or on order, represented the work available for merchant shipyards in the United States. Their gross tonnage was 460,032. Compare this with Britain's 2,939,468 tons, or with defeated Japan's 428,430 tons. Further, there have been no ocean going dry cargo or combination passenger-cargo vessels completed in the last 23 months. There have been no new contracts placed in the last 6 months and only 2 in the last 18 months. At the end of 1950 if present schedules are followed, there will be only 8 ships on the ways in United States yards. What does this forebode if accelerated wartime production becomes necessary?

It is my understanding that a Naval Survey Board is now resurveying the laid-up fleet and will recommend that about 400 ships be renovated for active service; that in the event of emergency the 1,000 vessels to which I previously referred would be scheduled for repair at the rate of 150 per month—but, could we do that now in view of the present desperate situation of shipbuilding and ship repair yards? I think not, and I shall tell you why.

You cannot build or repair ships without crews of skilled personnel. It has been variously estimated that anywhere from 150,000 down to 60,000 men should be employed in ship construction or repair at all times in order to maintain a minimum nucleus of skilled and experienced personnel around which to build the work force necessary for full-scale emergency operations. Suppose that we accept the 60,000 estimate as did Vice President Barkley in his speech at the launching of the SS President Jackson at Camden, N. J., on June 27 of this year. As of March 31, 1950, there were employed in new construction or repair in private shipyards in the United States a total of 44,575 blue collar workers. Compare this with a wartime peak in 1943 of 1,000,000 employees. There has been a dispersal into other employment of thousands of ship workers during the past months. According to figures supplied by the A. F. of L. Metal Trades Council as of March 31, 1949—1 year ago—there were 74,353 workers on these same jobs. A drop of 30,000 in 1 year. There is some indication that the trend has been momentarily arrested, but unless something is done now to create new work it will again drop.

Black as these figures are, they do not tell the complete story. My fourth requirement for a strong merchant marine was that we have enough properly dispersed shipbuilding and ship-repair yards and facilities with skilled men to man them to meet all possible demands. While at the launching of the President Jackson I was amazed at the number of former San Francisco shipyard workers whom I personally knew, and whom I met or saw there. There was good—or rather, bad—reason for it. There is not now, and there has not been for some time, one single ton of new-ship construction going on in Pacific-coast yards. There are no immediate prospects for any new construction there. There are not more than twenty-five or twenty-six hundred men employed on the entire Pacific coast in ship-repair work. That should stagger and frighten any thinking American. Remember that during the late war over 40 percent of all new-ship construction were Pacific-coast-built ships and that in the peak year of 1943 50.58 percent of our ships came from Pacific-coast yards. Remember, also, what one atomic bomb could do to the Panama Canal. Concentration of any essential national defense works in one relatively small section is no less than criminal in these days. We must disperse our facilities to the greatest extent feasible.

I am from San Francisco, and I am concerned about the economic consequences to my home city and State resulting from this condition. But, gentlemen and gentlewomen, it is my distress, as an American, over our present failure to stop the leak in the dike of our national defense which prompts me here today. Believe me, it is not mere provincial pride, nor is it local patriotism.

Those are the basic and essential facts which I wished to present today. The reasons and the causes for the situation as it exists are many and varied. Remembering that it is not my purpose here to condemn the actions or to argue with the motives of any individual or group, I shall outline some of the underlying facts briefly:

We maintain a standard of living higher than that of any other people in the world. That is all to the good—but internationally it is expensive. In order to maintain that standard for seamen and shipbuilders, as well as for farmers and coal miners, we must pay them more. The inevitable result for the maritime industry is that, on a strictly competitive basis, we simply cannot compete. This is particularly so when our foreign competitors receive, in addition to the advantage of cheaper labor, greater subsidies from their governments.

It was to be expected that, in the war aftermath, foreign competition would revive and expand. However, it has been the policy of ECA and our State Department to hasten that revival to the detriment of our own merchant marine. In view of the present world situation, and aside from the unemployment created at home, I do not believe that to be a wise policy. I believe that it is seriously undermining the stability and vigor of one of our most essential services. As one who has supported and voted for economic aid to Europe, I feel I can make this criticism in good grace.

American-flag shipping has further declined, because in order to avoid the higher labor costs and stricter requirements as to food and living conditions for our seamen, many American shipping companies have resorted to the subterfuge of transferring their vessels to a foreign flag. This has been done with the consent and cooperation of the old Maritime Commission and has resulted in a serious loss to the United States maritime industry.

The operations of the Maritime Commission, designed to promote and to stabilize a flourishing American merchant marine, have been characterized by mismanagement, maladministration, confusion, and bungling. These facts have been brought out in great detail in recent hearings before committees of both the Senate and the House. The creation of the new Maritime Administration and Federal Maritime Board in the Department of Commerce under the President's Reorganization Plan No. 21 should do much to overcome this obstacle, if proper organization and administration are carried out with an understanding of the American merchant marine's importance as a defense arm.

The devaluation of foreign currencies recently effected has further impaired our competitive position in the race for trade, as well as in competition for ship building and ship-repair work.

False economy considerations on the part of the Defense Department, the Bureau of the Budget, and various Members of Congress, have inexcusably delayed programs for necessary repairs to the laid-up fleet. This was particularly evidenced in the failure to pass Senator MAGNUSON's bill to provide $25,000,000 for repairs to 134 vessels having highest priority for emergency use.

These same false economy ideas have resulted in failure to lay plans for, and to build new type modern vessels to set a pattern for mass production in the event of war, and for replacement of obsolete and obsolescent types now in use. I have not stressed this point before but it is of vital importance. We cannot afford to be forced to build Liberty ships again for lack of know-how and equipment to construct the speedier types we must have.

The preservation of vested interests in the captive yards of the East has motivated certain segments of the industry and its owners, aided, it has been charged, by the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission, to retain whatever shipbuilding there is for one small section of the country. We, and they, are criminally derelict in our duty to place the welfare of the country first if we permit this condition to continue. We must take action to stop the questionable practices which have so far permitted it. We must insure that yards on the Pacific, on the Atlantic, and on the Gulf coasts are provided with sufficient work to maintain the largest possible nucleus of skilled workmen in the respective areas. We cannot train a mold loft man or a shipwright in 30 days—we cannot bring skilled men to the Pacific Coast from all over the East, and from industries to which stability has attracted them in 30 days—we cannot expect octogenarians to perform the work of men whom we have failed to train to replace them. We must take steps to have these men trained and on the spot when the need arises.

There are other factors at work in bringing about the decay which is attacking our merchant marine and the maritime industry but time does not permit my going into greater detail now. I expect in the near future to submit a more detailed and documentary statement regarding the problem for insertion in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I have presented the case history of a sick industry to you. I should feel that I have wasted my time and yours did I not have some concrete remedy to offer.

I propose that, as a basis for cure, a thorough study of the entire maritime industry and its requirements should be made under the National Security Resources Board by an impartial, qualified research group or groups, with a view to establishing minimum security needs of the national-defense program and assaying present conditions in the industry to determine wherein it is lacking. I have so proposed to the President of the United States. The results of this study, which should be undertaken immediately, would provide the foundation for the long-range program to follow.

We should immediately begin renovation of the essential and useful ships of the laid-up fleet. This should be done to provide the ships for possible emergency, to bring up employment, and to preserve skills, to keep facilities in operational condition, and to clear the yards and drydocks for new construction and repairs in time of need.

We should liberalize our subsidy programs and charter provisions to permit the American fleet to meet foreign competition. With profitable operation under the American flag assured, we should prohibit foreign flag transfers of units of the domestic fleet in order to apply a tourniquet to stop the flow of vital ships from our merchant marine.

We should undertake a new construction and modernization program to make available types of ships in which we are now seriously deficient, and to develop the speediest and most efficient vessels possible for future construction. Even when the six new passenger ships now under construction are in operation, and including the passenger ships of the reserve fleet, we will still have less than 50 percent of the troop-carrying capacity needed for a possible war. We must build our own ships convertible to troop-transport use in preparation for what may come. We cannot depend upon the use of the liners now in the service of our allies.

Congress should pass the laws needed and appropriate the required funds to effectuate the proposals I have just outlined. We should not listen to the false-economy criers, nor to the voice of the vested interests fearful that control of shipbuilding might be taken from their hands.

The administration should cooperate to unify the efforts of all concerned—and should insure that no arm of the Government follows policies contributing to the weakening of the merchant marine. This includes fostering of foreign competition as well as the competition from within the Defense Department provided by the military sea transport service.

The maritime industry should unite to eliminate sectional differences in favor of the welfare of the country as a whole. They should cooperate in initiating and furthering a program which will provide work sufficient to keep all essential yards, in the East, and in the West, on the Gulf and on the Lakes, active. They should not cry for aid from the Government while they, at the same time, are using restrictive devices and are transferring ships to foreign flags, thus hampering the full development of the industry.

Labor should contribute to the fullest in providing conditions under which work can go on unhampered, at the same time protecting the American standard of living, and protecting their own ranks from the vicious influence of those who sympathize with our enemies. Since the development of the situation in Korea there have been heartening indications of a closing of the ranks against these seditious voices.

We must each individually take every precaution against sabotage of our united efforts, either by selfish interests, by too generous aid to our competitors, or, most important and almost certain to come, by the deliberate and violent attempts of our potential enemies whose methods we have good reason to fear.

If we take the helm with a bold hand now, we can sail with a stout and happy ship under us through whatever winds and waves may come. If we do not we may perish in the storm.

History records that as a people we have eventually recognized our problems and solved them. God grant that we will all, regardless of party or sectional difference, work together on this one.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. I desire to commend the gentleman for his presentation here this afternoon, and I subscribe to his argument. I think it should be rather clear now that before Hitler and Tojo decided to take on the United States of Amercia in World War II, they first took note of the deficiencies in our merchant marine.

Mr. SHELLEY. What the gentleman says is very well put and states the subject here succinctly.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HAVENNER. I, too, want to commend my colleague from California for making a very fine statement on a tremendously important subject, particularly at this critical period in our national history. I am glad that the gentleman is a member of our Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, because he has personal experience. He served his time at sea. He is the holder of an officer's license, and I am sure that his experience will be of tremendous value to the committee. I hope that with his influence the committee can work out legislation and establish in law the importance of the merchant marine as a special arm of national defense and to write into the law a formula for the permanent maintenance of a balanced shipbuilding industry on all the coasts of this Nation as a part of our national defense.

Mr. SHELLEY. I thank my colleague from San Francisco.

OUR MARITIME SITUATION

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman from California for his able presentation of our maritime situation. Our merchant marine has gotten into a deplorable state, but let us look toward the future. Let us seek now to quickly bring about corrections. Let us take the necessary steps promptly to build up our merchant fleet, to maintain our shipyards on an operational status, and to preserve our shipbuilding skills. The world situation today demands that our merchant marine be strengthened. Defense needs require it and, as the gentleman has so ably pointed out, the first approach to the problem should be through the prompt rehabilitation of ships in our reserve fleet.

Again, let me compliment my colleague. He has ably presented the subject, and he served well as a member of the Subcommittee on Government Operations of the Committee on Expenditures during our consideration of the operations of the Maritime Commission. In that study he rendered unusual service. In the remarks he has made today he has brought to the attention of the Nation a situation which demands immediate attention. Our merchant marine must be improved in order that the security of our Nation may be maintained and that we may continue in our essential role during peacetime in transporting the commerce of the world.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JULY 11, 1950

(Legislative day of Saturday, July 1, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who committest to us the swift and solemn trust of life, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. In all the perplexities of these confused times may we not lose our perspective. In these fateful days, lead us to right decisions and to that wisdom which is from above. As we remember here those of our own fellow countrymen who, in far places, are laying down their lives for the preservation of our heritage of freedom, save us from lowering the shield of national solidarity, just as the air is filled with the poisoned arrows of determined foes. In these days of crisis and alarm, help us to play the man and so help others to face with good cheer and courage whatever tomorrow may bring. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, on June 30 the junior Senator from Nevada presided over a public flood-control conference in North Las Vegas, Nev. on the subject of the necessity for flood control for the Las Vegas Valley.

Mr. President, I introduce a bill, authorizing and directing the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to make a preliminary examination of the Las Vegas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas, Nev. and vicinity, and request that it be referred to the Public Works Committee of the Senate, and that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3898) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey for flood control and allied purposes of Las Vagas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas, Nev., and vicinity, introduced by Mr. MALONE, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Army is authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey for flood control and allied purposes of Las Vegas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas and vicinity, Nevada, to be made under direction of the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made for run-off and waterflow retardation and soil-erosion prevention on such drainage area, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the intention of the junior Senator from Nevada is to urge a favorable report from the Senate Public Works Committee to the end that the Army engineers may proceed with preliminary examination and report on this important Las Vegas, Nev., area.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement in explanation of the amendment prepared by me be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table; and, without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement presented by Mr. LEHMAN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEHMAN IN CONNECTION WITH AMENDMENT TO RESTORE CUT IN THE POINT 4 APPROPRIATION

Mr. President, I am submitting the amendment to H. R. 7786, the appropriation act, for the purpose of restoring to the full $26,900,000 requested by the budget, the amount to be expended under the point 4 program, which is title 4 of Public Law 535, the Foreign Assistance Act of 1950.

It is inconceivable to me, Mr. President, at this time when we stand in the greatest need of the friendship and support of all the peoples of the world, that we should attempt to save $15,000,000 at the expense of one of the most vital programs in our whole plan of action to assist the freedom-loving peoples of the earth.

The action of the Appropriations Committee in cutting $15,000,000 off the proposed expenditure has echoed around the world and has been magnified by Radio Moscow and its subsidiary organs of propaganda into a deed of cynical contempt for the interests of all the nations whom we have pledged to assist in raising their standard of living.

While we willingly and even anxiously spend millions in arms and guns and planes and bombs, we strain at the spending of $15,000,000 which can save us, I hope, hundreds of millions in military expenditures.

This is not an extravagant statement. I shall support it in the course of the debate on this item. I understand that other members of the Senate have indicated their intention of introducing similar amendments. I shall support any of these which is called up for a vote.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

For an amount to enable the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures to carry out the duties imposed upon it by section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1941 (55 Stat. 726), to remain available during the existence of the committee, $20,000, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] with reference to an item appearing on page 4. I realize we have passed beyond that point, but I should like to ask a question relating to the provision making appropriations for the Select Committee on Small Business. The question I desire to ask is this: Under the language of the provision will the employees of the Small Business Committee be on the same basis as employees of a regular standing committee so far as retirement benefits are concerned?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is my understanding. They are in the same category.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was the intention of the committee to make them so.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The reason I asked the question is that it is my understanding that this committee's employees, who are paid out of the contingent funds of the Senate, are paid as employees of a separate committee, such, for instance, as the employees of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report; that the latter employees are not eligible for retirement because they are regarded, I assume, as being more or less temporary employees, whereas the Select Committee on Small Business of the Senate, when it was established by the Senate, was set up as a permanent committee.

Mr. ELLENDER. And it was to have the same status as a permanent committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was the intention of the Senate that that be true.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment on page 19, after line 7, is agreed to. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Capitol buildings and grounds," on page 22, after line 6, to insert:

Subway transportation, Capitol and Senate Office Buildings: For maintenance, repairs, and rebuilding of the subway transportation system connecting the Senate Office Building with the Capitol, including personal and other services, $2,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 11, to insert:

Senate Office Building: For maintenance, miscellaneous items and supplies, including furniture, furnishings, and equipment, and for labor and material incident thereto, and repairs thereof; for purchase of waterproof wearing apparel and for personal and other services, including four female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring rooms at $1,500 each and one at $1,560, for the care and operation of the Senate Office Building; to be expended under the control and supervision of the Architect of the Capitol; in all, $643,900.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, this amendment deals with the proposal to erect a new Senate Office Building. I should like to have the attention of Senators on that subject. The subcommittee made a study of the proposed plan and recommended to the full committee by a vote of 4 to 3 that the building be erected. Then the full committee voted, 11 to 7, as I remember, to report the item favorably to the Senate.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Legislative Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, I opposed the appropriation for the erection of this new Senate Office Building. I should like at this time to read the sum and substance of remarks made by me last year when the same item was rejected by the Senate.

In May of 1949 I made a survey of the space presently assigned and occupied by Senators and committees. The results of my study indicated rather forcefully to me that if the proper committees of the Senate should carefully investigate the matter they would find that the Senate's space needs could be solved by a more equitable distribution of space already available—and all without the necessity for expensive new construction.

The following are the results of my study, and prompted me to oppose the appropriation of funds last year to construct an elaborate new Senate Office Building.

At the time of my survey there were 390 rooms assigned to Senators, 328 in regular suites in the Senate Office Building, 31 detached rooms in the Senate Office Building, and 31 rooms in the Senate wing of the Capitol. I should like to emphasize that these rooms are assigned to Senators, and not to committees or any other type of activity.

If these rooms were equally divided among the 96 Senators, each Senator would have 4 rooms, with 6 rooms remaining. Under the present assignment, however, about one-third of the Senators have 3 rooms, one-third have 4 rooms, and one-third have 5 and 6 rooms, as indicated below:

Number of Senators with 6 rooms	5
Number of Senators with 5 rooms	26
Number of Senators with 4 rooms	35
Number of Senators with 3 rooms	30
Total	96

It seems that space is assigned to Senators on the basis of seniority. This is wrong. In general, space should be assigned on the basis of need and in accordance with the size of the Senator's State in terms of population. To a certain extent the Senate has previously recognized this formula as being fair and logical by providing proportionately more money for clerical assistance to Senators from large States as compared to Senators from smaller States. We have, as a result of this, several Senators with many staff members in a few rooms, and at the same time, Senators with a few staff members in more rooms than may be needed. It is certainly reasonable to assume that 6,000,000 residents of a State will write more letters and demand more from their Senators than will 500,000 inhabitants of another State.

I find that the present system of assignment brings about several gross inequities, such as these:

A Senator from New York with a population of 13,500,000, has 4 rooms. His staff numbers 15. Allowing one room for himself, the number of persons per room is five.

A Senator from a New England State, however, with a population of about 800,000, has 5 rooms. His staff numbers only seven, and the number of persons per room, excluding the Senator's room, is 1.75. This is merely one instance among many of this sort.

I feel that the principle of the formula by which Senators are provided clerical assistance is correct and logical, in that it recognizes that Senators from large States are likely to have more office work to do. Certainly the same formula should be applied in assigning space where their assistants work.

My survey showed, as of May 15, 1949, that the 96 Senators employed 801 people in their offices. That total was obtained from information furnished me by each office. As previously indicated, there are 390 rooms assigned to Senators. Allowing 1 room for each Senator's own use, 294 are available for the staffs. That would reflect an average of 2.7 persons per room, if rooms were more equitably assigned and all rooms properly and wisely utilized.

Three persons per room is not an unduly crowded situation. I have yet to see a room either in the Senate Office Building or in the Capitol that will not adequately and comfortably accommodate three persons.

As a matter of fact, even under the present allocation of space, most offices are not overcrowded. My survey shows that in the offices of 67 Senators—more than two-thirds—the average number of persons per room, excluding the Senator and his room, is three or fewer. In the offices of another 18 Senators the average is between three and four persons. In only 11 offices does the average run higher than four persons per room, and only one of those runs higher than five.

In addition, I am convinced that there is considerable space, in both the Capitol and the Senate Office Building, presently occupied by activities having little relative importance. This space could be used by Senators. I refer specifically to space occupied by liaison activities of Government agencies and overage in space occupied by committees whose work has considerably declined.

One of the reasons advanced for the new building is to provide a suite of five rooms for each standing committee chairman. This is regardless of the amount of business the Senator or the committee may have, and is, therefore, basically and fundamentally inequitable. My survey shows that most of the committee chairmen already have five rooms or more. Of the 15 committee chairmen, 3 have 6 rooms, 8 have 5 rooms, 3 have 4 rooms, and 1 has 3 rooms. Their offices do not appear crowded. The average number of persons per room in offices of committee chairmen is 2.14, ranging from the lowest average of 1.60 to the highest of 3, except for the one chairman with only three rooms, where the average is 3.50.

As to the committees proper, there are 52 rooms assigned to the 15 committees, which employ 124 persons. Thus, the average number of persons per room is 2.4. In this connection, it should be borne in mind that of 11 of the committees, each has a very large committee room. The same wide variation that was noted among Senators' offices is apparent in committees, and very clearly a reassignment of committee space is desirable. For instance, the Finance Committee has five rooms and four employees, an average of 0.8 per room. The average per room ranges up to five in the case of Expenditures in Executive Departments.

To my mind, the above data proves that adequate space is available for Senators' offices and for committees. Our real problem is not the acquisition of more space, but better utilization and distribution of the space we already have.

Mr. President, that, in substance, was the statement made by me last year in opposition to the appropriation of $10,000,000 for a start toward the erection of the new Senate Office Building.

This year our subcommittee went into detail in order to try to determine how the required space could best be provided.

I realize that some Senators are cramped for space; but I think it is on the verge of folly for us to erect the elaborate building now in contemplation, just to take care of the few Senators who require extra office rooms.

In our investigation we requested the architects to devise some way by which the present plans could be modified in such a manner that the building could be reduced in size and in cost. Pursuant to our request, they submitted a modified plan, which is called plan 4–B, under which the large number of office and hearing rooms originally contemplated were reduced in number, and the two extra large hearing rooms, the auditorium, the swimming pool, and the physical-therapy department were eliminated. Even with these modifications, however, the cost of erecting the building would be only $4,600,000 under the cost of the originally planned structure.

We also had the architects submit an estimate on what we classified as a utility building, comprising one wing facing on First Street, in order to provide additional office space for the Senators. We tried to get the architects to use the same plans, if that were possible. However, we were told that it would be impossible for the same plans to be used if only the building facing First Street were erected, and if the wings facing on B and C Streets were eliminated.

So, Mr. President, the architects took the position that it would be necessary for them to scrap the present plans and specifications if we were to build a simple structure of the kind which, in my opinion, would suffice to give to all Senators adequate space, and leave some extra space remaining for future needs.

At this time I should like to review the specifications of the three plans we now have before us, namely, the ones which were studied by the subcommittee of which I am chairman.

The first plan is for the complete new building which was authorized, as will be recalled, in an appropriation bill in 1948. Under that plan, 329 office rooms would be provided.

Next, plan B, a revision of the first plan, would provide for 220 office rooms.

And lastly, plan C, which was suggested by myself and other members of the subcommittee, would provide for 206 rooms.

With respect to hearing rooms, instead of 18, as called for by the original plan, plan 4–B would reduce the number to 9. The third plan or plan C, calls for from six to nine hearing rooms. We could even further reduce the number if we deem it advisable.

A consideration which disturbs me is that the fine building we now have, with all its magnificent hearing rooms, would more or less become obsolete. It was the idea of the planners of the new building—and it is still their idea, if we should go through with the plan as originally drafted—to provide hearing rooms for each of the major committees within the New Senate Office Building. This would mean that the chairman of each comittee and his entire office force, together with the staff of the committee, would have to move into the new building. I repeat, the new building was planned originally to accommodate all committees with their staffs, and the committee rooms which would be left vacant in the present building would be turned over to subcommittees.

In addition to the large hearing rooms with which the committees would be provided in the proposed new building, it is contemplated that there will be also two rooms of the same size as the caucus room in the present Senate Office Building, which would be used to accommodate any committees that may be conducting hearings on bills in which a large number of people might be interested.

And further, it is also contemplated in the proposed new building that there will be a large auditorium with a capacity of 500 persons, equipped for radio, television, and motion pictures. Provision is also made for a swimming pool and physical therapy department.

As I expressed myself on the floor of the Senate last year, the building originally contemplated would represent the last word in accommodations.

Under all three plans—that is, in the plan which is now in contemplation, as well as the 4–B plan and the new plan 4–C which we propose—a cafeteria, and a school for pages would be provided. In all the plans there is provision for storage facilities, facilities to accommodate the building guard and maintenance force; receiving and shipping facilities; extension of subways to the new building; a telephone exchange and other communication facilities; a folding room; storage space, and additional quarters for the Sergeant at Arms.

With respect to the garage, as I pointed out last year, the new building would provide space for 200 cars. The garage would be built on the first story. It would be a covered garage, whereas under Plan 4–B, although the garage would be constructed in the same place as that provided under the original plan, it would not be under cover. In the case of the third plan which we considered, an open parking space would be provided instead of a garage. Accommodations for the post office substation would be provided both under the original plan and under plan 4–B. There would be no special hearing rooms, either in plan 4–B or under the new plan which several of us in the subcomittee propose. The auditorium would be eliminated, as would also the swimming pool, provided under the original plans.

The over-all cost of the originally contemplated building, including the accommodations I have just enumerated, would be $18,600,000. Under plan 4–B, which, as I indicated, would reduce the number of office rooms from 329 to 220 and would eliminate half the hearing rooms, as well as the large auditorium, the cost would be $14,000,000. The building contemplated under plan 4–C, that is, the new plan, which as I indicated at the beginning of my remarks would require the architects to start from scratch, would be erected of the same materials as those specified in either the original plan or plan 4–B. The essential difference would be that the new building would be a utility office building, providing 206 office rooms and from 6 to 9 hearing rooms, together with all the other facilities for shipping and receiving, telephone exchange, cafeteria, page school, and so forth, but eliminating the swimming pool, auditorium, and two extra large hearing rooms. The number of office rooms could be increased by further reducing the number of hearing rooms. As I just mentioned the new plans considered by the subcommittee contemplate from 6 to 9 hearing rooms. The number could be reduced to three or four or five, and the additional space converted to office use. The cost of that building, which as I said would be a building that will meet all of our needs, but without the frills, would be in the neighborhood of $11,700,000.

As I indicated a moment ago, I desire to assist, if I can, in the erection of a new office building—if one is actually needed. I am frank to confess that some Senators are today cramped for space. Additional space should be provided for them. However, I believe it would be folly for us, as a means of fulfilling that need, to erect the grand new structure which is now in contemplation.

The alternative which I wish to propose is simply that the provision now under consideration be stricken from the bill, and that in lieu thereof there be inserted an amendment which I intend to send to the desk. The purpose of my amendment is to appropriate the remainder of the sum authorized in 1948 for the drafting of plans for the proposed Senate Office Building. It will be recalled that the Congress in 1948 authorized an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of drafting preliminary plans for a new building. Under this authorization, $15,000 was appropriated, which finally led to the drafting of the present plans for an $18,600,000 building. There is remaining of that authorization the sum of $10,000, which could be used by the Commission for the purpose of preparing additional preliminary plans.

I believe that in the light of present world conditions it might be well for the Commission to look further into the building situation. When and if my amendment is adopted in lieu of the committee amendment, it is my purpose to introduce at once a bill which will be referred to the Committee on Public Works with a view of reappraising the situation and endeavoring to find ways and means whereby, if it be found that a building is necessary, one can be constructed more in line with our needs, rather than the elaborate structure now proposed.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Is there any doubt in the Senator's mind that the Senators of the United States need more space?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I stated a moment ago that I realized that some Senators are in need of more space; and the Senator knows that last year I made a suggestion which I believe to be a good one and which the committee should look into when it studies the new plans. The Senator knows that the suggestion was discussed before the committee.

Mr. CHAVEZ. And the Senator from Louisiana knows the action which the committee took.

Mr. ELLENDER. I know that. But the point I want to make is this: There has been under consideration for many years, as the Senator knows, a proposal to complete the Capitol Building by extending the east wing. The plans for this extension are already drafted, and would require an expenditure in the neighborhood of $6,000,000. If the east wing of the Capitol is completed 42 new rooms will be made available.

Mr. CHAVEZ. If we want to use the Capitol of the United States for that purpose; yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not see why we should not. Many, if not most, of the Senators who preceded us at the time they voted for the present office building had their offices in the Capitol.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator will permit me to continue, I should like to suggest that the Senators consider the advisability of making the addition to the east wing of the Capitol, which would provide 42 large rooms, and also two large hearing rooms. It would provide for a large dining room or cafeteria which could be used by both the House Members and the Senate Members. It is true that in the division of the space contained in the new addition, 21 office rooms and 1 hearing room would have to go to the House. But the space on the street floor now occupied by the dining room, and the space where the cooking is done, could be utilized for office space, if need be, either to house a special committee, or for other purposes.

If we erect the addition to the Capitol we shall be doing something which is already in contemplation, something which is beyond the preliminary-planning stage. Last, but not least, Mr. President, it will provide a cafeteria or a dining room where all Senators and all Representatives can be served, along with a greater number of other customers, and thereby the deficit which the Senate has sustained each year in having to pay for the maintenance of the Senate dining room can be obviated. As I recall last year, $42,000 of the taxpayers' money was used to pay off the deficit incurred in operation of the Senate dining room.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Of course every Senator is interested in saving the money of the taxpayers. It happens that this body has acted on chapter I of the appropriation bill which we are now considering. We were not worried one bit by providing the people of the District of Columbia with $12,000,000 of the American taxpayers' money. Sixty-eight Senators have informed the Committee on Public Works that they need space. The Committee on Appropriations decided, practically unanimously, that there is need of more space for the work of the Senators. I might remind the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from New York, representing the most populous State in the Union, has three rooms in which to carry on his duties and responsibilities.

We do not have to spend $18,000,000, Mr. President. We could spend a million dollars and provide all the space necessary. But was that the dream of Washington? Was that the dream of Jefferson? Was that the dream of Huey Long, when the capitol in Baton Rouge was constructed?

Mr. ELLENDER. I desire to state to my distinguished friend that the proposal which I am now making to the Senate, if the Committee on Public Works is convinced, as I am sure it will probably be, that more space is necessary, would mean that instead of constructing the elaborate building which is in contemplation—we can save millions of dollars and provide adequate space to house or to take care of all Senators. One great difficulty is that the building, as I pointed out a while ago, would be an edifice constructed to the memory of someone.

It would not be a utilitarian building by any means; it would be a building which would provide facilities which may never be used. I have been in the Senate for 14 years, and on only three occasions has it been necessary for us to assemble in a room larger than the caucus room. On those occasions we walked over to the Library of Congress and utilized its auditorium. What is the necessity in these times of deficit spending to build an auditorium for Senators, an auditorium which would cost a huge sum of money, and provide a great many plush seats, and a place for the showing of moving pictures? I say we ought to examine our consciences, and having examined them, eliminate all that unnecessary expense.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to reemphasize one further point. I contend that the hearing rooms are now far enough removed from the Capitol Building. Why place them almost a block farther away than they are now by locating them in the proposed new office building? As I said a moment ago, the purpose of the planners of this new building was to do what—to relegate to subcommittees all the fine hearing rooms that we now have in the present Senate Office Building, and to build 18 brand-new large ones for the standing committees, and bear in mind, that would be done irrespective of the needs of Congress. While it is true that some committees need larger space than other committees, under the present plan all of them would be put in the same category. All of them would be provided with large desks and nice seats and each room would accommodate anywhere from 150 to 200 people.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. Some of the rooms may be necessary, but I say if we must erect a structure to suit our needs we could provide for a building which would be just as substantial as the one which is now proposed, and we could just as well honor Jefferson, Huey Long, Washington, Monroe, and other men who have in times past served their country.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. What I have in mind, and what I think other Senators should consider, is the erection of a building which would be utilitarian, and in which every single cubic inch of space would be used. Some of the rooms which would be provided under the present plan would never be used, or at best would be used only occasionally. On the other hand, the upkeep of the building, such as providing heat in the winter and air conditioning in the summer, would be a constant expense to the taxpayers.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish to ask the Senator a question, because evidently the Senator from Louisiana has not read the committee report, or is not familiar with the committee's action.

Mr. ELLENDER. If I made a misstatement I shall be glad to have the Senator from New Mexico correct me.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Senator has been discussing elaborate and detailed plans. He has not been discussing what the committee did. On page 11 of the committee's report I find the following language, to which I should like to have the Senator from Louisiana listen as I read it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am listening.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I read the following language:

After full discussion—

Not after listening to the Senator from Louisiana or the Senator from New Mexico, but after full discussion—the committee voted to request the Senate Office Building Commission to review forthwith the detailed plans of the proposed Senate Office Building—

For what purpose?—

with a view—

Not with a view to carrying out the elaborate plans which the Senator from Louisiana has been discussing for half an hour—with a view of simplifying the building—

To bring about what?—

to bring about savings, and with the expressed desire of the committee to make the new office building more of a working and utilitarian unit than the present plans contemplate.

That is what the committee decided to do. The committee did not decide to carry out the elaborate plans. It did not decide to build an auditorium, or this or that. The committee instructed the Building Commission to do what it wanted.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I wish to say to my good friend from New Mexico that since the language he had read was incorporated in the report I had occasion to discuss the matter with the legislative counsel of the Senate. I was informed that it may not be possible for the present plans to be materially altered because——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I am looking at the law. Under the original plan——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, this is getting to be a little personal.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator wish to make it personal?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Apparently the Senator from Louisiana would not be trusting the chairman of the Senate Office Building Commission and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], who constitute the Commission, with intending to carry out the instructions of the committee, irrespective of what counsel had in mind.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator from New Mexico may be met by the General Accounting Office on that proposition. I say to the Senator from New Mexico that the law provides for an appropriation not to exceed $20,000,000 and in substantial accord with the preliminary plans prepared under the authority of the act of June 11, 1947. Those preliminary plans have already been adopted. They cannot be altered, as the Senator knows, except perhaps to make a few changes such as is contemplated under plan 4–B.

Mr. CHAVEZ. And to carry out the instructions of the committee.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from New Mexico. Is it the understanding of the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Louisiana, and was it the understanding of the committee, that the words in the committee report would permit the Building Commission to scrap the present plans, or revise them, and then go ahead?

Mr. ELLENDER. It is not. That was the understanding, but that is not written in the law. I wish to say to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts that I am hopeful that the Senate will stand by me in the amendment which I shall propose. The amendment I shall propose will strike from the bill the authorization to go on with the present plans, and places in the bill in lieu thereof a provision to appropriate $10,000 for the purpose of studying new plans.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to be perfectly frank with the Senator as to what I have in mind.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I know what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. ELLENDER. If I should fail in my attempt to have the amendment substituted for the present languge in the bill, I intend to offer another amendment which would permit to be done legally what is contemplated in the pending bill. Under the provisions of my second amendment, any necessary changes could be made in the present plans, or new plans could be drafted. I am sincere in saying to my good friend from New Mexico——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Why does the Senator doubt the sincerity of the majority of the committee?

Mr. ELLENDER. It is not a question of what the committee wishes to do. It is whether it can be done. I say a question arises as to whether it is possible to do what is contemplated by the report. As I have indicated, the language of the present law authorizes the appropriation. It does not call for the making of new plans. The plans have already been executed. The appropriation act states that the money is being appropriated for the express purpose of—doing what? For the purpose of erecting a building substantially in accordance with those plans.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Except that the committee said——

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not care what the committee said. I am reciting what the law states.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Or what the Senator thinks the law is.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. SALTONSTALL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Louisiana can yield only for a question, and he can yield only to one Senator at a time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I first yield to the Senator from New Mexico, if he has further questions to ask.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Is it not true that after full deliberation by the Committee on Appropriations, the hearings before which the Senator from Louisiana attended personally, and in which he was very active in discussing the law, as he understood it, it was decided there that within the law that was passed several years ago, not by the present Congress, but a previous Congress, directing the construction of the Senate Office Building, the committee itself gave the Senate Office Building Commission definite plans and definite instructions as to what they should do under the law? Why does the Senator from Louisiana think the Commission is going to do something different?

Mr. ELLENDER. Let me tell the Senator that, as I pointed out a moment ago, the first action taken by the Senate with respect to this matter was to pass a bill authorizing an appropriation of $25,000 for the preparation of plans—not for the making of specifications as we now have them—but for the preparation of plans. Of that amount only $15,000 was actually appropriated, and there remains the sum of $10,000 to make further plans if the Congress desires to appropriate it. It is to that provision I am now proposing this amendment.

The point is that the plans which have been accepted by the Building Commission contemplate the erection of 18 new hearing rooms. They contemplate moving all committee chairmen, with all of their forces, into the new office building. I say that if we destroy all that, we destroy the plans, and I am backed in that opinion by very capable lawyers of the legislative counsel's office.

Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. DOUGLAS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. ELLENDER. As I have just indicated, if I should fail in the proposal I am now making to the Senate, namely, to start anew, then I expect to offer another amendment which would give what I believe to be necessary power to the Commission to do what is contemplated by the report. Unless we do that, I doubt very seriously that any new plans can be used in the construction of the office building.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. When Senators address the Chair and the Chair asks the Senator having the floor if he yields, the Chair would like to have the Senator indicate whether he will yield or not.

Mr. ELLENDER. I believe that when a Senator is engaged in speaking, a Senator desiring to ask a question ought to realize that the Senator having the floor cannot proceed with his remarks and answer questions at the same time. Senators ought to wait at least until I could get through with a sentence, or until I state that I will yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded for the moment, will he yield for a question.

Mr. ELLENDER. I first yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if the cost of the proposed Senate Office Building, under existing plans, would not be approximately $21,000,000.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct, if we include cost of the ground, the borings, and everything else.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And even if the plans were to be simplified, as has been suggested by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, would not such a building cost at least from fifteen to eighteen million dollars?

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator mean the modified building?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. I gave the exact figures. Exclusive of site, it would cost $14,000,000 if it were possible to eliminate 9 out of the 18 contemplated hearing rooms, and the auditorium and other facilities.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So that even if the plans were simplified, there would be required the appropriation of a very large sum of money, approximately $15,000,000?

Mr. ELLENDER. For this year it would probably be half of that, but ultimately it would be that; that is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I voted with the Senator from Louisiana in the committee against this appropriation, I will say, but I believe it would be only fair to the Senator from Illinois to point out to him that the contemplated building would include space for telephone facilities, for the House and the Capitol, it would include a tunnel, a new subway, electric lines, and so on.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; I think I gave that information a few moments ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish the Senator would turn to page 23 of the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. Very well.

Mr. CHAVEZ. There is a heading, "Additional office building for the United States Senate." Is it not true that the language reads as follows:

> Construction and equipment of additional Senate Office Building: To enable the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Senate Office Building Commission, to continue to provide——

Mr. ELLENDER. "To continue."

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes—

> for the construction and equipment of a fireproof office building for the use of the United States Senate, $10,000,000.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Very well. Is it not true that the Senate Office Building Commission is given the authority to continue that work?

Mr. ELLENDER. Of course, but only under the plans heretofore submitted.

Mr. CHAVEZ. No. Is it not true that the Senate Office Building Commission was instructed on page 11 of the report to do the work in a certain way, and not the way that was originally planned?

Mr. ELLENDER. I have consulted with the lawyers of the legislative counsel's office, and I am informed that, if a substantial change is made in the plans, it may not be possible to have them pass the scrutiny of the General Accounting Office.

Mr. CHAVEZ. If that is so, what has the Senator from Louisiana to worry about? Then we would not spend the money.

Mr. ELLENDER. What the Senator from New Mexico proposes to do is to erect the building as originally planned. That is what he has in mind.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not think the Senator has any justification whatsoever to say what I have in mind.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator has been working pretty hard for it, and I said in the committee that——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Let me advise the Senator from Louisiana that the only thing the Senator from New Mexico has in mind is to carry out the wishes of the Senate, and not the wishes of lawyers employed by the Senate. The Senate took its part in passing the law. Others may have made an interpretation of that law, but I still have lots of faith in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. The distinguished Senator from Illinois referred to the cost of the building. It is not only the cost that we must consider now but also the upkeep of the building. The record shows the maintenance of this building will cost from $550,000 to $600,000 a year; and that, of course, is in addition to the funds required to erect the new building.

Where are we going to get the money to construct this new building?

Have we a surplus in the Treasury? The Nation is $257,000,000,000 in debt, and every dime spent for this building will have to be borrowed. The interest rate on that money will be at least 2½ percent. While I am discussing this phase of it, I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the twenty-one-odd-million dollars he mentioned a while ago does not include the cost of the furniture and other items that go into the building. I would say it might cost as much as $22,500,000 altogether properly to equip the building. If on that sum we figure 2½ percent interest per annum, which our Government will have to pay, it will add another half million, and make a total of over a million dollars a year just to maintain this new office space for Senators. To put it another way, it would cost the taxpayers more than $10,000 for each Senator in order to provide office space for about eight Senators who need additional rooms. That is simply going too far.

As I said, I am proposing an amendment which provides for the appropriation of $10,000 to enable the Senate Office Building Commission to delve further into the question. I have no doubt the Commission will find a necessity for the erection of some type of building. At that time conditions may be far better than they are now. We may not be at war with the North Korean Communists, as we presently are. We do not know what the future holds for us. The adoption of my amendment would give us a further apportunity to study carefully the whole situation.

Mr. President, let me ask my distinguished colleagues: Are we going to continue to add costs to the operation of the Senate? I have in my hand a table showing the amounts that have been expended on the Senate side and on the House side since 1941. In 1941 the entire cost to operate the House side was $9,512,000. In that year the entire cost to operate the Senate side was $3,998,000. Do Senators know what the cost is today? The cost on the House side today is $21,631,000, and on the Senate side $11,689,000. And now it is proposed to add still more to that cost.

Let me further point out to the Senate that in 1947 the cost merely to pay the salaries of employees in Senators' offices, that is, the administrative assistants, the clerks, and other such costs, was $2,754,603.48. In 1948 that cost rose to $3,882,000. In 1949 it rose to $4,272,000. For the fiscal year 1950, the cost was $4,588,776. That is what it cost merely to pay the office force of the Senators. It does not include the amount of money spent for the committees or anything like that.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLLENDER. I will yield in a moment. I wish to point out to the Senate by way of emphasis that the cost today merely to pay the Senators' office force is greater by almost $1,000,000 than the total cost of operating the Senate, including the salaries of the Senators, in the fiscal year 1941. Yet there are Senators who want to heap more expenses on to that cost. If we are to set examples to the various departments, Mr. President, the saving must start here. This is the place to begin saving, instead of piling up costs as is now proposed to be done. I believe that like charity, economy should begin at home.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico for a question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Can the Senator tell me which particular Senator out of the 96 is wasting money by the hiring of one single unnecessary clerk in his office? Which Senator is doing so? I include the Senator from Louisiana in that question.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not want to be personal, but I wish to make a statement, and I speak for myself only. I do not at this time feel justified in spending all the money allotted to me to run my office. What do I do? I am now able to save the taxpayers about $16,000 that I do not need and I do not use. What is the Senator from New Mexico doing?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am doing just as much, and giving service to the people of my State.

Mr. ELLENDER. Very well. I did not mean to go into personalities. I have no administrative assistant today.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Probably the Senator from Louisiana is bright enough not to need one.

Mr. ELLENDER. That may be so; I dispensed with the position of administrative assistant last January. I am not using more than $10,000 of the basic salary allowance allocated to me. With the gross salaries permitted by that basic allowance, I could employ five or six clerks if I desired at a total cost of around $16,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. In a moment. I say, Mr. President, before this bill is finally passed, the departments will be asked to cut their requirements here and cut them there. In view of that, should we say, "Do not cut us; the legislative branch is excluded"? I say that if we are to ask the departments to take cuts we should begin to cut here. We ought to set the example.

Mr. President, I realize that it may be necessary to supply additional office space for 8 or 10 Senators. I realize that at the present time they are short of space. But it is now proposed, in order to provide space for the few Senators who are badly in need of additional rooms, that we spend $20,600,000.

I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. FREAR. Does the Senator from Louisiana know how many Senators are using the entire amount allotted to them for administrative assistants and secretarial staff?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not know. I have not made a survey of that. I wish to say to my distinguished friend, however, that I am somewhat alarmed over the trend with respect to expenditures by the Senate, as disclosed by the figures I have just stated. If the Lord spares me, and my distinguished friend, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] should reappoint me to be chairman of the subcommittee to handle legislative appropriations, I promise the Senate to go into details to find whether or not we can cut here and cut there, so as to set an example for the Government departments and if we can accomplish that we can then apply to others the yardstick we apply to ourselves.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. I believe I concur with the Senator from Louisiana in the energy he is expending in trying to save the taxpayers' money. May I ask a question? Is the amount of money the Senator is saving in operating his office refunded to the Treasury or is it used for some other purpose?

Mr. ELLENDER. It goes back to the Treasury, as I understand. I know I do not touch it.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know either. I should like to know whether that money is refunded to the Treasury.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am sure it goes back to the Treasury. I am glad the Senator from Delaware asked the question. If that money does not already go back to the Treasury, I shall make certain that it does.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, while I am on the subject, I desire to make another statement. I am glad my distinguished friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is present, because what I have to say affects the Committee on the Judiciary. Before the reorganization I served as chairman of the Claims Committee for 4 years. It was then the custom in that committee for individual Senators to handle the various claims referred to the committee. As I recall, 11 or 12 Senators served on that committee. As chairman of the committee I had the clerk each week assign to each Senator who was a member of the committee a certain number of bills to report upon the following week. I had one clerk who handled that work, and the salary paid him at the time was $3,600 a year.

Mr. President, I am informed that the Committee on the Judiciary has been obliged to have its appropriation increased 20-some-odd thousand dollars in order to operate under the new method now in vogue. Instead of the claims which are referred to the Committee on the Judiciary being considered by the respective members of the committee, they are considered by clerks, and those clerks are the ones who do all the work in connection with the claims, and then report to the Senators who are committee members. That may be a good way to handle the bills, but it is an expensive way. If we were to follow more closely the methods which were in vogue before the reorganization measure was passed I believe we could dispense with much of the extra help now employed by the committee to perform work which, according to the views of many Senators, is so necessary to perform.

(At this point, Mr. ELLENDER yielded to Mr. HUMPHREY, who spoke on the amendment on p. 19, relative to the Joint Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and debate ensued, all of which, on request of Mr. ELLENDER, and by unanimous consent, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD following his remarks.)

Mr. ELLENDER. During the course of my remarks I cited certain expenditures by the House and Senate since 1941. I tried to show that in 1941 the total expenditures involved in the operation of the Senate of the United States, including payments to Senators, all office help, and all expenses connected therewith, amount to $3,998,000. Today that amount has increased to $11,689,000. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table showing these figures be placed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Expenditures by House and Senate

Year	House	Senate
1941	$9,512,000	$3,998,000
1942	9,678,000	3,998,000
1943	9,361,000	4,249,000
1944	10,944,000	4,472,000
1945	11,660,000	4,672,000
1946	14,243,000	5,916,000
1947	16,012,000	8,167,000
1948	18,095,000	9,546,000
1949	18,110,000	10,288,000
1950 (estimate)	21,392,000	11,560,000
1951 (estimate)	21,631,000	11,689,000

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the salaries of officers and employees of the Senate, not including payments to Senators. The table shows that for the fiscal year 1947, for the Office of the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, the standing committees, and for the Senators' offices, the total amount was $4,900,298.33. For the fiscal year 1950, just ending, the amount was $7,102,896.35. I wish also to emphasize the point which I made in the course of my remarks a short time ago, to the effect that the amount of money which is now being spent by Senators for their respective offices amounts to $4,588,776.28, in contrast to a total for over-all expenses of the Senate in 1941 of $3,998,000. I ask that the table be placed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Salaries, officers and employees, Senate

Division of payroll	Amount paid
	Fiscal year 1947	Fiscal year 1948	Fiscal year 1949	Fiscal year 1950
Secretary and Sergeant at Arms [1]	$1,093,369.97	$1,137,169.06	$1,339,714.12	$1,477,279.24
Standing committees [2]	1,052,324.88	799,310.20	921,119.43	1,036,840.83
Senators' offices	2,754,603.48	3,882,889.35	4,272,634.02	4,588,776.28
Total fiscal year	4,900,298.33	5,819,368.61	6,533,467.57	7,102,896.35

[1] Includes office of the President of the Senate.
[2] Includes conference of the majority and the minority.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a detailed statement showing the office space which would be made available in the proposed new building be placed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. I think it would be of value to Senators to have this information available in the RECORD, and I therefore ask that it be incorporated at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I now send to the desk an amendment which would strike the language presently under consideration beginning at line 24 on page 23, and ending at line 4, on page 24, and in lieu thereof would place in the bill the language of the amendment.

I wish to reiterate that the purpose of this amendment, which I ask to have considered, is to appropriate the balance of the $25,000 heretofore authorized, for the purpose of studying plans or devising ways and means by which Senators may be provided with more space. Under my amendment the commission which is authorized by the Senate to study the problem would be in a position to go forward with new plans. I desire to reemphasize the fact that in view of the present world situation I honestly and sincerely believe that this question should be studied further and the commission should use every effort at its command to propose a more or less utilitarian building which would provide basic services for Senators, rather than the monumental-type building now proposed under the adopted plans.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator feel that we could get twice as much space or at least the same amount of space for half the money if we go along on the basis of a substantially modern and simple office building?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no question about it.

Mr. TAFT. We already have a monumental building in the Senate Office Building, in which there is a tremendous amount of waste space, it seems to me, as compared with any privately constructed office building that I have seen. In my opinion we could perfectly well construct a building which would be designed from the standpoint of the most economical use of office space.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is exactly what my amendment proposes. The amendment I propose does not contemplate any additional appropriation other than the $10,000.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Ten million dollars.

Mr. ELLENDER. No, $10,000. The present plans now before the Commission could be used as a basis, if the architects saw fit. If they wished to do so, they could use much of the information which has been gathered. As I pointed out a short time ago, what bothers me most is that I do not believe the Commission would be authorized to make the extensive changes that should be made in the present plans of the proposed new Senate Office Building.

As was emphasized by the architects, in order for the Commission to be in a position to erect a really utilitarian building, one that would do away with all the excess rooms and excess space, they would have to scrap the present plans and start anew. Even though the plans were scrapped, the fees of the architects, and the cost of everything connected with a new utilitarian building giving ample space for Senators, would be a little more than half of what the presently planned monumental structure would cost.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to support the position taken by me on this question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). Just a moment. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER].

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, beginning with line 24, it is proposed to strike out through line 4, on page 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Plans for additional Senate Office Building: To enable the Architect of the Capitol further to carry out the provisions of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the preparation of preliminary plans and estimates of cost for an additional office building for the United States Senate," approved July 11, 1947, $10,000.

During the delivery of Mr. ELLENDER's speech,

Mr. HUMPHREY rose.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator from Minnesota desires that I yield to him, I do so at this time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Do I correctly understand that thus far in the course of the consideration of House bill 7786, the item on page 19, between lines 8 and 15—the item pertaining to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures—has been approved?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to say, since I, too, am deeply concerned about the issue——

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator do so in his own time? I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me say that I strongly object to this useless expenditure of the people's money. Let me say quite frankly, if the Senator will permit me to make an observation——

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Minnesota may make a short observation without causing me to lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's emphasis on the adjective, because I am sure the observation will not be too long.

I merely wish to point out that under the Reorganization Act of 1946, the duties of the Joint Committee on the Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures were absorbed by the House and the Senate Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

I have brought this issue to the attention of the Senate on several occasions. I am not in any way chastising the Joint Committee for the good work it did up to 1947. We needed the Joint Committee up to that time.

However, this is nothing more than an outright duplication of functions to render service duplicate to that which already is being performed by one of the standing committees of the Senate and one of the standing committees of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, at this moment the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures is holding hearings on what is known as the railway mail pay case, the round-trip provisions which pertain to payments for the shipment of mail by the Post Office Department on the railroads. I was chairman of a special Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee which held extensive hearings on the same subject. Not only did we hold hearings on the same subject, but we have on the calendar a bill on the same subject. Furthermore, many of the same witnesses are now testifying before the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, after having testified before the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Not only that, but the witnesses are using much of the same testimony and are reading many of the same documents. In that connection, Government officials appear and testify. In short, they appear before two committees and give the same testimony before each of them.

Mr. President, I am happy to see the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] come to the floor while this issue is being raised, because it is one which has been before the Senate on previous occasions.

Insofar as the junior Senator from Minnesota is concerned, his position is iron-clad. There is not one iota of evidence to support the continuation of this Joint Committee.

So, Mr. President, I strongly object to having this provision in the bill, and I intend to move for reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. President, at this time I so move.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator from Minnesota makes the motion, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me, to permit me to make a statement concerning this matter?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield for that purpose, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I would not want the Senator to lose the floor.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Let the Chair state that a motion to reconsider is not now in order, because another amendment is pending.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at any rate I should like to make the explanation now, if the Senator will permit me to do so.

Mr. ELLENDER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. This amendment was not suggested by the Appropriations Committee or by any member of the committee, but it was offered by my distinguished and attractive and very handsome friend, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], whose views about economy are well known. Heretofore, as I recall he brought up the amendment on the floor, and it was adopted and became a part of the authorization bill.

Confidentially, although I did not vote for the amendment, I doubt very much whether the Senator from Minnesota will get very far in attempting to remove it from the bill. The Senate has a great deal of confidence in these matters in the Senator from Virginia, and I doubt whether the Senator from Minnesota will get very far in his effort. I wish to make that explanation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I appreciate the explanation. I wish to say to my friend, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, that I am well aware of the fact that I may not get very far in reference to this item. However, I wish to say again that insofar as the legislative functions of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures are concerned, those functions are appropriately referred, under the Legislative Reorganization Act, to the House and the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

I note that of recent date the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures was holding hearings on legislative matters identical with those upon which a Senate committee has held hearings.

Recently on the floor of the Senate I said that I consider this to be more than just an ordinary controversy. It is unwise, it is unfair, it is beneath the dignity of this body to place the responsibility for a full-scale investigation of a particular agency of Government in the hands of a standing committee, whose chairman appoints a subcommittee to carry out committee functions of investigation and study, but then, once the study has been completed and a bill on the subject has been prepared and reported and is on the Senate calendar, to find that another committee does identically the same work—hears the same witnesses and receives the same testimony.

Mr. President, this has gone on too many times. I merely register by objection. I am not so foolish as to believe that I shall be able to persuade the Congress to do away with this joint committee; but I say it is just as useles as livery stable at a Ford automobile plant. It is time this joint committee were abolished.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to comment upon this matter at this time, except to say, as the Senator from Tennessee already has said, that the Senate itself has already passed on the issue and has authorized appropriation of the $20,000. As the Senator has well said, the Senate already has acted on the proposal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Delaware for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appreciate the Senator's yielding, at this point. As one who believes in economy in the Government as much as does any other Member of the Senate I rise to support the full appropriation requested by the Joint Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and to express not only my disapproval but disgust with the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. In my opinion this committee under the chairmanship of the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], has made a greater contribution toward promoting economy in Government than has any other Senate committee, and there is no Member of the United States Senate who has contributed more toward good sound government than has the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

What makes the attack on this committee even more unjustified is that the attack comes from one who has consistently voted against any reduction in Federal expenditures. In fact he once made the statement on the floor of this Senate that he does not even believe in the necessity of a balanced Federal budget. Now he makes a great furore about a $20,000 item in a $34,000,000,000 appropriation bill. I am confident that he is the only Member of the Senate who will vote for his motion.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the animosity of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] to this committee is well known. He has made frequent attacks upon and many misrepresentations with respect to this committee. I undertook to answer 10 of the misrepresentations, which he could not question, when I addressed the Senate a little while back on this subject.

The Senator from Minnesota says that this expenditure of $20,000 is the No. 1 instance of waste and extravagance in the Federal Government. No one could make such a statement as that unless he was influenced and guided by a blind intolerance. To say that an expenditure of $20,000, even if every cent of it was wasted, was the No. 1 instance of waste and extravagence in a total expenditure of $40,000,000,000, is so fantastic as to be simply absurd.

I wish to say in explanation of this amendment that the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is mistaken in saying that the Senator from Virginia offered this amendment. This amendment was recommended by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, of which the distinguished Senator from Tennessee in a member.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator. I thought it was he who offered the amendment. I had been so informed.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Evidently the use of the Senator's name had its effect, for in the committee a motion to strike out the amendment was rejected, and I believe it was also rejected afterward by the Senate itself.

Mr. BYRD. This appropriation of $20,000 was requested by the joint committee at the meeting held on March 17. The motion was made, as I recall, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I think that when we hear this denunciation of the work of the committee, it is well for the Senate to understand its membership. I have the honor to be its chairman. When we met on March 17, I placed in nomination for the chairmanship the name of the distinguished vice chairman of the committee, Representative DOUGHTON, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. DOUGHTON declined to accept it, and my nomination was made by him and unanimously adopted by the committee.

Under the law creating this committee, it can be terminated at any time by a majority of the membership. I think that when I read the names of the members of the committee, it will be understood that they would not continue what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] says is the No. 1 instance of waste and extravagance in all the expenditures of the Federal Government. Eliminating myself, the vice chairman is Representative DOUGHTON, a man in whom the entire Congress has great confidence, and who is chairman of the great Ways and Means Committee. Other members of the committee on the House side are the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, Representative CANNON, Representative KERR, Representative COOPER, Representative TABER, and Representative REED. They unanimously agreed that this committee should be continued. From the Senate we have as members of the committee the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the able and splendid chairman of the Appropriations Committee; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER]. In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget are members of the committee.

I do not think that these gentlemen, constituting respected Members of the House and Senate, would deliberately waste $20,000 a year, as the Senator from Minnesota charges.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Twenty thousand dollars, in the light of the present budget, as the Senator from Virginia well knows, is less than one two-millionths of 1 percent of the total expenditures of the Government. It is simply ridiculous to talk about a $20,000 waste when hundreds of millions of dollars are being wasted all along the line.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say, so far as I am concerned, that I think this body, and every Member of it, knows that I am not inclined in the slightest way to waste the Government's money. I do not vote that way, I do not act that way, I do not work that way, and I do not go along with those who do.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota has referred to duplication of effort. Well, there is more or less duplication in nearly all the committees which function in the Senate. One of the greatest duplications that I know of is that there are 12 standing committees of the Senate with the right to approve authorizations for expenditures—12 of them. And an authorization nearly always becomes an appropriation. In a sense, at least, these 12 standing committees are duplicating the work of the Appropriations Committee. That happens in the case of many other committees, where there is overlapping.

Let me say that this committee has been functioning for 9 years, and it is true that, after certain investigations and certain reports were made by the committee, other committees copied what this committee was doing and issued similar reports.

The case about which the Senator from Minnesota is making such an ado now is the investigation of the Post Office Department. The Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures was investigating it from the standpoint of the increased deficit resulting from the operations of the Post Office Department. I know of no other committee that made that exact investigation. The Post Office Department is now showing a deficit of $500,000,000 a year. At the hearings before this committee—which, incidentally, did not cost anything, since these gentlemen came before the committee and gave their very valuable views when Representative DOUGHTON and other members of the committees was present—we were told that if the railroad increase were granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the deficit of the Post Office Department alone next year would be $1,000,000,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BYRD. I will finish my statement first.

When we take the fact that there are many committees spending the people's money, it seems to me that a puny $20,000 expended in an effort to save some money for the Federal Government and the taxpayers of the country should not be under daily and constant attack by the Senator from Minnesota as now seems to be the case.

Let me give a statement of what this committee is now doing and the investigations it is now undertaking. This committee makes a standard report of Federal employment—the first such report that was made until the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service copied what we were doing. The committee's report on Federal employment shows exactly each month how many new employees are added to and how many are eliminated from the different subdivisions of the Government.

The committee is now working on a report which will be of great interest, and which will show every Federal employee in each county, city, and State, which information is not available from the ordinary branches of Government. I think it will be very important to Senators and Representatives to find out how many employees in each of their counties come under the numerous Government agencies that are employing in all about 2,000,000 Federal employees, with a pay roll of nearly $8,000,000,000. I am speaking only now of what the committee is undertaking at this time:

First. A special investigation was made of the civilian employment in the Military Establishment, 1945–49. I do not know of any other committee that is doing that.

Second. Employment trends in major employing agencies as compared with the rest of the Government. Those are employment trends in agencies, exclusive of the Military Establishment;

Third. Employment trends in agencies exclusive of the Military Establishment;

Fourth. Making an investigation of the post-office personnel, 1939–49, and pay;

Fifth. The inaccuracies in post-office personnel reporting. This committee condemned it, and was, Mr. President, if you please, the only committee to ascertain that the Post Office Department had inaccurate reporting, whereby from 25,000 to 30,000 employees were not reported in the list of employees as given to the Congress.

Sixth. Civilian employment reduction in the Military Establishment under the Johnson order of August 24, 1949. I know of no other committee, I know of no agency that is making an investigation to ascertain whether the personnel in the armed services has been reduced as much as it should be, although I desire to compliment Secretary Johnson in saying that he made a reduction of 130,000 civilian employees.

Seventh. Employment in three major agencies, 1939–1948, and average for the first half of 1950;

Eighth. The development of civilian employment incident to the mutual defense assistance program;

Ninth. Employment data incident to the Seventeenth Decennial Census; and Tenth. Employment transfers incident to reorganization plans effective as of that date.

The committee, during the past year, has completed four major studies on an intracommittee basis; namely, studies on expenditures on foreign programs, employment by localities, top-flight pay bill, and budget analysis.

Staff work has been completed on a revision of the committee's 1947 report on grants-in-aid, in response to a demand for the historical development and current information in this field.

The committee has also complied with many requests from Members of Congress requiring special studies, compilations, and informal reports, and, in addition, has fulfilled more than 200 requests from other Members of Congress and the general public for information not requiring extensive staff work.

I shall not go back and take up the time to show that this committee, during the 9 years it has been operating—and it has only spent $127,000 in that 9-year period, an average of but $14,000 a year—has made numerous reports, major reports recommending reduction of expenditures, many of which have been adopted by the Congress.

What purpose does the distinguished Senator from Minnesota have in these constant attacks and insinuations upon the work of this committee, composed of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the chairmen of the Appropriations Committees of both Houses, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of the Budget? I do not know. I think he could devote his time more profitably, perhaps, in connection with some other activities toward economy. If he has ever cast a vote for economy on this floor, I do not know when he did so. He speaks of economy in terms of saving $20,000 on the part of a committee which, even though I am chairman of it, has done a good work. I am willing to admit that we cannot conduct with such a small sum an investigation of a very careful or inclusive character, but at least we have done something. The committee has kept alive in the public mind the fact that there is such a word as "economy" in the English language. That, alone, Mr. President, is worth the full value of the $20,000 which has been expended. Not only that, but the committee receives hundreds of letters from citizens which are answered in detail, giving information as to the transactions of the Government, and other information which the writers of the letters request.

I could extend my remarks much further, Mr. President, but I do not care to do so. I think the Senate is informed with reference to the committee. I do not believe that anything like a majority of Senators agree with the Senator from Minnesota. I think the members of the committee can be trusted. The committee was created with the provision of law that whenever the committee ceased to perform a useful function, the membership itself, by vote, could terminate its activities.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield in order that I may make reply to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I did not know, when I yielded, that so much time would be required. I do not have much more to say, Mr. President, and I should appreciate it if the Senator from Minnesota would wait until I conclude my remarks.

I ask unanimous consent that all remarks which have so far been made with reference to the Joint Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures be placed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, my remarks will not be extended, and I should greatly appreciate being able to make my reply immediately after the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Virginia. I shall limit my remarks.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Minnesota may be permitted to reply to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, we have listened very attentively to the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana opposing the committee's proposal. It was my purpose to proceed to give the committee's side of the controversy after the Senator had concluded.

Mr. ELLENDER. That will be within a very short time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that the Senator from Minnesota be permitted to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from New Mexico and to the Senator from Louisiana.

I wish to say that the junior Senator from Minnesota has never for a single minute attacked the caliber and the leadership qualities of the distinguished members of the well-known Joint Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures. I regret the fact that the Senator from Virginia has again seen fit to introduce personalities and to become personal toward me, thus confusing the issues. It has been the contention of the junior Senator from Minnesota, which he has documented by reports on the floor of the Senate, that the committee is one which duplicates the work and functions which have already been assigned under existing law. Whether $20,000 is too much or too little is not the point. The point is that there is already established governmental machinery in standing committees which do the job of this joint committee. I regret that the Senator from Virginia has not faced up to my arguments but has instead mistaken the merits of my proposal as a personal attack against him. Personal animosity has not at all been my motivation or my guide. I do suggest, however, from the nature of the Senator's comments on March 2 and again today that it may well be a vital consideration in his own attitude and presentation.

I am impressed by what the Senator from Virginia said in his most eloquent and persuasive manner about the splendid work the committee is doing. It may be a great program, but I submit to the Senator from Virginia that the bulk of that work logically falls within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. If that committee is not doing its job, then the committee of which the Senator from Virginia is chairman——

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. For a question.

Mr. BYRD. I should like to ask the Senator with reference to the resolution which he submitted. Why does he not have a hearing on his resolution? He is a member of the committee. I assume he is willing to let the Senate be the final judge.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am more than happy to do so.

Mr. BYRD. Instead of these guerrilla attacks which he is constantly making, let him have a hearing on his resolution and let the Senate decide the matter one way or the other.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The junior Senator from Minnesota has been cooperative with the committee of which he is a member. The committee has had the responsibility for all of the reorganization plans sent down by the President, and the committee has been extremely busy. The chairman of the committee and I discussed plans for my resolution. In view of the fact that time-consuming hearings were held on the reorganization plans, and in view of the fact that it appeared we could not get action on the proposal during this session, since the majority leader stated that the Senate would adjourn about August 1, it would be difficult to take the time to hold hearings. But I can assure the Senator from Virginia that we will hold hearings and if facts—not sentiment, not consideration such that we happened to like one another and respect one another—will tell the story, there will not be any doubt as to what will happen to the Joint Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures.

The Senator from Virginia points out that his committee is making a study of employment. That is a fine thing, and I am all for it. I have read the figures. But I would remind the Senator from Virginia that Civil Service Commission makes the same sort of study, the Bureau of the Budget makes the same kind of study, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments makes a study twice a year, a seasonal study. The information is available. The junior Senator from Minnesota has all that information in his personal files, including information from the Bureau of the Budget——

Mr. BYRD. I wish the Senator from Minnesota would make public that information.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Bureau of the Budget has all that information.

Mr. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon. It does not have that information. It does not have the number of employees in each county and city.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The junior Senator from Minnesota has the number of Federal employees in every State of the Union. All we have to do is to ask the Civil Service Commission to provide that information.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator said he had information as to every county and every locality.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota says that if the Senator from Virginia will ask the Civil Service Commission, he can get the information which I have mentioned.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is mistaken. His statement is like many other statements he has made.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The junior Senator from Minnesota is not mistaken and has State employment figures in his office. I am very confident that figures for counties and cities are also easily available from the agencies.

What about the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service? What kind of an insinuation is this upon the chairman of that committee, to be told that there has been no study made of the matter of postal employees? The subcommittee of which I am chairman has made a complete study of all the employees of the Government of the United States who would get uniforms if a uniform allowance were made. There is to be a study made of annual leave and sick leave, and hearings will be held upon that question. The Bureau of the Budget has made its preliminary report. Insofar as the Post Office Department is concerned, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service has spent months studying the matter.

I shall not belabor the point further except to observe that it is not very persuasive to say that $20,000 does not mean very much. The fact is that if we are spending $20,000 on a committee which has no function to perform under the law, it is $20,000 too much to spend. It is not $20,000 which is well spent.

The Senator from Virginia concluded his argument with the irrelevant and personal statement, "I wish the Senator from Minnesota would tell us what economy measures he has voted for." The Senator from Minnesota will answer to his constituents for his votes which are in accord with his conscience. He believes very strong in intelligent economy and has so voted. Furthermore, he has a different view of the question of economy. I happen to believe that it is economy to fight the Communists in Europe with the Marshall plan. I happen to believe that it is economy to appropriate all the funds necessary to fight the Communist menace, and to fight it not only with guns but with ideas and economic rehabilitation. I submit that the most extravagant thing that could be done would be to vote against the point 4 program, or to vote against the Marshall plan. In my opinion, that would be real extravagance.

It is a question of how we interpret economy. Some people believe it is economy to save money and not to have one's teeth fixed. I believe it is economy to have one's teeth checked regularly. Some people believe it is not economy to take care of our natural resources. I believe it is economy to take care of them. I believe it is sound economy to aid people who are fighting in defense of their homeland. Votes have been cast in the Senate which do not go in that direction. At any rate, I shall stack up the votes of the junior Senator from Minnesota with those of the Senator from Virginia. The economy which is advocated by one is the economy to cut off expenditures alone. The economy of the junior Senator from Minnesota is a matter of economizing to the point of protecting our national welfare and national security. In my judgment, such an approach is intelligent economy.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I renew my request that all the remarks pertaining to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures be placed at the end of the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

After the conclusion of Mr. ELLENDER'S speech,

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, we all agree with the Senator from Louisiana that we should be as economical as we possibly can. That is the proper attitude for us to take.

We are dealing now with a matter which is of great concern. In the first place, it has been definitely decided, and it is admitted by the Senator from Louisiana, that more space for Senators is absolutely necessary. I have on my desk answers from individual Senators as to their need for more office space, in reply to inquiries made by me as chairman of the Committee on Public Works. Sixty-eight Senators replied that more space was necessary.

The inquiry was brought about by the fact that the Eightieth Congress, in its wisdom or otherwise, did authorize the appropriation for a Senate office building, authorized the expenditure of moneys for planning and designing such a building, and authorized the expenditure of money for the purchase of the real estate necessary. I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for many years, and I recall vividly the occasion during the Eightieth Congress when the proposal was made to that committee, which was then under the chairmanship of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senate at that time authorized the expenditure.

Of course it is going to cost money, but I want my colleagues to listen to what I have to say to them. This country was created on an idea. Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and the other great men of their time created a concept of freedom and a concept of government that meant something beyond dollars and cents. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, which we all love and revere, were not idle dreams; they were concepts of free people trying to create a government.

Of necessity, and because it was right and sound, the Government was divided into three branches—the executive, the judiciary, and the Congress. Can anyone believe that in his dream of a beautiful Capitol building Washington thought of what it would cost the American people? Or did he want to make it a symbol of what the American people had created? Why are the folk in the galleries now there Is it because they come here to look at individual Senators? No; they come here to look at a symbol of free government.

Yes; we could save money. The Capitol does not have to be as it is. We could still have the columns in front, but we could save a great deal of money on other places. But do the American people want us to do that?

The Architect of the Capitol himself is authorized and instructed to proceed, just as soon as this session is concluded, to refurbish the Capitol building, the floors, and other parts. Is that being done for us as individual Senators, or is it being done to represent to the fine people of our country what this Capitol stands for? I wish every child in America could come to Washington and visit the Capitol of his country, irrespective of what it might cost the Government.

Do we judge the Capitol of our country as a matter of dollars and cents, or is it something of which we are proud, something we revere, and for which we are willing to die? Remember the boys in Korea. Remember the white crosses throughout the world. What do they represent? They represent a noble sacrifice for a principle.

Of course, we could build an office building, not for $4,000,000 or $18,000,000, but we could build it for $500,000, and give Senators all the space they needed. Is that what the American people want? The American people are willing to dig down into their pockets and give billions of dollars for war. Are they not willing to give a few million dollars to create something. A committee of this body was in Rome last fall. The Italian Government was constructing a "Union Station" for the railroads. The American people were donating $4,500,000 for that purpose. Yet there is complaint because we are trying to get something dignified for the American people while we are providing space for those who are temporarily Members of this body.

Mr. President, to me as an American the Senate means a great deal. The Capitol of the United States means much to me, not because of the fact that the people of my State were kind enough to trust me for the moment so that I could walk in and appear here before the Senate and plead for their concept of freedom of action, but because it is a dignified symbol of a great Nation.

I wish the Senator from Louisiana were present, because I should like to call attention to the fact that the pending bill contains appropriations amounting to $43,000,000,000, possibly more money than was spent by this Government in the first hundred years of its existence. It is the American people's money, but the bill contains provisions for the appropriation of money that is not to be spent for the American people, but for others.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Can the Senator from New Mexico advise me if the President has authority to stop the spending of money provided for by this appropriation in the event of an acute national emergency? I should like to know what the situation would be in that respect.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am glad the Senator brought up that point.

Mr. AIKEN. What I want to find out is whether the spending of this money in starting construction of a building would be obligatory in the event the exigencies of war dictated otherwise?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not think it would be. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that the Eightieth Congress authorized the construction of the building, authorized the purchase of the property, which has been purchased, and authorized the expenditure of money for planning. Five hundred thousand dollars has already been spent for planning. That amount of money would be completely wasted if something is not done in connection with the planning.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Vermont voted against the appropriation 2 years ago, but had in mind to vote for it at this time unless the exigencies of war dictated otherwise.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Committee on Appropriations came to a definite conclusion with respect to the erection of the building, after it had received information from 68 Senators that they wanted additional space. I have now on my desk copies of letters from 68 Senators in which they say they want additional space. I take it for granted they would not try to secure extra space unless they needed it. I have, for example, before me copies of letters, from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] and the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN]. Both Senators from New York in their letters said they needed additional space. That can easily be understood when we consider the amount of work a Senator from New York is required to do in performing his duties. When we know that a Senator from New York has only three rooms in which all his work is done, nothing else need to be said on that point.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I invite attention to a provision which is to be found on page 469 of the bill as follows:

> In apportioning any appropriation, reserves may be established to provide for contingencies, or to effect savings whenever savings are made possible by or through changes in requirements or greater efficiency of operations.

That matter was discussed in the Committee and reference was made to the fact that the President of the United States has claimed from the beginning the constitutional right——

Mr. CHAVEZ. The inherent right.

Mr. HAYDEN. That notwithstanding an appropriation is made by Congress, he can exercise his judgment as to whether or not the money should be expended.

Mr. AIKEN. Even with respect to a legislative expenditure?

Mr. HAYDEN. With respect to any expenditure. The provision is perfectly wide in its scope. Congress has never by any act gone any further than the language I have read, which I think appears for the first time in an appropriation bill, and which even authorizes the President to establish reserves "for contingencies, or to effect savings." If there were a contingency which required that this money should not be spent there is no question in my mind that the President would have authority to suspend its expenditure.

My first experience in this respect was when once I secured an appropriation to build a bridge across a stream, and made it partly reimbursable from Indian funds. The Indian Bureau did not want it to be made reimbursable, and did not want the bridge built. There was no way that I, as a Representative in Congress, could make the Bureau build the bridge. There is no way in any language contained in this bill by which Congress can compel the President actually to set in motion the steps necessary to put a measure into effect. He can stop the work if he wants to. If there were a national emergency, as the Senator from Vermont has in mind, which required the Commander in Chief of the Nation, the President, to do so, he could stop the construction. There is no question about that in my mind.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, is the Senator perfectly satisfied that there would be no competition for labor and materials with some agency which was engaged in work in connection with major warfare? The Senator feels safe on that score?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do entirely.

Mr. AIKEN. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. HAYDEN. At the beginning of the last war I brought before the Senate the Interior Department appropriation bill. It contained authorizations and appropriations for large sums of money to build hydroelectric plants, construct dams, and so forth. I stated to the Senate at that time that if, after the bill became law, we should become involved in a war, I fully expected the President of the United States to stop the construction of those works if the men and material used for such construction were needed to carry on the war. And that is exactly what the President did.

Mr. AIKEN. If I may I should like to add another word? I voted against this proposal 2 years ago because at that time there was an extreme shortage of both material and labor. I think the Members of the Senate should take what steps are necessary for them to carry on their work, and I feel free in supporting a measure such as this, because I was not one of the 68 who requested more space. But I did want to be sure that if the appropriation were made we would not find ourselves building a new office building for the Senate in competition for material and labor which might possibly be required for a war effort.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I believe the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has stated correctly what would happen in such an event. Furthermore, the instructions given to the Commission are very definite. The committee wanted to be sure, after it was found that additional space was absolutely necessary, that money was not wasted, so the committee instructed how the money should be used, and for what purpose. On page 11 of the report the following language will be found:

> After full discussion, the committee voted to request the Senate Office Building Commission to review forthwith the detailed plans of the proposed Senate Office Building with a view of simplifying the building to bring about savings, and with the expressed desire of the committee—> to make the new office building more of a working and utilitarian unit than the present plans contemplate.

I repeat, "with the expressed desire of the committee"—

Mr. President, I believe the Eightieth Congress acted in keeping with the needs of Members of the Senate, and in keeping with the dignity of the United States of America, when it authorized the construction of the building. Of course, we could build a structure on the premises for $1,000,000, but I ask in all sincerity, would we want to do so? We can afford to give $27,000,000 to Greece for the purpose of draining land in the vicinity of Athens. When we can do that, shall we say we cannot spend, in behalf of the American people, a few million dollars to house the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from New Mexico a short while ago engaged in a colloquy with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. Is it the Senator's understanding, as chairman of the Senate Building Commission, that the act gives that Commission the power to scrap the present plans and start over again if, when the Commission comes to review the plans, they believe it wise to do so?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I should like to answer my good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, in this way. I am a great believer in carrying out mandates of the Senate. The Senate said, "Save money." It is the purpose of the Commission—I am sure I speak for the other members of the Commission in saying this—to carry out that mandate. We have spent $500,000 on plans. If we can utilize any particular part of those plans, and thereby can make use of the money we have spent in that way, I think it would be within our power to do so. If it is necessary, in order to carry out that mandate, to do those things, that is what the Commission has in mind to do.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That would include, would it not, scrapping the plans, if in the opinion of the Commission, on the basis of its conclusion, it was necessary to go that far?

Mr. CHAVEZ. If the Commission had to go that far to carry out the mandate, that would be done.

The first thing the committee decided upon and insisted upon was that something be done in a hurry, but the Committee did not want waste and did not want the elaborateness called for by the plans prepared during the Eightieth Congress.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] said that we have been worrying about this matter for 6 or 7 years and now he wanted the Commission to go to work and begin construction of some kind, without waste.

That is why in the report the Commission was definitely instructed what to do. The Appropriations Committee wanted the appropriation made only for that reason. The Committee decided that Senators need more space. I shall not insert in the RECORD the names of the Senators who need more space; but 68 Senators out of the 96 need more space.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this time, to permit me to comment about the need for space?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. The one Senator, above and beyond all others in the Eightieth Congress who was responsible for the authorization of this new building, was former Senator Brooks, of Illinois, who at that time was chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

At the time I did not pay very great attention to the proposal, because coming from a State with a comparatively small population and never having utilized my full allowance for clerical hire in my office, I got along very well with the rooms I had.

However, when I inherited, because of the political change, the position formerly occupied by former Senator Brooks, of Illinois, and became chairman of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, I had not been very long in that position before I realized that Senator Brooks was fully justified in every step he had taken in this regard, because the demands upon the Committee on Rules and Administration for space are enormous. After all, the most precious thing in the Capitol of the United States and in the Senate Office Building is a square foot of space.

We had some data assembled and published for the information of the Senate; it appears in Senate Document No. 137, Eighty-first Congress, second session, entitled "Space Requirements of the United States Senate." I should like to read briefly from that document:

> In December 1909, when the Senate first occupied its newly completed office building, there were 92 Senators and 575 employees. Today there are 96 Senators and approximately 1,670 employees, or a 190.43 percent increase in total personnel.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, those figures do not include personnel from the various executive departments who have offices in the Senate Office Building; do they?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; they do not. Of course, we have liaison officers and all kinds of outside help who come to the Senate Office Building and have rooms there. That is quite necessary, of course. On the other hand, I am speaking now only of Senators themselves and of their office forces.

I read further from Senate Document No. 137:

> A survey conducted by the Architect of the Capitol in December 1949 showed a total of 846 persons then working in the offices of the Senators in the Senate Office Building. This figure did not include those working in committee rooms or the service areas of the building. The survey also revealed that 82 percent of the same 846 were working under conditions of 55 square feet of space per person. Yet Government building code practice, controlling the downtown agencies, aspires to more than 100 square feet of space for each Government employee.

We are crowded everywhere. Every Senator to whom I have talked, particularly those coming from States with large populations, is distressed at the present situation. There is no remedy except the one which has been voted by the Appropriations Committee, namely, to direct the Senate Office Building Commission to proceed with construction of the new Senate Office Building; to modify the present plans, if they are too elaborate, but to do something.

Mr. President, we made a very serious mistake last year in postponing the construction of this building. If we postpone construction for another year, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, that will mean just that much more time lost.

By means of the appropriation of the amount of money contained in this item, in accordance with the authority granted to the Commission which has charge of this matter, we can have a new Senate Office Building within a reasonable period of time.

Let me add for the information of Senators who are questioning the use of labor and material, that in the case of all contracts let throughout the United States, about which we have had reports before the committee, we have found that there is an abundance of contractors, and the bids are getting closer and closer. Unless we get into a major war, I anticipate that the new Senate Office Building can be constructed during the next year, if a contract is let, cheaper than it could have been constructed last year or the year before.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Vermont, and the other Senators interested in this matter that there was testimony before the commitee that even if we were to carry out the original plans—which were changed, under instructions of the committee—we possibly could construct the entire building for approximately $20,000,000, instead of $18,500,000. Is not that correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. As I recall, if we proceed with the 4–B plan, which would provide two-hundred-and-some-odd rooms, there would be a saving of approximately $4,600,000, while under plan 4–C there would be a saving of $7,000,000.

Mr. CHAVEZ. But under the other plan there would be a saving of $2,000,000. The architects testified that under such circumstances it would be possible to construct the building in accordance with the plan recommended by the committee and as authorized.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a question of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Certainly.

Mr. ELLENDER. Earlier in the debate I pointed out that there are 5 Senators with 6 rooms, 26 Senators with 5 rooms, and quite a number of Senators occupying rooms in the Capitol Building. Let me inquire as to what effort, if any, has been made by the Committee on Rules and Administration to redistribute those rooms, so that Senators who really need more space can obtain it, and so that space will not be used by Senators who actually do not need it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator will understand that, primarily, space is distributed on the basis of seniority. There are Senators of advanced years, and of long service in the Senate, who, because of their service, we feel are entitled to rooms in the Capitol Building, more so than other Senators are. Therefore, the assignment to such Senators of rooms in the Capitol Building is made entirely for their convenience. In a number of instances, that is the explanation for the assignment of an odd or additional room here or there, to one Senator or another.

What the Senator from Louisiana would have us do would be to take away rooms from the Senators who happen to have the few rooms which are to spare in the Capitol Building, and assign them to other Senators.

Mr. ELLENDER. Even in the Senate Office Building there are quite a number of Senators who occupy rooms which I feel certain they can spare, and yet have sufficient space left to carry on their work. I wonder whether the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration has made any effort to redistribute those rooms.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have been diligent in connection with that matter, and I have talked to Senators. Some of them have been kind enough to give up space. They regretted to do so, but it was necessary.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the Chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration assigned to me an extra room in the Capitol Building. I felt so sorry for the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], that I gave up that little space in this building. It is a little cubbyhole up next to the room occupied by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico neglects to say that the reason that room was assigned to him was because he suffered a very serious operation, and he had to have a resting place in the Capitol Building, because of his health.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Whatever the reason was, I have turned the room back to the junior Senator from New York, and he has as many as four or five young women using that room. I know that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] has as many as eight persons using one room. All of us know that even the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] does not disagree as to the need for space.

Those of us who serve on the Senate Office Building Commission are called upon to get construction of the new Senate Office Building under way. As the leading country in the world, I think we should have the new building. Of course, one could be built for $1,000,000 or even for $500,000, for that matter; but I do not think the Senate wants to proceed in that way.

I assure the Senator from Louisiana that this mandate from the Appropriations Committee will be carried out by the Senate Office Building Commission.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. In distributing the additional space, as I understand, the Commission, through the Committee on Rules and Administration, will see to it that each Senator is given five rooms.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That depends upon the kind of building we erect. We want to carry out this mandate.

Mr. ELLENDER. But, under either plan, as I understand, either plan 4–B or the original plan——

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not think we are confined to any particular plan which has been submitted heretofore.

Mr. ELLENDER. Not to a plan, but I am talking about an assignment of rooms. The point I wanted to explore with the Senator is this: Has he ever consulted Senators to determine whether they could get along with three rooms or four, instead of an average of five?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am not a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, hence I have not done so. As chairman of the Committee on Public Works, I wrote to every Senator, stating that we were considering this particular matter, and requesting a statement of whether he needed more office space.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator will read those letters, he will discover that most of the Senators said that although they could use more space, that they did not need it acutely.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Certainly.

Mr. ELLENDER. I would like to again invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that at present there are 5 Senators who have 6 rooms each, 26 Senators with 5 rooms each, and 35 Senators with 4 rooms each. I am one of those 35 Senators, and I want to say that I do not want and do not need more than four rooms. I am sure there are many other Senators who feel as I do. As a matter of fact, I know of some Senators who do not want more than three rooms, simply because they do not need more than three.

With respect to the necessity for the additional rooms, the point I want to emphasize is that under the plan the Commission has adopted, it apparently without consultation allots five rooms to each Senator. Irrespective of whether he needs that many, the same old plan is followed.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Senator from Louisiana is completely in error. The Commission does not assign rooms.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am aware of that, but I maintain that the Commission is seeking to provide five rooms for each Senator regardless of who assigns them to specific Senators.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Committee on Rules and Administration assigns rooms.

Mr. ELLENDER. But, if the Senator will read from the report just cited by the distinguished Senator from Arizona, he will note that even by providing five rooms for each Senator, there will be an excess of many rooms. I feel certain that we are going to have an excess of many fine hearing rooms, which have been used heretofore in the present Senate Office Building, but which will be designated subcommittee rooms.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am trying to impress upon the Senator from Louisiana the fact that, whether we like it or not, and notwithstanding it is contrary to the way

I should have done things, we are not now discussing the plans which were originally submitted. We are now discussing an item in the appropriation bill for 1951, and an instruction by the Appropriations Committee as to how we shall proceed. That does not call for five rooms for every Senator, or for three rooms for every Senator. It instructs the Commission to provide the space, and to proceed with the work.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it the Senator's contention that the Commission can now change the present plans and use the money provided, without endangering the right of whoever performs the work to receive payment?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Of course, he is going to be paid.

Mr. ELLENDER. But it has to be done according to law.

Mr. CHAVEZ. And it has to be done also according to plans.

Mr. ELLENDER. But as I pointed out, this appropriation is being made to carry out plans already prepared and already submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CHAVEZ. No.

Mr. ELLENDER. We tried to change those plans. Several Senators, including the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Here is the item:

Construction and equipment of additional Senate Office Building: To enable the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Senate Office Building Commission * * * to continue to provide for the construction and equipment of a fireproof office building for the use of United States Senate, $10,000,000.

It then proceeds to give an instruction as to how the Commission shall proceed.

Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. AIKEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. ELLENDER. While I am on that point, I should like again to say to my distinguished friend that we are proceeding now under an authorization to provide money with which to build a Senate Office Building, in accordance with plans already drafted. The law states:

Construction and equipment of * * * building: To enable the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Senate Office Building Commission, at a total cost, exclusive of site and other expenses authorized under the preceding paragraph, not to exceed $20,600,000, and in substantial accordance with the preliminary plans prepared under authority of the act of July 11, 1947.

Mr. CHAVEZ. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, let us get the question straightened out as to the law. It is correct that the original law is as stated, except we did not carry it on to the total.

Construction and equipment of buildings: To enable the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Senate Office Building Commission—

This is the original law—

at a total cost, exclusive of sites and other expenses authorized under the preceding paragraph, not to exceed $20,600,000, and in substantial accordance with the preliminary plans prepared under the authority of the act of July 11, 1947 (Public Law 169, 80th Cong.), and approved by the Senate Office Building Commission——

Mr. ELLENDER. They drafted it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. With what?—

with such modifications as may be necessary or advantageous to provide for the construction and equipment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, could I refresh the memory of the Senator from New Mexico?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. In the committee, as this proposal was originally submitted, it was tied down to that act.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. It was the deliberate judgment of the committee that it should not be tied down tightly to it. The committee struck out the reference to the act, and it does not appear in the bill as it is today.

Mr. ELLENDER. But the authorization comes from that act. It comes from the same law. Otherwise, it would be out of order.

Mr. CHAVEZ. But this is part of the same law:

with such modifications as may be necessary or advantageous to provide for the construction and equipment of a fireproof office building.

What has been done but to give instructions as to how to proceed?

Mr. ELLENDER. I simply want to inform my distinguished friend that the legislative counsel is of opinion that if substantial changes are made in the present plans there may be difficulty in the contractor getting his money. I say that if the plan is changed to the extent of eliminating the 18 large hearing rooms, the auditorium, and other things, difficulty may arise as to the ability of the contractor to collect.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Do not worry. There will be plenty of contractors who will be tickled pink to be awarded the contract.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Certainly.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico one more question. It has already been indicated that if the men and material needed in the construction of the building are needed in the war effort, the President may order the construction stopped or slowed down. Can the Senator from New Mexico tell us whether the Building Commission itself would have authority to slow down the construction of the building without waiting for a directive?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Let me repeat, if I may, that the Commission is to carry out a duty. I happen to be the chairman of the Senate Office Building Commission. The other members are the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE]. I have faith in that Commission. We believe in obeying a mandate of the United States Senate. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] made a statement before the Commission which was as long as that which he has made on the floor today. It was a very able speech.

I read from the report of the committee:

After full discussion, the committee voted to request the Senate Office Building Commission to review forthwith—

Which, in my opinion, means exactly what the law says, in order that the new plan may be advantageous for the purpose for which it is required—to review forthwith the detailed plans of the proposed Senate Office Building—

For what purpose, and with what view?—

with a view of simplifying the building to bring about savings, and with the expressed desire of the committee to make the new office building more of a working and utilitarian unit than the present plans contemplate. When this review is completed and the plans revised to meet the suggestions of the Commission, the construction is to go forward as expeditiously as is practicable in an effort to relieve the congestion and crowding that now exists in the offices of many Senators and in the space allotted to each committee of the Senate.

We think we have the authority, in view of the war effort, with the increased use of steel, cement, and gravel, to stop the construction, if necessary.

Mr. AIKEN. Then the Senator is perfectly satisfied that nowhere in the bill is there any mandate for the Commission to continue with the construction of the building in competition with any war effort unless stopped by an order of the President.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am positive of it, and I am positive that that is the attitude of the Commission.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. I think the statement should be in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAVEZ. As I stated previously, Mr. President, there is very little difference of opinion as between the attitude of the Senator from Louisiana and that of the Senator from New Mexico. It goes only to the question of what type of building should be constructed. I went along with the original plans. I voted for them originally in the Eightieth Congress. I thought it was necessary. I thought if we had a type of country which could afford to spend billions upon billions of dollars elsewhere, we certainly should not be stingy with ourselves in providing office space for Senators.

We could have saved money through a different type of construction. I have seen this body appropriate many millions of dollars for buildings in the city of Washington. The first chapter of this particular appropriation bill provides for the District of Columbia $12,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. Was there any complaint with regard to that? Not a bit. But if we try to provide office space in a dignified building, we hear it said that we ought to save money. We provided millions of dollars for a new courthouse in the city of Washington, within a few blocks of the Capitol, for 15 judges, including the municipal court judges, but complaint is made because we want an office building in keeping with the dignity of the Nation. We provided $25,000,000 for a building for the General Accounting Office. Did anyone complain about that? We appropriated millions of dollars for buildings for the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and other Government departments.

It is not a question of the expenditure of the money. I want to save as much money as does anyone else, but I am not in favor of lowering the dignity of this body. We should not go back on the concept which Jefferson had in mind with reference to the Capitol. It is all right to save a million dollars here and there.

I again invite attention to the guests we have with us. Did they come to see the Senator from New Mexico or any other Senator? No; they did not. They came to see the Senate of the United States. The Senate should act as a symbol of the idea which has made this country what it is. The city of Washington was originally laid out with the concept of having the dignity befitting the center of a great nation. Long before the Declaration of Independence, Benjamin Franklin was possibly dreaming that eventually somewhere within the Thirteen Colonies there would be a capitol. For what purpose? To satisfy individual Senators or to satisfy the American people?

The concept was embodied in works of such illustrious men as Thomas Jefferson, who was himself an architect of repute, and of other architects of the time who believed in a living development of classic architecture, that is to say, an organized arrangement of simple forms on dignified lines.

I have been to Charlottesville and to Monticello, Mr. President, and I have seen the work of the illustrious Jefferson, the manual work he performed. That is why I appreciate what he did when he thought and dreamed of the Capitol of the United States.

The Thirteen Colonies were small, Mr. President, but we have made more progress in raising the standards of living of a free people than has been accomplished in Europe, with thousands of years of effort. Europe has not yet reached the standard developed under the concept of the founders of the Capital of the United States.

We can build a barn for the United States Senate and provide plenty of space, but I hope we shall not do that.

All the official buildings of Washington, the Capitol, the White House, the Senate and House Office Buildings, the United States Supreme Court Building, embody the principles and concepts to which I have referred. All these buildings in their various forms, express the idea. They are different from purely commercial structures designed along functional lines, without dignity, and meant solely for functional uses.

Who wants Washington to be a commercial city? Washington is not the industrial center of the United States, but it represents the concepts and the ideals which have made possible the great industrial centers of the United States. It represents a political philosophy of a free people. It represents the hope and the confidence of free peoples throughout the world. That is why we must build along the lines which I have suggested.

These buildings have become a symbol of the seat of Government for all America. The American people have always viewed these buildings with love and respect. They do not visit Washington in order to see me or to see any other Senator. Of course, we have individual visitors from our home States, but when visitors come here by bus loads, they come to see the capital of the United States, and we love to have them here.

The American people have always viewed these buildings with love and respect and they cherish them as a symbol of their hopes, their unity, their growth, and the splendor of the Nation which they have built. They should be proud. We should be proud, Mr. President. We should not be stingy in our efforts to promote the beauty and glory of the capital of the Nation.

When the present Senate and House wings of the Capitol were planned and built shortly before the trying days of the Civil War—and let us remember that we had a Civil War, and it was necessary that we show our unity—they were of dignified design and even in those days were constructed of marble, in keeping with the dignity of our Government. Oh, Mr. President, we can construct a building of white pine. We can save money, and give it to Europe. We can give it to Asia. We can give it to anybody. However, we are asked to save money on these plans.

The present Senate and House Office Buildings and the United States Supreme Court Building, subsequently planned and constructed, were also planned and built along lines of dignified design, and they are likewise constructed of marble. Would anyone want the Supreme Court Building and the House and Senate Office Buildings to be of a different design than in the dream of Jefferson? I am sure no one would want that.

The proposed new Senate Office Building has been planned along lines of similar dignity and in harmony with the Capitol and other buildings in the vicinity of the Capitol.

The project was authorized by the Eightieth Congress, to be carried forward in substantial accordance with preliminary plans approved by the Senate Office Building Commission in June 1948. The detailed plans were developed during the period August 1948 to April 1949. They were approved by the Senate Office Building Commission, as presently composed, in April 1949.

Since that time—and I call this to the attention of the Senator from Louisiana—the Senate Committee on Appropriations has taken different action, and it is the duty of the Commission to follow that action.

This is not a new Commission. It has been in continuous existence since 1904. That is 46 years, Mr. President. This Commission not only directed the construction of the three original wings of the Senate Office Building, but also the construction of the fourth or First street wing in 1931–33, the alteration of the C Street facade of the building, and the completion of the approaches to the building.

Congress has seen fit for the past 46 years to entrust this Commission with the direction of construction of quarters for the United States Senate and the Commission has always been composed of both majority and minority representation. From 1904 to 1947, the Commission consisted of three Senators. In 1947, the membership of the Commission was increased from three to five Senators.

When the Senate Office Building preliminary plans were authorized in 1947, the Commission consisted of former Senators Revercomb, Brooks, and Overton, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. When the preliminary plans were approved, in July 1948, and the new building project authorized, the Commission consisted of former Senators Revercomb and Brooks, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The Commission as presently constituted consists of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], and the present speaker.

Mr. President, I hope that this body will want to take care of itself. Oh, we can vote billions of dollars without batting an eye. We can appropriate automobiles for third-class clerks in a department, and we can appropriate travel money for departments. However, when it comes to doing something for the people of the United States we are told that we must be extremely careful that we do not waste the people's money. Mr. President, not only the Building Commission but the Committee on Public Works and the Committee on Appropriations, after due deliberation and consideration, reported this item to the Senate. We feel justified in asking Members of the Senate to stand by the committee and not approve any amendments with respect to this item.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, at this point in my remarks, the letters from Senators which I discussed during my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,

MY DEAR SENATOR: You wrote me on August 19 with reference to my thoughts on the necessity for a new Senate Office Building.

Almost complete plans had been made for the new Senate Office Building, during the Eightieth Congress, before I learned of them.

Certainly there is a shortage of space for the Senators from the larger States who have more than the minimum number of clerks in their offices.

I believe the idea of an additional story on the present office building was not investigated thoroughly enough. Also, additional room could be provided if several unused and unnecessary elevator shafts were done away with. Also, there are several unnecessary departmental liaison offices still in the building.

I believe the block of land across the street east from the present office building could be used to great advantage as a parking lot for the cars of Senate office employees.

Sincerely yours,

CHAN GURNEY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have your letter of August 18 with reference to present office space and additional needs. In reply I wish to advise that I believe additional space is needed. I believe it can be secured on a basis acceptable generally to the membership of the Congress. Frankly, I do not think we need as much space as was contemplated in the plans heretofore discussed. It occurs to me that serious thought could be given to the development of a plan for a new building and the construction of one wing at a time as needs would justify.

I am quite aware of the real need for more garage space. I think this could be taken care of in the basement.

I will be glad to discuss this with you further at your pleasure.

With every good wish, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT S. KERR.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
August 20, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter of the 19th which reopens the discussion on the Senate Office Building.

I can easily realize that it might seem more practical to get plans drawn up for the new office building without submitting those plans to the criticism and suggestions of the Senate. You would have so many different ideas, so strongly expressed and so at variance with each other, that you would be fearful of getting nowhere.

On the other hand, you have had the example of the difficulties of the opposite course. Doubt as to the project was aroused in the minds of many Senators including myself as to the size and lavishness of the project; the whole thing burst on us without warning, and the first reaction was unfavorable in a body which is for the most part deeply concerned with economy.

My personal requirements are for one more room and three toilets. They need to be good sized rooms, larger than those which face on the court of the old office building. I would like to stay right where I am and have another room added to the suite, made available by the general redistribution resulting from the new building if it is built.

With regard to the building itself, I would strongly urge that you display the floor plans in some convenient spot such as the Senate Caucus Room.

My own suggestions would be that we provide only for new committee rooms and suites for committee chairmen, plus a new Senate and staff restaurant with its own staff and kitchens. This will relieve pressure on the crowded dining rooms in the Capitol, which however, will be still the major facility for the Senators and their Capitol staff while the Congress is in session.

It would seem that these results can be obtained by completing the ell whose sides front on Constitution Avenue and First Street. Removal of the corresponding committee offices will leave a lot of space available for storage at the subway level of our old building. These are the suggestions which I would like to see carried out.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH E. FLANDERS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 20, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This is in reply to your communication of August 18 with respect to construction of a New Senate Office Building to house Senate Committees. I sincerely appreciate the opportunity to comment on this proposal.

We are quite comfortable in two of the three rooms assigned to me, Suite 252. The center room, between the reception room and my office, is very crowded, in that four and oftentimes five of my staff are required to perform office functions in a very small area. In fact, my Administrative Assistant has space in this office, and is constantly meeting visitors without privacy, which, in my opinion, is not in accordance with the dignity of his office. One additional room would benefit us considerably.

If your committee desires personal comment to justify the construction of this building I would be pleased to attend one of your meetings.

With personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LESTER C. HUNT.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
August 20, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I appreciate your letter of August 18, relative to the projected new Senate Office Building. Of course my staff and I find our three-room suite inadequate and I have been trying to get a four-room suite for some time.

I shall give specific thought to the matter and will discuss the situation with you later.

With kindest regards, I remain,

Yours faithfully,

SPESSARD L. HOLLAND.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY,
August 19, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have your letter of August 18, and thank you for the opportunity to give you a statement of my experience with present office facilities.

For the first 4 years of my term, I occupied a three-room suite which was quite inadequate. On January 1 of this year, I was fortunate to acquire another room which, while an improvement, is still inadequate considering the number of personnel required on my staff, the necessity for crowding several people in each room, along with filing equipment, and storage space. I could, therefore, definitely use another room.

I feel that one of the vital needs is for larger committee hearing rooms and sufficient space for committee staff quarters which are now wholly inadequate.

With kind regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,

B. B. HICKENLOOPER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
February 27, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I apologize for the long delay in replying to your letter of February 14, wherein you invite me to comment on the adequacy of the office space which I now use in the discharge of my duties here in the Capitol.

For some time past I have found my quarters quite inadequate to conduct the business of a State as large as Pennsylvania, and have from time to time been compelled to rent outside space in order that my staff could be properly quartered. Most of the girls work under severe handicaps and most trying conditions, and I am looking forward eagerly to the time when this might be corrected.

Thank you for your interest in writing me.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS J. MYERS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1950.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: I want to thank you for giving me an opportunity to express my views on the adequacy of my present office space.

I am satisfied with what I have, of course, under the circumstances. The record will show that I have a three-room suite, but certainly I would use an additional room and maybe two. This is not from the standpoint of additional space for comfort but for adequate working space in connection with my duties in the Senate.

I think it is wise for the Legislative Appropriations Committee to give consideration to the suggestions of the Senate Office Building Commission to provide adequate working space for Members of the Senate.

Kindest regards and all best wishes.

Sincerely,

HARRY DARBY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
February 23, 1950.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thanks very much for your recent letter inquiring whether or not I consider my present office space and the facilities of the Foreign Relations Committee ample or inadequate.

At the present time the space allotted to me in the Senate Office Building for my office staff is ample to meet our requirements. On the other hand, I have been attempting for the past year to secure additional space for the Foreign Relations Committee. As you may know, the committee and its staff are confined to the committee room proper and two additional rooms in the Senate wing of the Capitol. We find this space quite inadequate. Since I took over the chairmanship a year ago, it has been necessary for two of our staff members to use the office space which has been normally assigned to the chairman. I am very hopeful that we may be able to find one or two additional rooms so that the committee work may not be hampered by lack of space.

With cordial good wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

TOM CONNALLY, Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have your letter of August 23 referring to the new Senate Office Building and also asking questions concerning the office facilities afforded us at the present time. Senator CHAVEZ, our office space is very inadequate and it is most difficult for my staff to do their work. We are crowded into three rooms. I have requested additional room several times, but have always been informed that it is not available, and in the meantime my staff continues to work under the handicap of crowded, congested office space where efficient office functioning is most difficult.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. THYE,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR
AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
September 22, 1949.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your inquiry concerning the adequacy of my Senatorial office, I regret to inform you that our space is entirely insufficient for the personnel permitted a Senator from the State of California. I am somewhat more fortunate in that I have a total of 4 offices rather than the three allocated to many Senators, but nevertheless I find it necessary to have some of my personnel working outside the office and some assigned to California, although I would prefer to have them in Washington if I had sufficient space for them.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

SHERIDAN DOWNEY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
October 7, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Committee on Public Works, United States Senate

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Some time ago I wrote you a memorandum and then held it up, eventually misplacing it. This was with reference to your letter of August 22 regarding the proposed new Senate office building.

Quite frankly, I want to add my experience to a number of others you no doubt know of who, while we are first year men, find ourselves in cramped quarters, even though we may not have the volume of work our seniors have.

Naturally I want to be economical, but the volume of mail and the requests from my home State, to say nothing of my activitives in committee and related matters, require that I do not cut down on my office staff. I have seven on my staff at present and find that I must add to this number, and you can readily see what that means by way of office space and filing accommodations.

I hope this gives you some idea of how I feel about needed office space.

Sincerely,

ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY
February 15, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Public Works Committee, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This will acknowledge your letter of February 14, which has been received in the absence of Senator Long in Louisiana. I have discussed the matter with him by telephone since receipt of your letter.

If I correctly understand, he is not prepared to take any position with reference to the new building. At the same time, we are faced with considerable difficulty in trying to operate our office in very cramped quarters; and, because of an extremely heavy volume of work, we have found it necessary to split our operations into shifts, with a small group working at night.

Sincerely yours,

BRUCE TUCKER,
Administrative Assistant.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
February 15, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thanks for your letter and as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I shall of course give every consideration to the thoughts expressed by the various Senators. As far as I am personally concerned I have sufficient space.

Sincerely yours,

BURNET R. MAYBANK.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
February 16, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building Commission,
Senate Office Building.

DEAR DENNIS: Your letter of February 14, supplementing your letter of August 18 with regard to the proposed new Senate Office Building, has been received.

I appreciate your bringing this to my attention at this time, and in connection therewith, I should like to say that my suite in the Senate Office Building is at present definitely inadequate. We have felt the need for additional office space for some time and in the past 2 years, this need has become acute. I now have a three-room suite with an additional room downstairs in the basement for storage purposes. Another room could be used to good advantage.

With every good wish,

Sincerely yours,

C. W. TOBEY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
February 16, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: I am in receipt of your letter of February 14 relative to space in the Senate Office Building.

As you will recall, last year I voted against going ahead with the building because I felt we should not ask other departments to cut down their expenses and not agree to do so ourselves. To answer your question specifically, as far as I personally am concerned, of course I could use more space in my office.

I am a member of the subcommittee on legislative appropriations and certainly will be only too happy to look into this matter very fully when the subcommittee meets.

With best regards and thanks for writing me, I am,

Sincerely,

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON RULES
AND ADMINISTRATION,
February 16, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Your note of February 14 was awaiting me when I returned to Washington.

I want to be entirely consistent in replying to your query as to the matter for additional space in the Senate Office Building. Although I have been among those who have insisted on the utmost economy in governmental expenditures, I can readily appreciate the insistent demand for enlarged quarters.

As one's tenure in the Senate grows there is additional demand made for additional services. I find myself in that situation and can honestly tell you that we are in need of at least one more room.

I regret the delay in replying.

With kindest personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

W. E. JENNER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
Committee on Public Works,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your letter of recent date, in which you request my views with respect to the proposed new office building, I might cite the fact that for several years I have been seeking an additional office, in order to relieve congestion in my present quarters.

I am not familiar with conditions in other Senators' offices, but I do know it has been impossible for me to find the additional space in the Senate Office Building, which my constantly increasing volume of business requires.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT R. O'CONOR.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I appreciate your letter with regard to my office space.

I find that my staff is very much crowded; however, I am not pressing that a new building be built because of our special congestion in this office.

With appreciation of your consideration, I am,

Sincerely yours,

FRANK GRAHAM.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: I agree with the general statement of conditions in the Senate Office Building contained in your letter of August 18 last, which I regret escaped my attention. Not only do I find space insufficient, as chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and as chairman of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, but my own quarters are scarcely sufficient for the activities of such a staff as any Senator now requires.

The responsibilities of Congress are steadily increasing, as everyone knows. As the duties of the committees continue to increase along with the business of each Senator's office, the present inadequacy of space in the Senate Office Building will, in my judgment, only result in making more difficult the accomplishment of our responsibilities.

With every good wish.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
February 15, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This acknowledges receipt of your letter relative to Senate Office space. This is the only letter from you that has been called to my attention relative to this matter. I presume your former letter was misplaced.

I am not familiar with the conditions in all the offices. I should prefer to have the result of the investigation from all of them, as I would be willing to forego any convenience to myself if all the other Senators are properly provided for. I am ready to abide by the decision of the committees handling the matter.

Thank you for calling this to my attention.

Yours very truly,

GARRETT L. WITHERS,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This will acknowledge your letter to Senator LODGE. It arrives as he is temporarily out of the office on a trip taken in connection with his official duties. I will show him your letter as soon as he returns and assure you that it will have his immediate attention.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANCIS MCCARTHY,
Secretary to Senator Lodge.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
October 6, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thanks for your letter of August 19, which I have just seen on my return to the office, regarding space in the Senate Office Building.

I have always felt that if a diagram of the Senate Office Building and the Senate wing of the Capitol were made available to every Senator showing the allocation of each room that we could then judge better whether we needed more space or not. As you know, however, this has always been considered a very confidential matter and it seems impossible for the rank and file of Senators to know how the rooms are used.

I have not studied the drawings for the proposed new Senate Office Building carefully, but I did look at them once and I noted what seemed to me to be rather a grave defect in the planning. In the proposed new committee rooms, there was a very inadequate amount of space allowed behind the places where the members of the committees are supposed to sit. One of the troubles in the Finance Committee room in the present Senate Office Building and in the caucus room, as well as in the Appropriations Committee and Foreign Relations Committee rooms, is that the space behind the Senators is so small that there is always a great deal of congestion and noise. If we are to have a new Senate Office Building, the committee rooms should be designed so that there is plenty of room behind the Senators for the members of their staffs and their advisers to sit and for messengers to pass by without constantly causing a realinement of chairs. I think that this is one respect in which we should learn from experience.

In fact, I think it would be wasteful, not to say stupid, for us to put up a new Senate Office Building in which the errors of the present building were blindly repeated.

With best wishes,

Very sincerely yours,

H. C. LODGE, Jr.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter regarding the new building, the principal criticism which I have heard from other Senators is that the plans for the proposed building are much too elaborate. From what I have heard, I believe a new building constructed along more functional lines, as many of our modern business buildings are, will attract the support of the Senators. Generally speaking, I think our public buildings are about as inefficient and wasteful of space as any I know. Personally, a small detached room for some privacy would be extremely convenient. Otherwise, my office is quite satisfactory.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

J. W. FULBRIGHT.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON RULES

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ.
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: My rather brief experience here serves to convince me that the facts contained in your letter of August 19 are true, beyond any question of doubt. However, I am so deeply concerned about the fiscal problems of our Government that I hesitate to subscribe to any program which will impose new burdens upon our taxpayers unless that program is absolutely essential to the needs of the people.

And now, with respect to the proposed new Senate Office Building, I know that it would be helpful insofar as the Senators are personally concerned but actually is it not true that we can get along without it until we reduce some of the other expenditures of government? Many times during the recent war I had to work in offices which were virtually pig sties and on some occasions my office was nothing more or nothing less than a security box in a badly damaged building, but somehow I was still able to produce, and as I look back over some of the records in my files I am not at all ashamed of the quality which that work discloses.

As a new Member of the Senate I am extremely anxious to cooperate with my colleagues in anything which will be helpful to their worthy objectives, but in this instance, I cannot bring myself to the view that the expenditure is justified at this time.

Perhaps some day you and I should sit down together and discuss this whole problem in detail—maybe you can convince me that I am in error. I certainly will be the first to admit it, if that is so.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON.

DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your kind letter of August 19, regarding the proposed new Senate Office Building.

In answer to your inquiry, I find that my office facilities are adequate. While I could undoubtedly make use of additional space, yet I believe the necessary functions of the office can be carried out within our presently allotted suite.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter of August 23 making inquiry regarding my situation as to office space.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have yours of August 22 about building an additional Senate Office Building.

I am opposed to spending money to increase present quarters and facilities until we have successfully balanced the budget. When we have done that, it will be time to consider this matter.

DEAR DENNIS: This will acknowledge and thank you for your recent letter concerning the new Senate Office Building, of which you are committee chairman.

I deeply appreciate your writing me concerning the possibility of obtaining additional space, but I have four rooms now, and feel that four rooms is ample space for my office staff.

Hoping you are well, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of February 14 in regard to the proposed new Senate Office Building, and I regret that I did not reply to your letter last summer about this matter.

Since Delaware is next to the smallest State in area in the Union, I find that my office space of three rooms is adequate to my present needs. Should it become necessary to make any new additions to my staff, additional space would be desirable.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours sincerely,

Hon. ELMER THOMAS,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building east of the present Senate Office Building was temporarily delayed as a result of objections by a few Senators.

As Chairman of the new Senate Office Building Commission, I have given considerable thought to the matter, and it is my observation that most of the Senators and committees now housed in the Senate Office Building are sorely crowded for space. Since we will try to go ahead in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress with plans for the new Senate Office Building, I write you in the hope that you will take a few moments to give me a few expressions about the new Senate Office Building and your own space conditions.

Not a few of the committee chairmen have voiced the complaint to me that there are not enough committee rooms available when Congress hits even a normal business cycle. We find three or four committees trying to borrow rooms every day, and in the case of my own Committee on Public Works, were we to lend our committee room, it means the Public Works staff must stop its business because there is no place for them to work aside from the committee room. We are forced into the situation of operating with only one subcommittee at a time, unless we are fortunate enough to borrow another room, and we have succeeded in borrowing facilities only about three or four times in the last 6 months.

Perhaps you know that we have proposed in the new Senate Office Building to house the committee chairmen, the committee staffs, and the office staffs of the chairmen. We had thought that this consolidation of all committee activities in one building would greatly increase the efficiency of the committee work and at the same time release substantial space now occupied by committees and their chairmen for use by other Senators.

I am inquiring of not only the committee chairmen, but the individual Senators about office space for their staffs. I wonder if you would be good enough to give me a statement of your experience with your committee facilities and tell me whether or not you consider them ample or inadequate. I should like a separate expression on whether or not you consider your own office facilities adequate for your staff for your State work. Any statistics on present and future staff and space needs would also be very helpful.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission.

AUGUST 18, 1949.

Hon. GEORGE D. AIKEN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building east of the present Senate Office Building was temporarily delayed as a result of objections by a few Senators.

As Chairman of the New Senate Office Building Commission, I have given considerable thought to the matter, and it is my observation that most of the Senators and committees now housed in the Senate Office Building are sorely crowded for space. Since we will try to go ahead in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress with plans for the new Senate Office Building, I write you in the hope that you will take a few moments to give me a few expressions about the new Senate Office Building and your own space conditions.

Perhaps you know that we proposed in the new Senate Office Building to house the committee chairmen, the committee staffs, and the office staffs of the chairmen. We had thought that this consolidation of all committee activities in one building would greatly increase the efficiency of the committee work and at the same time release substantial space now occupied by committees and their chairmen for use by other Senators.

The Architect of the Capitol estimates that if the new Senate Office Building could be constructed and the committees and committee chairmen moved into it, it would make an average of one more room available for the individual Senators and their staffs. To me, that addition of one more room on the average would materially help in the space situation.

I am fully cognizant of the cramped quarters in which many Senators find themselves, and it is my hope that we can work out some program of construction and realinement which would make for more satisfactory working conditions for the Senators.

My only thought in continuing to press for the new Senate Office Building is the uncontested fact that the Senators do not have sufficient space to accomplish properly their every-day missions in their offices. I am confident that something to provide relief can be accomplished in the second session if the Senators will give the Commission members their wholehearted support.

I wonder if you would be good enough to give me a statement of your experience with your office facilities and tell me whether or not you consider them ample or inadequate. Any statistics on present and future staff and space needs would also be very helpful.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission.

DEAR DENNIS: I have just returned to my office after being away to recuperate from a recurrence of a virus pneumonia attack I suffered last November, and am taking the first opportunity to reply to your letter of February 14 in which you make inquiry concerning my feelings about the proposed new Senate Office Building.

I am of the same opinion I had a year ago and that is that we need such a new Senate Office Building. So far as I personally am concerned, I need additional space for the efficient operation of my office.

With every good wish,

Sincerely yours,

STYLES BRIDGES.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 19, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of August 18 inquiring about (1) office space for committee and staff work and (2) space for our regular senatorial duties received and noted.

Frankly I must say that it seems to me that so far as my committee and staff work is concerned we have ample space for the Committee on Appropriations over in the Capitol.

I have four rooms over here and we are not cramped at all so far as I know.

However, since the Senate has decided to have an additional building and additional space I shall not put anything in the way but will go along with my colleagues.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely your friend,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE,
August 19, 1949.

The Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I received your letter of August 18th in regard to the possible construction of a new Senate Office Building. You asked me to write to you giving a statement of my experience with my present office facilities and whether or not I consider them ample or inadequate.

I can answer very briefly and pointedly. My physical office facilities are extremely inadequate from the standpoint of space. We currently have three rooms, approximately 15 feet by 25 feet. One of these three rooms is my personal office. We have eleven people on the staff. Ten of whom are crowded into the two remaining rooms. My administrative assistant shares my office primarily due to lack of space.

Frankly, it is impossible to care for more than a limited number of constituents at one time. I simply do not have sufficient space for chairs to even allow my friends and constituents as they arrive from Minnesota to sit down.

This extreme shortage of physical area, I firmly believe, is a handicap to good office procedure and efficient work. Every member of the staff constantly has the feeling that he is either under someone else's feet or that someone else in turn is under his feet.

Then, of course, there is the very major problem from the standpoint of inadequacy of filing area. As you well know there is a tremendous amount of correspondence in a Senatorial office and filing becomes a major problem. We currently have nine files and could well use twice this many.

Also, as you know, it is necessary that we keep sufficient supplies in the immediate office to handle the many hundreds of letters every day. As it is at present members of my staff must make frequent visits to our storeroom in the attic to replenish the supply of working materials.

Inasmuch as the State of Minnesota is currently within 60,000 of reaching a population of three million, I have every reason to believe that my staff will increase in size within the next year or so. Under present office arrangements we could not accommodate additional people, though we might have the budget and the need is dire.

I assure you of my wholehearted support in your efforts to prevail upon the Senate to appropriate the funds for the construction of the new Senate Office Building.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
August 20, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the projected new Senate Office Building, I wish to go on record as definitely in favor.

As you know, I am chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and as such must of necessity have a full staff in order to handle the heavy work load. The members of my staff are working under a handicap in that there is not sufficient space. If there were available connecting rooms for the professional staff members, I believe the output of work would be increased, since when there are hearings scheduled the staff members must refrain from conducting business. This is a great loss of valuable time.

I am heartily in favor of this new building, and sincerely hope that action will be taken as soon as possible to proceed with the project.

Further, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I have the Immigration Subcommittee. The subcommittee is now located in room 449. If you were to go there, I believe that alone would be a selling point for the new building. It was necessary for me to place four or five of my stenographers in the corridor in a poorly lighted place. This, too, is not conducive to good work.

My kindest personal regards and all good wishes to you.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 20, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I wish to go on record as being most heartily in favor of the new Senate Office Building.

My present office space is overcrowded and inadequate for my office staff, and I am convinced if sufficient space were available, it would be conducive to better work, more work, as well as beneficial to the health of my employees.

I hope you will make this letter a part of your file in favor of the new Senate Office Building.

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate.

DEAR DENNIS: I have your note of August 19, and want to say that I am in favor of an additional Senate Office Building, as you already know. I voted for it in committee, and also on the floor of the Senate.

At the present time I do not have room enough for all of my office force, and have three of them housed downtown. This is not the condition that makes for utmost efficiency and I think that each Senator should have at least four rooms and some of us need five to do proper work.

I hope that you will present this matter during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

Sincerely,

GEORGE W. MALONE.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: For some time I have planned to discuss with you the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building, and to express to you my views regarding the urgent need for the building and the additional space which it would afford.

While I am speaking for myself just now, I have talked with several Senators who take the same attitude I do, and we are all of the opinion that a great many of the Senators are in need of more office space.

As you perhaps know, I occupy a suite consisting of three rooms. I find this space wholly inadequate for my present staff. The crowded conditions under which they work are certainly not conductive to the most efficient performance of their duties. My administrative assistant shares a room with three other employees who are surrounded by 11 file cabinets and several bookcases. Between their desks there is hardly room to place the chairs. Such a situation makes it impossible not only to extend to constituents and others the courtesy of a private interview, which very often is desirable, but also to properly analyze legislation and other material which is necessary to digest.

The inadequacy of office facilities in my own case causes me to express the fervent hope that the construction of the new building may be started at the earliest date possible, and I assure you that your commission will have my wholehearted support in its endeavor to bring this about.

Sincerely yours,

CLINTON P. ANDERSON,

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: Your letter of August 18, regarding the great need which some of us have for more office space, is very greatly appreciated. As you may know, I have four rooms, one of them apart from the others. This situation leaves me in a terribly cramped condition; as a matter of fact, one of my staff has to work in my own private office while the other staff members are almost sitting on top of one another.

Really, if I were to have the office space which the very large amount of correspondence and general business transacted in my office required, I would need two additional offices. However, if I could obtain only one more, as your letter suggests, it would be a godsend to me.

It was because of this personal situation that I was very glad to support the efforts you made in behalf of a new Senate Office Building.

With very best regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

IRV IVES.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
August 20, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Thank you very much for your letter of August 19, 1949. I am glad to know that you will try to go ahead in the second session of this Congress with plans for the new Senate Office Building.

For many years I had inadequate quarters with serious overcrowding of staff and I know that the same situation prevails with other Senators. The present situation where committee staffs and the staffs of chairmen and the office of the chairmen are scattered all over the place represents deplorable inefficiency. The chairmen who are responsible for the work of those staffs have to waste a lot of time running back and forth between scattered offices or they disrupt the orderly work of staff members by having the members do the running back and forth. Personal supervision is impossible. I cannot understand the qualms which Members of Congress feel against doing something that will put them into position to do a better job. We pour out our money for the executive departments and stint our own demonstrable needs.

May I express my appreciation of your active interest in this matter and wish you the best of success. I shall be glad indeed to give my personal support to your effort.

With very best regards, I am,

Sincerely,

EUGENE D. MILLIKIN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My sympathy for the point of view contained in your welcome letter of August 18 is very keen. I think that the sooner a new Senate Office Building is constructed the better off the Senate as a whole and as a working force will be.

For the present and for quite a long time to come I have all of the space I need because my suite consists of four rooms. This fact, however, is beside the point. Most of the Senators whom I know are confronted and worried by space which is inadequate. I have but recently moved from a three-room to a four-room suite. My considered opinion is that the effectiveness of my staff has been immeasurably increased and I am able to render much better service through myself and my staff. In knowing the vast difference in effectiveness which comes from adequate space I am anxious to assist you in securing comparable accommodations for those of my fellows who are not properly accommodated now. I want to look to you for suggestions to cover the ways in which I might be of service.

Most cordially,

HARRY P. CAIN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter requesting my impressions on Senate office space is at hand.

I am conviced that most Senators' office space is overcrowded and too cluttered up for good, efficient work. I feel quite sure that one additional room on the average would be most conducive to more efficient operation of the offices.

It is rather difficult for anyone to have to think and analyze and interview people in a room where there are several typewriters in operation.

I will be glad to support you and your committee on recommendations which you may see fit to offer.

Best personal regards,

Cordially yours,

ZALES N. ECTON,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
August 22, 1949.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your good letter of August 18 concerning improving the facilities for office space for Senators either in the Senate Office Building or in some new building.

May I burden you with my own situation. I do so because I believe that it is typical of what every Senator is up against. I have three rooms, facing the inner court of the Senate Office Building. My administrative assistant, executive secretary, and legislative secretary, occupy one of these rooms, together with a large number of filing cabinets. The second room is used as a reception room, filing room, and as a place where seven other secretaries and stenographers have to do their work. Then, too, this room is occupied by a large number of filing cabinets. The third room I occupy as my own private office.

In this office I have several bookcases and filing cabinets which contain the necessary papers and correspondence pertaining to the job. These crowded quarters make it extremely difficult for people to do their best work, and I am very, very hopeful that something can be done to improve this situation.

It seems to me that an administrative assistant and an executive secretary, especially the administrative assistant, are each entitled to a separate office of his own. It would greatly help if the executive secretary had one, too, because a great amount of the detail that a Senator's office has to carry on must be done by and under the direction of these two people.

The tremendous increases in the activities of the Federal Government in the last 25 years have greatly added to the amount of work that every Senator and Member of Congress must do. If he is to do it well, he must have adequate quarters and adequate help to assist him.

Crowded quarters make it extremely difficult to properly and effectively organize the work of a Senator's office. For that reason, too, additional office space is necessary.

I wish you success with your plan.

Yours very sincerely,

RAYMOND E. BALDWIN,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: When the proposal to authorize the construction of a new Senate Office Building was considered by the Senate Public Works Committee, I stated that I was in favor of the new building and that, in my opinion, it was necessary to provide additional space. I used the situation in my own office as an example before the committee.

I have attempted to obtain additional office space without success. At the present time it is necessary that I have five persons and the files in one room and four people and storage cabinets in the other room. I seriously doubt that the present working conditions in my office would meet the minimum requirements established by either Federal or State health officials.

It is essential that I have additional space in order to efficiently conduct the duties of my office and to maintain adequate working facilities for the members of my staff. I shall be glad to support legislation that will remedy this situation, in which I am sure many other Senators find themselves.

From my point of view, there may be a serious question as to whether the plan to erect a new building for our committees is sound. It seems to me this would result in an unnecessary duplication of existing facilities, and for other reasons may not work out too well. I think what we do should be done with as little expense as possible to meet the existing needs.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES P. KEM.

UNITED STATES SENATE,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN CHAVEZ: I have your letter of August 18 with reference to the construction of a new Senate Office Building.

The Senate Finance Committee Room is adequate, but poorly arranged. The staff greatly needs at least two additional rooms. I hope you will succeed in building the east wing of the Senate Office Building.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER F. GEORGE.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: I have your letter of August 23. I do not think much of the idea of trying to move all the committee chairmen and their staffs over to the new building. The new building will be a long way from the Capitol and I think you will find that most of the older Senators prefer to stay in the old building, hoping, of course, for more space.

I believe the new building should be a simple one with more rooms and smaller rooms than we have in the old building, and whatever additional committee rooms we need. I wouldn't try to assign any special function to either building, but simply provide more rooms per Senator and let the Senators have their choice of location.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT A. TAFT.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
August 27, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the proposed construction of a new Senate Office Building.

While I thoroughly appreciate the need for economy, I am not convinced that cramped space plus poor and inadequate equipment contribute to that end—in the long run.

Expanding responsibilities and increased workload call for adequate space and up-to-date facilities, if a good and efficient job is to be done.

While I can get along with my present space, I really need one more room and could use two advantageously.

Certain members of my staff, especially those who handle bulk correspondence, legislative and departmental work, are obliged to operate in cramped quarters.

Filing space is very limited.

Space for visitors is not adequate, particularly during the peak of a legislative session.

The staff of my subcommittee is presently occupying quarters in the basement which are too small and not otherwise conducive to the best possible results.

In order to get a full return from our investment in personnel, it seems to me we are thoroughly justified in bolstering the other factors which contribute, proportionately, to such return.

Sincerely,

WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR
AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
August 29, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate.

DEAR DENNIS: Answering yours of the eighteenth, with reference to the proposed new Senate Office Building.

I now have four units and am getting along very decently, but, of course, I could make use of additional space if I had it and could rearrange the present four rooms to much better advantage with a fifth one where I would hope to put most of the filing cases.

The above suggestion perhaps is not too important, but I do think that it might be wise to use most, if not all, of the present committee rooms here in the old Senate Office Building, especially those built for committee rooms. For instance, the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on the second floor is suitable for our purposes, but it does not have space for the committee staff. There would be sufficient space if they had the units now located to the north of the committee room—the units formerly occupied by Senator Wagner and now occupied by Senator O'MAHONEY. There might be enough to give one Senator five units and the balance of those units in the same string to the chairman of the committee whose units should be located next to the committee room. I think also there should be a rule established that the chairman of a subcommittee automatically falls heir to four or five units for his own personal staff adjoining the committee room and the staff rooms of his committee. As it is now arranged, the chairmen of many committees are a long way from their committee rooms. This would be a job for the architect to figure out.

I am glad to know that it is your plan to go ahead with the construction of the new office building at the opening of the next session. Of course, it will cost some money, but it will be well worth the investment.

Yours very truly,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN
THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
August 29, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter of August 19, with reference to the proposed new office building.

In regard to your request for information as to my own office space requirements, it is my opinion that the present quarters are so cramped that it is impossible to make effective use of my staff. When so many staff members are crowded into one small room, the distraction of telephone conversations and visitors coming into the office makes it impossible to get the work done that should be done. It is, of course, false economy to operate in this fashion. I think our production could easily be doubled and the work much more efficiently done if we had adequate space.

With a State the size of mine, I average close to 1,000 letters a day. The mechanics alone of answering those letters, even if none of them involved telephoning and other special attention, is a considerable problem, and you simply cannot effectively handle even the letter-answering phase of our work in the very cramped office space we have. I personally think that each Senator should have a minimum of five rooms, if possible.

It is very unfortunate that the new office building was voted down at this session. While in the minds of a very few this was a vote against additional convenience for the Senators, there is no doubt but that actually it was a vote for bad service for our constituents.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOE MCCARTHY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
September 2, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman,
Senate Office Building Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: This acknowledges your letter of August 18 regarding the proposed new Senate Office Building. I apologize for not having responded sooner to your request that I give you an expression of my views on this proposal.

In my opinion, this project is highly desirable. More office space is needed by the Senators. The plan to house all committee rooms, committee staffs, and committee chairmen in one building is attractive. This no doubt would afford convenience and possibly better coordination and more efficiency.

At present I have reasonably sufficient office space. However, the arrangement is poor. I have a three-room suite and a fourth, an extra, room on another floor and on the other side of the building. If the four rooms were together they would possibly be sufficient to accommodate my staff, but considerable inconvenience attends the present arrangement.

When we can achieve a balanced budget and make appropriations for this structure within that area, I shall be most happy to support funds for its construction.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. MCCLELLAN.

DEAR SENATOR: It has just come to my attention that the enclosed letter, dictated by the Senator just before he left for Europe, had not been mailed. I am sorry for the delay but hasten to send it on to you.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Committee on Public Works,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am certainly most interested in the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building to wh'ch you referred in your letter of August 18.

We are terribly crowded in our present space. There are 12 people in our 3-room suite one of which is necessarily set aside for my own use. My administrative assistant has a partitioned space at the end of one of these offices which is highly unsatisfactory for our purposes.

It would certainly aid materially in relieving our situation if we had at least one additional room and you may depend on me to support your fine efforts to relieve our overcrowded conditions.

Sincerely,

ESTES KEFAUVER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE MAJORITY LEADER,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1949.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Replying to your letter of August 19, I am very glad to have an opportunity to give you a statement as to my office facilities and their inadequacy.

Illinois, as you know, has a population of approximately 8,000,000 people, and consequently I have a larger staff than most of the Members of the Senate. I have never at any time had adequate space for my staff in the Senate Office Building.

In my suite, 353, there are four rooms. My own private office is the only room in the suite which is occupied by only one person, myself, and consequently there is no other place in my office where my constituents may hold a private conversation with any of my staff members.

The second room in the suite is occupied by my administrative assistant and two other girls. The third room is the reception room and is large enough for only the two people who occupy it, leaving little space for people who are waiting for appointments.

The fourth room in the suite, which is an unusually large one, is occupied by six people. In addition to the 6 desks there are 35 file cases in the same room.

I have an additional room across the corridor, 356 B, in which four girls work, handling all of my mail on legislation. When you take into consideration the fact that at times during this year our outgoing mail on legislation alone numbered 2,000 pieces a day you can understand how crowded are the four girls who work in this one room.

Offices have been assigned to me in the Capitol as majority leader, and also for the Policy Committee staff. As you know, the Capitol offices are not adequate for any sizable staff, and the people who work there are as crowded as those in my office in the Senate Office Building.

I am heartily in favor of a new building to relieve the space situation.

Sincerely yours,

SCOTT W. LUCAS.

Commission, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Please accept my apology for not getting an answer to your August 19 letter long before this. Until the first of this year my office space was so small that I simply did not have room enough to carry on my work properly. In January I was able to get another room which has made it somewhat better but I definitely need more space for my staff. I hope we are successful in getting the new building.

With kindest personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

WAYNE MORSE.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION,
February 24, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This concerns your letter of February 14, 1950, on space.

I consider my present office and committee facilities ample for present needs.

As you know, however, I have been charged with assignment of space in the Senate Office Building and my experience with this in the past 1½ years is conclusive that the majority of the Senators needs more room than one is able to give them at the present.

I support your known attitude that work on the new Senate Office Building ought to go forward at once, and assure you of my future support for that project.

Very sincerely yours,

CARL HAYDEN,
Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE,
February 18, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have read with more than casual interest your letter of February 14, 1950, and the enclosure thereto. The following paragraphs contain a statement of my experience with my office facilities and some statistics in regard to my staff and space needs.

I have found that the three-room suite allocated to me is completely insufficient for my needs. As you know, I am the junior Senator from the largest state, population-wise, in the Nation and am receiving approximately 2,000 letters per day. This mass of correspondence plus the other duties I have, require me to maintain a staff of 22 persons.

At the present time I have a three-room suite on the fourth floor of the Senate Office Building in which 10 persons work. In Room 5B, Senate Office Building, 10 more staff members are quartered. In 5B, also, are my current files and my mailing operations. In Rooms 41 and 42, Deck A, of the Library of Congress are quartered three other persons. Their presence in the Library of Congress makes necessary the addition of a messenger to transport materials between the Library and the above-mentioned offices. While I am grateful for having space in the Library of Congress, it has proved completely unsatisfactory from the standpoint of efficiency and I am presently contemplating taking office space, for which I will pay personally, in a private building more closely situated to the Senate Office Building.

Some time ago in conjunction with 10 or 12 other Senators faced with the same problem which I have described, I signed a petition addressed to the Senate Rules Committee, offering some suggestions to provide interim relief.

It is my opinion that the proposal for a new Senate Office Building is not only meritorious but absolutely essential. I find my activities hampered at every turn by my space problems.

Yours very sincerely,

HERBERT H. LEHMAN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I am in favor of completing at the earliest possible time the new Senate Office Building. I think it was a serious mistake not to have appropriated for this at the last session of Congress.

Space is badly needed by everyone connected with the committees I serve on.

With kind personal regards.

Most sincerely yours,

ELBERT D. THOMAS.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I have your letter of the 14th and in reply advise that I have supported the proposal to build a new Senate Office Building and have not changed my mind, and still think we should proceed with the program.

With all good wishes, I am,

ELMER THOMAS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
March 10, 1950.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Lack of office space has been a critical problem for me. I was assigned a three-room suite. For a while it was necessary to have nine girls working in one room of about 450 square feet. The situation became so serious that I was forced to rent several rooms in the Carroll Arms Hotel.

I believe it was originally intended to have one room for receiving visitors. I have 16 people assisting me in my Senate work. To provide adequate office space for them I would need five rooms.

One reason for the need of this space is that the Senate has provided for automatic typewriters. It is impossible to carry on general office work in a room in which these robotypes are being used. Therefore, I would suggest the following utilization of space of the needed five rooms. One would be for my own use. A second would be a reception room occupied by two members of my staff. A third would be for general office work and occupied by seven people. A fourth would be for automatic typewriters and files and used by three people. The fifth would be used by my executive assistant, administrative assistant, and two legislative assistants.

I believe that the proposed new Senate Office Building would go a long way toward relieving the pressure of space. As it cannot be completed for at least 2 years I feel the Senate should consider making some arrangements for the interim.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
March 6, 1950.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: This is to acknowledge your letter of the 14th requesting my comments regarding the need of a new Senate Office Building.

I believe this building should be constructed immediately. Many Senators are unable to employ their full complement of clerks because of lack of space, and there is no privacy when conferences are to be held in the Senators' offices.

It has been pointed out to me that many of the administrative offices of the Government have twice the amount of space per employee as is available to us on Capitol Hill. Further than that, many Senators need additional space immediately in order to increase their staffs.

I am definitely in favor of having prompt action taken relative to having this building constructed, and trust that this year Congress will appropriate the necessary funds.

Yours very truly,

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thank you so much for your letter of August 19. I was glad to learn that a commission has been appointed to investigate the space needs of individual Senators. This is an undertaking long overdue.

Frankly, I presently have neither the staff nor the office space to do the job which 10,000,000 Pennsylvanians are entitled to expect of one of their Senators. If funds and space were available, I would add at least four more people to my staff. During the present session of Congress I have been receiving daily an average of 1,000 communications, all of which I have been acknowledging. Moreover, the proximity of my State to the Capitol prompts many personal visits by constituents.

One room of my four office suite, 261 B, has been officially condemned by the United States Public Health Service. If a private employer were found to be operating under similar conditions, he would not escape prosecution for long. The seven members of my staff working in this room each have less than 40 square feet within which to work. This compares with the Government minimum standard of 110 square feet per person. That these hard-working employees are required to labor under such unhealthy and substandard conditions is a disgrace. I invite the Commission to visit this office. Words are not adequate to describe the situation there.

The other two rooms, occupied by six members of my staff, including my secretary and administrative assistant, are equally inadequate for the job which faces us. There is no element of privacy, a factor which is of paramount importance in dealing with certain constituents. Our problems are so numerous and varied that it is difficult to find answers to them under prevailing working conditions.

Two additional offices would probably solve my space requirements. If one could be found immediately, I would certainly welcome it. I realize that the long-established seniority rule governs the allocation of space and that the needs of the individual Senator are not always considered. I voted for the construction of the new Senate Office Building in the present session for I felt that that was the only way I could get additional space, which would enable me and my staff to do the best possible job for my 10,000,000 constituents. There is a great deal of merit to a recent proposal that space be allocated on the basis of need, but I am just afraid that need will very rarely ever be considered one of the principal criteria in the allocation of office space to individual Senators.

Room 261 B is the best evidence I can give the Commission that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania needs additional space, not next year or the year after, but now.

If the Commission somehow can pry loose for me another room, I would be everlastingly grateful.

With best wishes, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD MARTIN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Permit me to acknowledge your letter in regard to the new Senate Office Building.

There is no doubt in my mind that we need additional space. I voted against the bill this year because I thought the new building too elaborate. We should have at least one-fourth more space than we at the present time, with several additional committee rooms.

I trust that you will have the plans revised and ready to present at an early date. I shall be happy to support you. I badly need another large office.

Sincerely yours,

DICK RUSSELL.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
August 25, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Public Works, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: Thanks for your letter of August 23 regarding your plans for continuing to press for a new Senate Office Building in the next session of Congress. As you know, I supported this in the present session and I assure you that I will continue to support it.

In my case, I have three rooms. I am the only one connected with my office who has ample space. In the room to which the public is admitted, I have my administrative assistant, chief secretary, and receptionist. In the third room, I have five girls and one man. Any time I have any extra employees I am compelled to crowd them into this third room. These conditions do not make for efficient operation. I have frequently said that every Senator ought to have a minimum of five rooms. We require no agency, bureau, or department head to operate under such cramped conditions.

You may be assured of my continuing support.

Sincerely,

JOHN SPARKMAN.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
August 25, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: In reply to your letter of August 19, I want to go on record now as supporting the proposal to construct a new Senate Office Building.

The office space problem confronting Senators at this time is serious, and I can see no relief for the situation unless additional facilities are constructed. For example, I was recently instrumental in obtaining the enactment of a resolution to obtain a committee on labor-management relations, the purpose of which will be to conduct an extensive study into the causes of labor-management disputes. Although the staff will be small and could possibly be housed in one room, Senator HAYDEN has advised me that it will probably be necessary to use part of the funds authorized to be expended by this subcommittee to rent quarters outside the Senate Office Building and the Capitol Building. The only other alternative is to attempt to obtain rooms in the Library of Congress, which, I understand, is now filled to capacity.

While this is only one example of the serious need for space, I am sure it is likewise true in other cases.

It is neither economical nor in the interest of efficient service to permit this condition to continue, and I sincerely hope that you and your associates will be successful in the next session of this Congress in your efforts to obtain adequate space and facilities for Senators and their staffs.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY,
August 24, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Replying to your letter of August 18, I believe the need for additional office space to house the committees of the Senate is extremely urgent.

The present facilities occupied by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, of which I have the honor to be chairman, are wholly inadequate. The committee workers are huddled together in overcrowded rooms. The committee room tentatively assigned for public hearings is entirely unsuited for any such purpose. In fact, during the Joint Committee's investigation of the Atomic Energy Commission this summer, it was necessary to hold hearings in the majority caucus room in the Senate Office Building. However, while the hearings were in full swing, we were notified that the committee would have to look for rooms elsewhere because another committee wanted to use the caucus room.

I believe it is bad business practice for the Senate to be carrying on public business under such conditions. It seems to me that the building of a new office building with adequate facilities for all committees, is very necessary.

With regard to the office facilities assigned to me personally, the situation is the same. We are very much overcrowded, and the space available to my staff is totally insufficient. I have practically no facilities for the reception of visitors, and there are a great many of them coming in from the State of Connecticut constantly. I do need additional space, and need it badly.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

BRIEN MCMAHON,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of February 14 in which you refer to a letter you wrote to me on August 18, 1949 with regard to construction of a new Senate Office Building.

The space available to me in the Senate Office Building is inadquate for the most efficient performance of the duties of my office. However, in view of the present financial condition of the Federal Government, I am strongly of the opinion that we should postpone expenditures at this time for the construction of a new Senate Office Building alike with retrenchment in every other field of Federal activities.

Sincerely yours,

GUY CORDON.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
March 2, 1950.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: This will acknowledge your recent letter relative to the proposed new Senate Office Building.

When this matter was considered last year, I voted to postpone action, and my opinion has not changed. While I realize there is some discomfort and crowding in all offices, including my own, I think that as an example to the country we should take the lead in cutting Federal expenditures.

With all good wishes, I am,

Cordially yours,

KENNETH S. WHERRY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
September 2, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of August 23 with regard to the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building is received. In light of the existing budget situation I feel that it was the wise thing to do to put this off, because I am against any expenditures that are not absolutely necessary.

Answering your question, of course we are all badly crowded, and while I am favored with a four-room suite, I certainly could use an extra room, as I have too many people in the rooms that I have. On the other hand, I feel that the Senators with three-room suites should get preference over the Senators with four rooms, and on that score I don't imagine the construction of the new building would relieve my immediate situation.

I would be interested to know whether you feel that the new building, if built, would have to be used entirely for committee meetings and for the staffs of the various committees. I gather from your letter that the chairmen of the committees would have their suites in the new building, as well as their staffs, etc.

If your committee should decide to go ahead with this project, I would be glad to talk to you further with regard to the needs of my particular office.

Always cordially yours,

H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
August 26, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: I received your letter of the 18th and I am glad to write you both respect to the Committee on Armed Services and my own individual office.

So far as the Senate Committee on Armed Services is concerned, the space allocation is sufficient. However, such is not the case in my individual office. I have a staff of 11 including my administrative assistant and secretary, and in each of two of the workrooms there are 5 members of the staff working. For instance, in the office where my administrative assistant and secretary sit, there are three other desks and with three and four telephones constantly ringing and four typewriters in operation you can well appreciate how difficult it is to work.

We have in my personal office 3 bookcases completely filled and 6 tiers of filing cabinets or 24 cabinets. In addition, it is necessary to store there two trunks filled with needed office material. In the other 3 rooms there are 48 tiers or 192 filing cabinets and these comprise files only from 1945 to date. It is frequently necessary that trips be made to the attic to refer to previous files.

As you know, living close to my State I have many callers and in the reception room where there is one desk for the reception clerk, the entire wall space is taken over with files so that there is not much room for those who call at the office on business.

An additional room to my suite would add immeasurably to the efficiency of the office.

With best wishes and kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

M. E. TYDINGS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
August 30, 1949.

Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of August 18 has been received and is very much appreciated.

Like many other Senators, my present office space is inadequate to meet our needs. Representing one of the larger States, with a population of over 10,000,000, and with 23 congressional districts the volume of mail and other business places a very heavy strain upon our facilities.

With best personal regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
August 31, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This is in reference to your letter of August 23 concerning the need for additional office space for Members of the Senate.

From my own personal experience, I know that the present allocation of office space fails to meet the need. In my case, I have three rooms allocated to me. It is necessary to use one of these rooms as a combination reception room-office. In this room I have a receptionist and one stenographer. In the second room I have my administrative assistant, my legislative assistant and four young ladies. The third office is reserved for my use.

This space allocation is totally inadequate. While my State is approximately 1,000 miles removed from the national Capitol, I have had more than 1,000 visitors from my State this year. This total does not include many visitors who come to the office. This means that it is practically impossible for one woman to be used for any other purpose than the receiving of visitors.

The concentration of six people in the second office has a definite effect upon the amount of work done and the type of work accomplished. My assistants for administration and research find it necessary to utilize my office for dictation during the periods when I am absent at committee meetings, on the floor and for other purposes. It is necessary for my personal secretary to have her office in this crowded room since the space in my office is insufficient for her needs.

I have found that as one becomes more engrossed in committee and legislative work the incoming correspondence increases accordingly. I feel that it will undoubtedly become necessary for me to add one or two additional stenographers in the future.

I should like to also present the thought that since it is necessary to have another building to relieve the situation it certainly seems that sufficient additional space should be provided to insure more than just one extra room for each Senator as time goes on. It seems to me that an advanced fixed allocation of space presents an inflexible situation that should not be permitted to exist. It occurs to me that thoughtful planning in advance could well lead to a solution of the present space problem that would prevail for a great number of years.

I want you to know of my sincere desire to cooperate with you in reaching a proper answer to the current space problem. Insofar as my own office is concerned, it is acute.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. STENNIS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
August 29, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DENNIS: This will reply to your letter of August 20, in which you make inquiry of me as to the sufficiency of my present office quarters.

Although I am in a more favorable position than most Senators, in that I have a four-room suite, my present quarters are most cramped. Even if my quarters were sufficient because of the fact that I have four rooms, I would not want to deny other Senators with three-room suites the opportunity of sufficient quarters with which to carry on their work.

As you know, the work of a United States Senator has been increasing yearly. This is evidenced by the fact that the Senate has from time to time allowed additional clerk hire which is sorely needed. My present quarters are such that I do not even occupy a private office, but share my office with one of the members of my staff. My administrative assistant shares his office with three additional clerks. I have a very small reception room, which is occupied by only the receptionist, and the remainder of my staff is all crowded into the remaining office.

I hope that this information will be helpful to you in presenting the matter to the Senate.

Warm regards to you, and,

Always sincerely,

CLAUDE PEPPER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
August 30, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: I will be very glad to advise you of my office facilities, in accordance with your letter of August 23.

I now have a three-room suite, which has proven entirely inadequate. Another room is needed to provide proper working space for my staff.

Sincerely yours,

GLEN H. TAYLOR.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
August 27, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: I agree completely with you on the need of more office space. I know that I certainly need at least one more room.

At the present time, I have five in one room and two in the reception room of my 3-room suite. I need one additional room, not only to ease the crowded condition in the room where there are five, but also to provide privacy that is sacrificed by placing my receptionist and executive assistant in the reception room. I've tried to meet this problem by installing a hush-a-phone on my assistant's phone, but it only partially meets the need of privacy.

Has any cosideration been given to extending the Senate wing of the Capitol or to adding floors to the top of the Senate Office Building? From the advantage of proximity to the Senate floor, I would think that these alternatives might be better.

Sincerely yours,

MARGARET CHASE SMITH,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
August 25, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of August 18 with reference to the proposed new Senate Office Building. In complying with the request set forth in your letter, I want to point out that when I took office in January, I was assigned a suite of three rooms at 231 Senate Office Building. At that time I had 16 people jammed into two rooms. It was an almost intolerable situation, and after several weeks Senator HAYDEN was kind enough to assign me another single detached room on a different floor which has relieved the situation somewhat.

My mail is extremely heavy, running about an average of 12,000 letters a month. As a result I have personally acquired two electric typewriters and robotype equipment for them in order to process my mail. My staff at present consists of 17 people, and certainly even the space which I now have could hardly be called ample or even adequate for the efficient operation of my office. Unquestionably any additional space which might be available to me would be most desirable and would most definitely increase the efficiency of my office.

Early in the session I had some hopes that we might have a new Senate Office Building for much less money than has been proposed that we spend on it. I have not gone into that, however, and do not feel that I am in a position to hazard a guess whether or not the necessary space desired could be acquired for less than the proposed cost.

I am hopeful that some arrangement can be made to provide additional space to the Senators.

With assurances of my highest regard, I am,

Sincerely,

LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE, AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
August 25, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: This is in reply to your letter of August 18 in which you ask about the space requirements of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The space facilities for this committee are far from adequate. I have tried for some time to secure additional space, and the Committee on Rules and Administration has tried to be of assistance, but apparently there is just no space available.

As you probably are aware, in addition to its regular committee work this committee was authorized and directed to make four very important and far-reaching studies and investigations. We have employed additional temporary personnel to assist with these studies, but because of the very unsatisfactory space situation these employees are located in three widely separated rooms in the Senate Office Building and a substantial part of the committee's files are located in the Capitol Building. Room 457 is assigned to this committee, but because of this space shortage we have had to convert it into a work room, consequently we cannot use it for hearings and have to hunt around for a room when hearings are held.

In connection with the four investigations I have mentioned above, I had hoped to set up a central stenographic pool, which would have cut down on the number of employees, but manifestly that is impossible when the committee staff is scattered all over the building.

The Rules Committee tells me that there is just no more space available. It would seem that the only answer is to enlarge the Senate Office Building or construct a new building.

Sincerely yours,

E. C. JOHNSON, Chairman.

I wish we might build an addition on the Capitol Building instead of spreading so far to the east as is contemplated in the proposed building.—E. C. J.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 26, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter of August 18 in which you request information concerning my present office facilities.

The space is wholly inadequate for my present staff, which may be increased somewhat next year, and the small space now allotted me is such that proper arrangement, conducive to orderly staff functioning, is impossible.

With best wishes and kindest regards,

Sincerely,

HOMER CAPEHART.

UNITED STATES SENATE,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thank you for your letter of August 18, 1949, and I am glad to have the information which you give with reference to the proposed new Senate Office Building. I shall be glad to consider this fully before the time comes to take it up in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

With best wishes always, I am

Yours very truly,

CLYDE R. HOEY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In your capacity as chairman of the Senate Office Building Commission, I should like you to know that it has been my experience that added space would be most helpful to promoting more efficient operation of the senatorial office.

Although I come from a small State and hence, do not have the demands of many of the larger ones, I too have had to face this problem. It would be my hope that before long, adequate facilities might be available.

With kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of August 18 referring to your continued efforts directed toward the construction of a new Senate Office Building.

In answer to your specific question, I believe that I could now use, and will in the future continue to need, more space than I am presently assigned. We are crowded now, and fully expect to be more crowded as time progresses.

Further I would appreciate having a more convenient office arrangement. At the present time, one of the rooms is entirely separate from the other three. It would be not only more convenient but more efficient to have the office suite in one unit.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. BRICKER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
August 25, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: In response to yours of August 19, 1949, relative to office facilities will say that I incline to the opinion that my office staff is less in number than is that of the staff of most of the other Senators and particularly those Senators representing more populous States.

It is practically mandatory that a Senator have a room by himself in order that he may dictate and hold consultations without interruptions. His office should be so arranged that his administrative assistant and executive secretary should be in a position to attend to their duties and work without the interruptions occasioned by visiting delegations and others during office hours. Such an arrangement cannot be had with the limited number of rooms apportioned to most of the Senators.

My opinion of the matter is that the office facilities of most of the Senators at least are inadequate and that, viewed from my experience with the staff I have, additional space would be very helpful.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Yours sincerely,

BERT H. MILLER.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Senate Office Building.

DEAR SENATOR: This is to acknowledge your letter of August 19.

I do have inadequate office space but I am one of those who oppose the construction of the projected new Senate Office Building. I am advocating economy in government and am willing to practice it myself. If all the various agencies of government would follow our example we would have real economy.

Kind personal regards, I am

Sincerely,

HOMER FERGUSON.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,

DEAR DENNIS: I am heartily in favor of expanding the facilities for Congress to cope with the tremendous increased responsibilities of the Federal Government.

Congress is still trying to operate in the twentieth century with a nineteenth-century machine.

Cordially yours,

OWEN BREWSTER,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your courteous letter of August 20, I hasten to say that I appreciate the thoughtful inquiry and add that I have been especially cramped in office quarters since my return to the Senate in January of this year.

As one of the newer Senators, I have a three-room suite and space is so limited that for more than 6 months after coming to the Senate in January I was unable to appoint an administrative assistant because I had no place to put a desk for him. Through the kindness of Senator THOMAS, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I was able to provide temporary space for an administrative assistant during the past 30 days in a room adjacent to the Agriculture Committee room. It is an imposition on Senator THOMAS and a tremendous inconvenience to me.

I am convinced that when I return to Washington at the beginning of the next congressional term that I shall have to dispense with an administrative assistant unless I can find some quarters for him to have desk room where I can contact him with reasonable facility.

Personal greetings.

Sincerely,

GUY M. GILLETTE.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE,
Washington, D. C., August 23, 1949.

Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Committee, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAVEZ: Thank you for your very friendly note about the new Senate Office Building and inquiry about my conditions so far as space is concerned.

May I reply with equal frankness and friendliness.

Although my offices are probably more overcrowded than those of any other Senator, I do not favor spending the money which a new building would cost. I have only a three-room suite, plus a small room in the basement, to handle the affairs of a State with 8,500,000 people, with a correspondence that runs between 700 and 800 letters a day and with a swarm of visitors.

But the need for economy is, in my judgment, so great that I am willing to put up with this inconvenience in order to save the $20,000,000, plus upkeep, which a new building would entail.

Appreciating the sincerity of your motives and with best personal wishes,

Faithfully,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, in the light of recent events the appropriation in this bill of $1,200,000,000 for armed aid to western Europe is woefully inadequate. This country is faced with a grave decision. We must build up the forces of western Europe. We must contribute, for our own welfare, vast amounts of equipment to our allies there. We must build up the Armed Forces of the United States to an extent to make it impracticable for the Soviet Union to launch a general war. We must at once mobilize American industry commensurate with the crisis. This is the best way to prevent general war.

Mr. President, the main thing that the events in Korea have shown is how woefully weak, how woefully unprepared we are in the face of the gravest threat ever faced by the American people. The lesson in Korea is valuable, but Korea, and all of Asia, for that matter, though extremely important to this country, are not the main show. Their conquest by communism is not the paramount danger to the United States. This country can live without Asia, but we cannot live without Europe. Do not misunderstand me. We must prevent Communist aggression in Korea. We must prevent by the use of Armed Forces Communist conquest of the Continent of Asia. Our Government is following the only course we can pursue in this matter.

Mr. President, be this as it may, there is no way that the United States can live if Europe is controlled by the Soviet Union. In my judgment, the very life of the United States—the lives, the welfare, the security of the American people—depend absolutely upon the prevention of the conquest of western Europe by the Soviet Union. To capture western Europe is the primary objective of the Soviet Union. The prevention of this conquest must be the primary objective of the United States. In fact, our frontier is not upon the Rhine, but it is the Oder-Neisse line.

Now, Mr. President, what are the facts? As a result of the war and of the devastation and chaos which ensued, a vast vacuum or void was created in western Europe. Today that vacuum has not been filled. It will be filled by some nation in time. It we do not act, it will be filled in time by the Soviet Union, and then all will be lost. The states of western Europe which comprise it are bitterly anti-Communist, but weak, helpless, and without armed resources because of the war. In western Germany we find the people are among the leading anti-Communist people of the world. They are a strong race. They are a people whose historic mission has been to prevent the expansion of the Mongol-Communist hordes into Europe. We have forbidden the people of western Germany, even though they desired to do so, to arm and defend themselves from communism. In Russian Germany and in the satellite states there are vast Communist armies, well trained, in the "pink" of condition, equipped with artillery, guns, tanks, planes—all of the latest design. In fact, this army is invincible in Europe today. Russia knows that no formidable force confronts it in Europe, and it knows that it could largely win its war and gravely weaken the United States by the occupation of western Europe.

Why does it not do so, Mr. President? The authorities, the experts, those high in Government who should know, say the following is the reason why Russia does not openly intervene in Korea and launch a general war at this time:

The atomic development of this country is far advanced over the atomic development of the Soviet Union. In fact, the atomic development of the Soviet Union is in its infancy. These authorities hold that Russia will not unleash a general war until her atomic development has progressed to a point where it can neutralize ours, and she could bomb American ports and cities and thus prevent our sending a military force for the reconquest of Europe and to repulse the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, the destruction of a very few American ports would make it impossible for this country to launch an offensive in Europe.

The main reason is, however, the authorities hold, the fear on the part of the Soviet Union that because of our atomic advances we could devastate the cities and industry of Russia with the atomic weapons which we possess. These same authorities hold, however—and my judgment is that they are correct—that given 2, 3, to 4 years, when Russia's atomic-war industry will be much further developed, she will have atomic weapons in such quantities as to neutralize the atomic weapons of the United States. We will be in a position with atomic weapons then as great nations now are with poison gas; it is too dangerous for each side to use atomic weapons as it now is to use poison gas. We will be in a position where the atomic weapons of each side will neutralize the other, and then, Mr. President, the Red army will march, provided the west is not adequately defended. The Red army will march if we are weak. The Red army will march if the Atlantic community of nations cannot immediately defend themselves. The only reason that would make war inevitable is that the west is weak and Russia, a predatory aggressor, is strong. If France and Britain had not been militarily weak in 1939, there would have been no World War II. Aggressors do not march when their foes are equally as strong. Aggression breeds upon weakness, not strength. If it is too dangerous to do so, Russia will not march, as Hitler would not have done in 1939.

Unless we are adequately defended we are absolutely certain to have a general war with the Soviet Union. We have only 2 to 3 years at the most to accomplish this, and, Mr. President, we must build up the defenses of the country; we must rearm; and we must rearm our allies abroad.

It is senseless not to cooperate with the two strongest peoples on the continent of Europe, the people of Spain and Western Germany. These are the people with a will to fight communism. These are the people who will take up arms to prevent communist aggression. I say it does not make sense to the American people that we do not make use of the manpower and resources of these two countries in the defense of western civilization.

Observe what is happening in the Soviet zone of Germany today. Russia has built up a large force, and has facing us from 50 to 75,000 so-called German police, a force which is being rapidly expanded to 150,000 men. This force is similar to the communist puppets in Korea, is organized as they are, and is equipped with arms, tanks, and weapons similar to those used by them. Furthermore, they have built there a skeleton army of 50,000 from officer and non-officer cadres around which a German army could be quickly built. In fact, she has created there a skeleton army which could quickly be expanded into a strong army for use against us.

While Russia does this, Mr. President, the United States will not take steps to build up an allied army in western Germany to enable the Germans to defend themselves, and thus increase our strength and lessen our responsibilities.

Our policy in refusing to use German and Spanish manpower and resources is to appease for political purposes certain left-wing and radical groups in the United States and abroad. This political appeasement, Mr. President, has jeopardized the defense of our country, and if not quickly changed will be paid for by the blood of thousands of American boys.

The United States, unless it is rearmed, mobilized and prepared for defense, faces defeat in war, or isolation in the world. Each of these means the death and destruction of the country. We do not have today as many men under arms as we had in 1940, and the dangers which face us are many times more serious and more deadly. This country must have industrial mobilization immediately on a scale commensurate with the crisis. We cannot rearm ourselves and help to rearm our allies, in the short time allotted by fate to us, on a policy of business as usual. The $1,200,000,000 requested in this bill is totally inadequate. Last year we appropriated $1,500,000,000 for armed aid to western Europe and to implement the North Atlantic Pact. This was all right as a starter, but it is suicide to continue at the present pace. The rate of rearmament must be greatly stepped up both at home and abroad. We must be fully rearmed within 2 to 3 years. This is the time that is allotted to us.

Mr. President, we should double the arms aid program for western Europe this year. We must immediately mobilize our industry, and build up the Armed Forces of the United States. Who says we have enough guns, enough planes, enough weapons of any kind? Who says we are not woefully weak? Who says we are not too weak for our own security? Who says we have armed forces capable of protecting us? We cannot speedily mop up the communist bandits in Korea.

Mr. President, this is an intolerable situation, with world conditions as they are today. In fact, strong American forces are the key to our security, the key to European security, the key to Asiatic security, the buffer to prevent Russian aggression. In 1939, when the danger to civilization was not as great as it is today, we became the arsenal of democracy. Today the cupboard is bare, and we are not taking steps sufficient in this emergency to protect this country. If we are to avoid war, we must make it too costly and too dangerous for predatory communism to attack.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Federal Government has just ended another fiscal year in the red. This was the eighteenth Federal deficit during the 20 years since 1930, and 13 of these annual deficits have been in peacetime years. The deficit record, exclusive of the war years follows:

1931	$400,000,000
1932	2,500,000,000
1933	1,800,000,000
1934	2,900,000,000
1935	3,200,000,000
1936	4,500,000,000
1937	3,100,000,000
1938	1,400,000,000
1939	3,500,000,000
1940	3,600,000,000
1941	5,100,000,000
(1942–46, war years.)
(1947–48, surpluses.)
1949	1,800,000,000
1950	3,100,000,000

The 2 years in the black were in the period of the Eightieth Congress.

The total debt is now $257,220,328,000.

The $3,100,000,000 deficit for the year 1950 compares with the President's January estimate of $5,500,000,000.

The President arrived at this deficit estimate by calculating that receipts would be $37,800,000,000 and expenditures would total $43,300,000,000. Revenue fell $800,000,000 short of his estimate and be overestimated expenditures by more than $3,100,000,000. The result was a deficit of $3,100,000,000 instead of the estimated $5,500,000,000.

EXPENDITURE SLOW-DOWN

It would be a mistake to assume that all this $2,400,000,000 reduction in deficit spending represents a saving. In a large measure it merely represents a slow-down in the schedule of construction and procurement expenditures which probably will be made up in the fiscal years 1951 and 1952. The money is still appropriated and is still available for spending.

The President's estimates failed to materialize primarily for two reasons. One was uncalculated increases in employment generally which curtailed expenditures in the big veterans and social security programs, and simultaneously reduced the demand for Government loans and increased the market for paper held by Government lending agencies.

The second reason is to be found in a chain reaction which was set in motion by delay in the enactment of last year's appropriation bills. This delay in passage of appropriation bills slowed down expenditure schedules particularly in programs and agencies where funds in large measure were to be used for construction and procurement. And in some cases when these agencies appeared before the House Appropriations Committee with unexpectedly large balances in view the committee accordingly cut back the appropriations for fiscal year 1951. This committee action plus further reductions voted on the floor of the House and the tightening up of the antideficiency provisions had the effect of freezing, or at least further slowing down the rate of expenditures during the final quarter of fiscal year 1950, because the agencies did not choose to expand during the last few months of the past year in the face of an impending cut-back at the beginning of the new year.

Examples of expenditure schedules affected by increased general employment follow:

[In millions]

Agency	President's January estimates	Actual expenditure	Reduction
Social Security Administration	$1,212	$1,154	$58
Other Federal Security	333	277	56
Veterans (exclusive of national service life insurance fund)	6,280	6,044	236
Reconstruction Finance	1,000	589	411
Home Loan Bank Board (collections)	197	275	78

Mr. President, there is another list of examples of the expenditure schedules affected by slow-down in construction and procurement of supplies, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In millions]

Agency	President's January estimates	Actual expenditure	Reduction
Rural Electrification Administration	$362	$293	$69
Atomic Energy Commission	673	524	149
Civil Aeronautics Administration	188	166	22
Public Roads	507	486	21
Defense Establishment	14,500	13,500	1,000
Economic Cooperation Administration	4,100	3,500	600
Mutual defense assistance program	160	44	116
Bureau of Reclamation	334	300	34
Other Interior	304	276	28
Tennessee Valley Authority	52	18	34
General Services Administration	797	588	209

Other areas in which estimates exceeded actual expenditures included

[In millions]

Agency	President's January estimates	Actual expenditures	Reduction
Korean aid	$60	$40	$20
State Department	358	339	19
Maritime activities	162	94	68

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, among all these items, the curtailment by some $600,000,000 in expenditures for veterans and RFC programs represents the principal real savings. The other expenditures in a large measure represent deferments to some subsequent fiscal year—in most instances fiscal year 1951 or fiscal year 1952.

EXPENDITURES SPEED-UP

Offsetting these miscalculations in estimates on the reduction side there were some items where expenditures exceeded the estimates. Among these were:

[In millions]

Agency	President's January estimates	Actual expenditures	Increase
Farmers Home Administration	$26	$182	$156
Commodity Credit Corporation	1,556	1,713	157
Labor Department	157	258	101
Postal deficiency	573	593	20
Interest on the debt	5,725	5,750	25

Mr. President, I attempt by this to show the reasons why the actual deficit was less than the estimated deficit.

COMPARED WITH 1949

Despite this slow-down under the expenditure tempo as estimated by the President for fiscal year 1950, we still exceeded 1949 expenditures by more than $100,000,000 and thus set a new peacetime record. While expenditures went up, receipts came down. They finally totaled $800,000,000 less than the President estimated and nearly $1,250,000,000 under 1949.

EFFECT ON 1951 EXPENDITURES

It is difficult, of course, at this time to estimate how much of the 1950 expenditure slow-down will be made up in increased expenditures in fiscal year 1951, but it is certain that the carry-overs are not likely to result in reductions in 1951 estimates. There are some which obviously are just the difference between obligations and expenditures such as the carry-over from 1950 expenditure estimates for public roads, airports, TVA steam plant, and General Services procurement.

There are others where more than 1 year may be required to make up for the slow-down, such as the REA's rural-telephone program, ECA commitments, Reclamation construction, procurement, and development, atomic-energy activities, and military construction and procurement.

The reductions in such veterans' programs as on-the-job training, which occurred when industry payrolls absorbed the veteran trainees during the year, and reductions resulting from the failure of demand for Government loans to materialize, and the spurt in the market for Government loan paper, may definitely be regarded as a saving in 1950 budget estimates without qualification.

1951 REVENUE

There appears to be reason to expect that at least some of these carry-overs will result in increased spending in 1951.

In this situation consideration should be given to the fact that the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, subject to revision if a new tax bill is passed, estimates that revenue this year will not exceed $35,100,000,000—a reduction of $2,000,000,000 under the year just ended. If this estimate were to be sustained, Federal revenue will have dropped $3,000,000,000 in 2 years. Of course, this estimate may be changed by the economic conditions of the country.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator is a member of the Senate Finance Committee. In view of the situation which seems to be developing in Korea, is it the view of the Senator that the committee should proceed with further consideration of the bill which the committee has been considering?

Mr. BYRD. In answer to the Senator from Connecticut I will say that it is my personal judgment, as a member of the Finance Committee and as a Member of the Senate, that no bill should be enacted which would bring about a net loss of revenue to the Federal Government. Because of the very serious conditions confronting the Nation and in view of the fact that we must look forward to increased expenditures for military purposes, I do not think we should reduce by even a small amount the net income we now derive under the present schedule of taxes. That is my feeling as a member of the committee. Of course, I cannot speak for the other members of the committee.

If we can arrive at a balanced bill whereby the loss of revenue on certain items can be made up by increasing the taxes on others, of course, that will present a different situation; but certainly, in my judgment, we should not decrease the present tax revenues.

The joint committee's revenue estimate for the year just ended was closer to the actual figure than the administration's forecast. By the administration's most optimistic estimate to date, revenue in the current fiscal year 1951 would be one-quarter of a billion dollars less than receipts for 1950, and this would be a full billion dollars under the 1949 revenue.

DEFICITS CONTINUE

If the joint committee's revenue estimate prevails, and if the President's expenditure requests should be granted in full, the deficit next June 30 would be $7,300,000,000, exclusive of expenditure increases resulting from the 1950 slow-down. Even if the revenue should exceed the administration's most optimistic estimate, the President's expenditure requests for fiscal year 1951, plus the uncalculated carry-over from the year just ended, would result in a deficit this year of more than $5,000,000,000.

Thus, in 3 years—based on the actual figures for 1949 and 1950 and on the President's estimates for the current year—we shall have indulged the people of this Nation in $10,000,000,000 of deficit spending. With no sense of pride, I recall my prediction a year ago, when, with no war in sight, it became evident that we were entering a prolonged orgy of deficit financing.

At that time I estimated the 1949 deficit at $800,000,000, and was a billion dollars too low. My estimate for the current year was a $3,400,000,000 deficit; and if it were not for the delay in construction and procurement expenditure schedules, I would have been more than $1,000,000,000 low again. My deficit forecast for the coming year was $6,500,000,000. I hope my 1951 estimate will be high for a change; but even excluding consideration of the effect on the budget of the aggravated foreign situation, there would be reason to expect it to be low again unless substantial reductions were made in the President's requests.

In any event, it is certain that there will be another big deficit in the fiscal year 1951, exclusive of the unestimated costs of the Korean outbreak. This will be the third deficit in successive years of peak employment and inflated income. These facts raise the question as to whether we shall ever again balance the Federal budget.

DESTRUCTION OF THE SYSTEM

It should be noted that all of these calculations are exclusive of the effects of the current international situation and the pending tax bill. Consideration of these factors will be reached later on.

Meanwhile, with or without a tax bill or the additional costs of an international crisis, the President does not give even lip-service sympathy to reductions in his proposals to spend $42,500,000,000 in the current fiscal year. This silence is despite the fact that his requests include demands for $12,200,000,000 in domestic programs, exclusive of defense, veterans, foreign assistance, and interest on the debt—an increase of $5,300,000,000 since 1948.

When, in January, the President made these requests, on the basis of his own revenue estimates, he admittedly proposed deficit spending for fiscal year 1951 to the extent of $5,100,000,000, which was approximately the equivalent of the 2-year increase in domestic civilian spending. This could be regarded as evidence that we have been led into a fallacious policy of deficit financing to create inflation, which in turn would produce more synthetic revenue to justify more Federal spending.

How Government-fed inflation works is simply illustrated as follows:

Since 1939 population has increased 16 percent; Federal expenditures have increased 500 percent; personal income has increased 180 percent; the cost of living, exclusive of taxes, has increased 180 percent; Federal collection of taxes has increased 700 percent.

We have before us the pre-Korean crisis expert warning of Dr. Edwin G. Nourse that inflationary dangers are inherent in the current deficit-financing policy.

Since the appropriation bill has been before the Senate Appropriations Committee, Dr. Nourse has expressed apprehension that the rate of deficit spending by the executive branch, aggravated in the legislative process, may produce accelerated prices which might lead to a run-away boom. This, he said, could be followed by a genuine depression and brutal deflation that come with a sharp contraction of demand due to unemployment and drying up of active business investment.

The Federal Government is directly responsible for what Dr. Nourse described as credit expansion policies which have led not only to cashing in past savings but also drawing on future income, in contrast with the sound policy of finding a true market balance between full volume production and current consumer income.

Thus, he said, we have failed to conserve our market-supporting ammunition.

Mr. President, continuous deficit spending inevitably will destroy our form of government through confiscatory taxes, inflationary booms, complete regimentation or unmanageable debt, or the combination of one or more of these evil companions of continuing deficits.

In peace, nothing is more subversive to our form of government than unnecessary deficit financing.

Most of the deficit spending contemplated in the pending appropriation bill was conceived and proposed in the absence of any imminence of war or international crisis. The effect on the deficit of any additional requirement for expenditures resulting from recent incidents abroad will be only a matter of degree.

THE ALTERNATIVE

It may be said that our deficit-financing policies might readily be the most effective fifth column now at large in the United States. The alternative to destruction by deficit—in hot war or cold war, in peace or in conflict—is reduction of nonessential domestic-civilian expenditures. On the basis of the President's January requests, the budget would be balanced for fiscal year 1951 if Federal expenditures for strictly domestic-civilian activities—exclusive of defense, foreign assistance, veterans, interest—were on a level with such expenditures in 1948. In other words, if we were to spend for domestic-civilian activities, exclusive of defense, foreign assistance, veterans, and interest, the same amount we spent in 1948, the budget now would be balanced. It is my firm conviction that this retrenchment in these activities certainly would neither jeopardize the national welfare nor disturb the sound prosperity of the Nation. On the contrary, it would reenforce the moral fiber of our citizens for whatever tests may lie ahead, and would put us in a better position to develop an invincible military defense.

COMMITMENTS

I realize, of course, that some of the $12,250,000,000 which domestic-civilian programs would cost us under the President's requests is tied to long-term commitments now rooted in authorizations made by law. I take this occasion to repeat what I have been saying for years: We should proceed with caution toward the enactment of basic legislation which in effect commits the Federal Government to virtually permanent spending programs.

I went into this matter in great detail last December, before the President brought in his budget requests for fiscal year 1951, hoping that he would recommend basic legislative action curtailing these programs. We know from experience that reductions in the cost of Government involving entrenched long-term programs is next to impossible without the force of executive recommendation and attitude.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

The pending budget for fiscal year 1951 was submitted without either recommendation or sympathetic attitude with respect to retrenchment in domestic-civilian deficit spending. On the contrary, the President's budget document contained nearly two full pages of recommendations for new programs and extension of expiring programs; and the majority of these proposed legislation items fall into the strictly domestic category.

We must effect substantial reductions which would ease the fiscal strain to which the Federal Government is being subjected unnecessarily by nonessential expenditures—when I say "nonessential" I mean nonessential especially with respect to the national defense—for strictly domestic-civilian activities at a time when the need for additional military outlays appears to be imminent.

Fortunately, the Senate for the first time in modern history is considering the Federal expenditure budget in a single appropriation bill; and this makes it possible to apply reductions throughout the entire budget, with due consideration given to the merit of each and all items which are embraced by the measure.

Under the able leadership of the Honorable CLARENCE CANNON, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, it has been demonstrated that such reductions can be made fairly, effectively, and orderly—without the meat-ax approach which was necessary when appropriations were considered in 12 or more separate and unrelated bills brought before Congress over a period of six or more months. Under the forthright leadership of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senate Committee, too, has done excellent work with this initial effort to bring out a single appropriation bill. Despite its size, we are still months ahead of the appropriation bill schedule of last year.

We should sustain the House reductions, Mr. President, and we should increase them in every possible way, as they relate to nondefense spending. Actually, a good part of the reductions accomplished under the President's estimates are in terms of legislation he requested, but which has not been enacted. There is on the statute books much legislation which can be cut without impairment of any essential function.

If we are not willing to give up nonessentials while Americans are being shot, we are not worthy of our position of world leadership.

Recent developments indicate that Russia is waging a war of economic attrition to destroy the solvency of the United States, which means the destruction of our private-enterprise system and the loss of our freedoms. First, we had the airlift incident in Berlin, which cost hundreds of millions. We now have the Korean incident, which will probably cost billions, with the loss of many American lives, and, if the 50,000 troops in North Korea are conquered—as, of course, I feel they will be, in time—this will lead to a long-time occupation of Korea, which will add still further to the cost. It is likely and probable that other such incidents will break out elsewhere on the globe in which our Nation will be involved.

These vast expenditures come at a time when the President and the Congress have deliberately neglected the opportunity to balance the budget, which can be done by economy and retrenchment in domestic spending. I repeat: In fiscal 1948 domestic spending, exclusive of veterans, national defense, foreign aid, and interest on the national debt, was $6,900,000,000. The President recommends in his budget for the pending fiscal year an expenditure for the same domestic purposes of $12,200,000,000, an increase of nearly 100 percent.

We must face the situation squarely. We must retrench at home or run the risk of weakening day by day our fiscal economy by adding to a public debt which is now more than a quarter of a trillion dollars.

If a war incident such as is now occurring in Korea should develop into a world conflict, we would incur a public indebtedness which would be so colossal and overwhelming that it would be impossible for us to maintain our free-enterprise system, which has been the foundation on which the progress and success of America has been built.

I emphasize again that every single dollar should be saved in all expenditures not affecting our national defense and our security, because no one can foretell, in these difficult days, what demands may be made upon us in the days and years to come.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. DONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, did the Chair recognize the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say I should be very glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question, or for an insertion in the RECORD.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I desire to obtain the floor in my own right. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the Senate committee's amendment which is now the pending question before the Senate. This appropriates initially the sum of $10,000,000 to start a new and additional Senate Office Building. We have heard this morning that if the original plans are to go through, the ultimate cost of this new building will be approximately $21,000,000, and if abridged and simplified plans are put into effect, that the cost will be $16,000,000. I want to say I think the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is completely correct in objecting to this building, particularly at this time. The senior Senator from Virginia has just reminded us that the deficit for the fiscal year which we have just passed, ending the first of July, was $3,100,000,000. The deficit for the coming year, even according to the appropriation bill presented to us, and without allowance for further war emergency expenses, may run to $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000. If we should become involved in large military expenses in Korea, in Asia, and in other portions of the world, the deficit will be much, much more than $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000. Therefore, Mr. President, I submit that we should think very carefully before we commit ourselves to appropriating $10,000,000 for an office building this year, knowing that it will require the appropriation of additional sums of from $6,000,000 to $11,000,000 in future years, and knowing also that, as the senior Senator from Louisiana has pointed out, the costs of maintenance, exclusive of interest upon the building itself, will run between $500,000 and $600,000 a year.

Mr. President, I do not think we should make this expenditure. I want to say that I am aware of the fact that a good many Senators find themselves in crowded quarters. I happen to represent the fourth State in the Union from the standpoint of population. My mail is probably among the first 12, measured in volume, received. I am not as crowded and I do not have as large a volume of mail as the two Senators from New York, and probably not as large a volume of mail as the two Senators from Pennsylvania. But my mail runs well over a thousand letters a day, and we have a large volume of work to do.

Naturally, as a junior Senator, I am not entitled to very much office space. I am not entitled to the four-room suite of offices to which senior Senators are entitled. I was given a three-room suite, and I make no complaint about that whatever. I want to say that through the kindness of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] I was given an additional room in the basement, to help handle some of my mass mail. But, nevertheless, even with four rooms, I suppose that, with the exception of the two Senators from New York, I am about as crowded as any Senator in this body. Naturally, we could use a little more space. But I do not think it is worth $20,000,000 to accommodate me and to accommodate other Senators who may be in the same position.

I intend to make no comments upon the allocation of such space as we have as between Senators, because that would be unseemly and unbecoming in a relatively junior Member. I would merely remark, however, that some Senators, because of their seniority, acquire the chairmanships of committees, and, at the same time that they have a four-room suite, receive additional office space. I would suggest that a reallocation of existing office space would receive such needs for added rooms as may exist.

I want to say that I am not urging such reallocation; I am not asking for it. I am quite content to exist with the office space I have. I am far more content to remain in the small suite of offices I have than to agree to a bill which provides for spending $20,000,000 of the taxpayers' money for a new office building.

Mr. President, I think we have got into the habit, within the past 20 years, of building elaborate quarters here. The early buildings in Washington, to which we still point with pride, were simple in nature, but they have been relatively adequate. The very able Senator from New Mexico invoked the name of Thomas Jefferson. He was quite right. Thomas Jefferson was a great architect and a great landscape gardener, in addition to all his other qualities. If we visit Monticello, the University of Virginia, and the Capitol building in Richmond, it will be found that Jefferson got his results through a minimum of expense, and yet achieved dignity and simplicity.

The White House, to which visitors go when they come to Washington, is an example of dignified simplicity. The Capitol is not excessively elaborate. The House and Senate Office Buildings are simple and dignified. But, beginning in approximately 1930, we moved into the Imperial Roman period of architecture with the erection of the Commerce Building. I went into the Commerce Building in the early 1930's. I was struck by the big offices and the elaborate space provided for the Secretary of Commerce and for the Under Secretaries of Commerce.

As other department buildings were erected on Constitution Avenue, every secretary, every assistant secretary, and every bureau chief demanded that his office should be as large as or larger than the comparable offices in the Department of Commerce, until finally, I am told, some secretaries would send men around with measuring tape to find out what was the actual size of the offices of other Cabinet officials and insist that in their new building they must have more square feet or more cubic feet of space.

Mr. President, I think we have now reached the point where the average American citizen feels very much embarrassed in going into the average governmental building, particularly the departmental buildings. He feels overawed by the architecture; he feels he is insignificant and that the people who dwell in these magnificent buildings and who have such large offices must be above and beyond him. In a democracy, Mr. President, every citizen should be able to go into a public building and not feel ashamed of himself and not feel insignificant. He should feel that he is on an equality with the persons who dwell therein. That is the characteristic of Monticello. The humblest and poorest American citizen can go to the hilltop of Monticello, look at the building, and feel that he is a part of it. He is not overawed by it. He can walk down the campus of the University of Virginia, down those declining terraces, see those brick buildings with colonnade pillars in front, and he can feel that this noble architectural work of beauty belongs to him and that he is a part of it. He is not overawed by it. But let the average American citizen go into the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, the Department of Justice, the Department of Agriculture, or the Post Office Department, and see the secretaries dwelling in marble halls, in offices so large that it is almost necessary to put on roller skates to go from one end to the other, with the carpet so thick and soft that snowshoes are needed in order to prevent falling through, and the average American citizen does feel overawed. We have given up democratic simplicity in most of our executive buildings and are going in for almost oriental magnificence.

This infection is spreading to Capitol Hill, Mr. President, because we look down Constitution Avenue and see the secretaries and assistant secretaries and bureau chiefs, who come before us for appropriations and for confirmation of their nomination—we see them driving up in automobiles as big as trucks, and we say to ourselves, "Are we not as important to the United States as are these men, and should we not have as elaborate buildings as they occupy? Build us more stately mansions, oh my soul; put up another office building so that we, too, may have large offices, so that people may walk before us in that air of hushed reverence with which people greet the functionaries downtown."

Mr. President, I think that is a false sense of values. We do not obtain dignity by the size of our offices, by the size of our buildings, or by the elaborateness of our quarters. We obtain dignity by our behavior as Senators, and not by the external accouterments of power with which we may surround ourselves.

Mr. President, I hope very much, therefore, that we will not put up any additional office building. I hope that we shall stay where we are. I hope we can get greater simplicity in our administrative and judicial buildings and keep our own simplicity. I am perfectly willing to say in the presence of the good and genial chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration that I am willing to stay in the suite which has been assigned to me. I would rather be a doorkeeper in the House of the Lord and live within our budget than to dwell in the elaborate palace which the Senator from New Mexico is urging upon us and require the Nation to write a promissory note for our quarters.

CAMPAIGN OF TRUTH

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I am rising to address the Senate today to suggest certain concrete and urgent proposals bearing directly and immediately upon the hot war now raging in Korea and the cold war in progress all around the iron curtain.

For 3 days last week, a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations conducted an extraordinary set of hearings on Senate Resolution 243. These were planned to help crystalize the national and congressional policy in behalf of a great new Campaign of Truth. It was not especially noteworthy that many of us in the Senate who joined in sponsorship of this resolution gave testimony in its support. It was not unexpected that those officials of the State Department engaged in the limited program now in progress should have testified for its expansion. What was noteworthy and tremendously important for the future of the world is that great and universally respected figures in our own twentieth century history of international relations gave unanimous utterance to the supreme importance of ideas and ideals in the present world conflict.

Their testimony, Mr. President, gives new hope for world understanding and peace, if we will but heed it and proceed boldly.

International relations since the dawn of history have manifested themselves under what I regarded as four major categories.

First, "Force," the armed might by which one people puts its will down the throat of another people, as we are now witnessing in Korea.

Second in point of development was "Diplomacy" or "Deals," the process of winning advantages or victories by negotiations, threats, or trades, rather than by force of arms.

The third major category in international development has been "Goods," the process of trade, and, in many cases, the calculated use of economic power to win advantages or victories in the international arena. Such are the victories under the Marshall plan won by Paul Hoffman and the ECA.

The fourth great category in the field of international relations is "Words" or "Ideas," the projection of information or propaganda by one nation to win the minds and loyalties of men in others. In this fourth category, Mr. President, the record of international relations since 1945 is replete with examples of startling victories won by the masters of the Kremlin. Many persons will attest that even China, which fell to the hammer and sickle without a single Red Army corps, was a victory of Soviet propaganda.

In this vital fourth area, the Soviet Union has pressed forward to victory after victory, literally by default. Now at long last, now that we've had these hearings, the fight which some of us have been waging since 1945 may come to fruition. At last we seem to be moving to put our backs into this world-wide struggle for the minds and loyalties of men, by projecting to all men the great ideals and ideas of freedom which have rung down to us in the United States through the generations.

I shall not stop to recount the testimony, briefly reported in the press of recent date, by General Eisenhower, General Marshall, General Bedell Smith, Bernard Baruch, Secretary Acheson, and the great pioneer in the field of broadcasting, Brigadier General Sarnoff. Each of them has won renown in international relations through one of the first three categories I have cited. Yet each of them attested to category number four, to the urgency the need to propagate our democratic creed as an instrument of supreme national policy, and to propagate it at once and on a vast scale because already it is late and there is no time to lose.

Today I shall only stress to the Senate the statement of Ambassador John Foster Dulles, who has just returned from Korea and Japan. I shall read a direct quotation from the statement Ambassador Dulles made at a committee hearing. He said:

> I believe that the question of whether we have a general war or not may depend, may hinge, very largely upon the relative effectiveness of the Communist propaganda and the free world propaganda * * * I believe that the effectiveness of the so-called propaganda information * * * to nail down the fact that the threats of violence come from the Communist world and that we are the freedom-loving, peace-loving people, upon the effectiveness of that may hang the question of war or peace within the next few months.

World opinion, Ambassador Dulles said, is as vitally important to us as it is to the Russians. The difference I wish to point out is that the Russians know it is important, and communism has always known it.

As I have stated before on the floor of the Senate, the heroes of the Communist revolution are the propagandists. It is Lenin, the great propagandist, who is enshrined in the tomb in Red Square.

The Kremlin was well prepared and was in high gear on that fateful Sunday, June 25, with its story that the North Korean aggression was merely a defensive reaction against a South Korean attack started with American support. Ambassador Dulles predicted that if the Kremlin can put across that false and fantastic story, or even sow confusion with it, the U. S. S. R. would be emboldened to launch new aggressions in other areas. If the Soviets can convince people they are peace-loving while they attack and they shoot and they bomb, why should they hold back in Iran, in Greece, in Indochina, or even in France or Italy? The United States is vulnerable, unfortunately, and tragically vulnerable on a dozen exposed fronts.

Mr. President, here in Korea we face the test of the big lie. Does anyone doubt that the Communist propaganda machine will put every ounce of energy and ingenuity it has behind the big lie? Does anyone doubt that this big Russian lie is believed behind the iron curtain? Does anyone doubt that it will create uncertainty and hesitancy in many critical areas of the world?

I testified last week before Senator THOMAS' committee on the day the New York Times ran an editorial commenting on how fantastic the Gromyko statement sounded. Yes, it sounded fantastic to us in the United States. The terrifying fact is that it does not sound fantastic to the Russian people or to the North Koreans. The terrifying fact is that Gromyko, the propagandist, knows what he is doing.

A truly effective international information program on our part could help prevent such big lies from taking hold. What other defense have we—without this one also? We must seize this defense and use it at once.

If Ambassador Dulles is right—and indeed if there is a one in five chance that he is right—what is called for now is an extraordinary and immediate effort against this single lie, conducted with all the urgency of wartime. We must project to hundreds of millions of people the findings of the United Nations Korean Commission. We must dramatize the resolution of the Security Council. We must spread by every possible means the facts about the contributions which many nations are making to the joint campaign in Korea, and the fact that this Korean war is so clear, so demonstrable, and so naked an act of aggression as to warrant, for the first time, the use of the United Nations flag by the defending forces.

It goes without saying that in this crisis the existing facilities and personnel of the State Department Information Services should be utilized to the utmost. They should be integrated with the Department of Defense, and with General MacArthur's forces in the field. They should be more energetically tied in with the program and facilities of other individual members of the United Nations. Assistant Secretary Barrett, who is bringing such leadership to the Department, ably testified on Friday to the steps which have been taken and the emphasis which is now being placed in the Department upon this vital area of international affairs. It goes without saying that the efforts of Mr. Barrett and his able associates must be pressed and supported with the utmost vigor and dispatch. Further, all other Government facilities—those of the armed forces, for example—should be reviewed at once for immediate potential use in this crucial area.

However, Mr. President, there are other avenues which should also be immediately explored. I now suggest six additional areas to be exploited, as illustrative of those which in my judgment should be under consideration by the administration, the Congress, and the appropriate agencies of the United Nations. I cite these six merely to stimulate other such ideas in this new and vital field and to show the possibilities for quick and bold action. These six illustrations show that we can develop opportunities and we do have possibilities at hand if we are bold and if we are willing to act.

First, I feel our Government should immediately approach the United Nations with an offer to assist and help finance the United Nations Division of Public Information in a great worldwide campaign on the issues involved in Korea. The impact of a United Nations campaign in many areas of the world and among many people would be much more effective than anything we in the United States could do ourselves unilaterally. Would the United Nations be prepared, for example, to utilize the clever scheme of the Soviet Union involving the signing of peace petitions throughout the world?

Would the United Nations foster such petitions in appropriate areas, so that the millions who genuinely crave peace will identify peace with the United Nations? People everywhere can sign UN petitions in good faith. Through them they can learn that the United Nations stood fast on the Korean issue, and is working in the interests of people everywhere for peace.

The United Nations could call upon the best talents of this and of other nations. General Eisenhower said last week he believed many of the nation's leaders in the field of communications would welcome, would indeed jump at, the chance to serve their country in this field. I agree with General Eisenhower that this is a time to summon an ad hoc group of communications leaders and ask them to devote themselves for the crucial months ahead of us to this problem Ambassador Dulles has posed so cogently.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BENTON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have been listening to the Senator's remarks with considerable interest, and I certainly agree that there is a wide field for getting over the facts in the case, not only to the United Nations members, but particularly behind the iron curtain. I am fully conversant with the fact that the able Senator from Connecticut has been interested in the establishment of a system of international law and order so that the peace of the world could be preserved, and for that reason this country went into the United Nations.

I wonder if in his remarks the Senator is going to discuss today what he feels the obligation of each of the members of the United Nations is toward a system of collective security, and whether he feels that that obligation is properly discharged merely by voting for a resolution in the Security Council, or in support of action which has been taken by the Security Council.

I should also like to know if the able Senator from Connecticut would indicate whether or not he feels that each and every member of the United Nations, regardless of how small its contribution might be, does not have some obligation to join with the United States in sending, or at least in offering to send, some ground combat troops to help preserve the system of collective security which we have, and whether or not he feels that they have discharged their obligations merely by sitting on the sidelines and applauding decisions which have been made, and the action which this Government and a relatively few additional governments have taken.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I had not planned to discuss the subject today brought up by the Senator from California, but I should like to comment briefly on the important contribution he has made.

I agree that I would like to see each nation urged to make its contribution. This should be made, however, to the United Nations Information Division, through ideas, money, and local facilities within each country, as well as contributions in troops at the scene of the battle.

I will say further that the contribution of certain troops from Asia to the Korean front could be very helpful indeed on the psychological side, entirely apart from the military contribution which might oe made by troops, let us say, from Pakistan or the Philippines.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. May I finish my answer to the Senator from California?

Mr. FERGUSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BENTON. I have one further thought in reply to the Senator from California. Troops in Korea from the Philippines or Pakistan would help to dramatize to the Korean people the fact that this is in no way a white man's imperialist war, with our soldiers in Korea in advance of our businessmen for the purpose of exploitation, which, unfortunately, was too much the history of Asia during previous centuries, as the Senator well knows.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I realize how the distinguished Senator feels about what might be called propaganda for information, but I am wondering whether at a time like the present, when we have the police force of the United Nations in Korea, actions really would not speak louder than any printed words that we might publish and try to circulate in Korea or in China, or in other parts of the world. Would it not be better for each and every one of the members of the United Nations to take upon itself full responsibility to carry out the mandate of cease fire and return north of the thirty-eighth parallel? If each and every member of the United Nations which desires to be on the side of the resolution would send troops, even if it were only a battalion or a token force, that would speak much louder than any printed word by those nations or the United Nations, because it would be deeds by the United Nations, which would convince the world that the United Nations was the power moving to stop aggression, and if aggression broke out anywhere else in the world, all the member nations would fight on the side of the United Nations?

I realize that there are some in America who believe that only Americans can fight, that only Americans are the soldiers who can win freedom, but we find opposed to Americans those who do not believe in the ideals of America.

I think we should be willing, that we should be ready, that we should be able to take the people of all these nations into this battle, so that we could convince the world that this was not a European or American battle, but that it was a world battle. Will the Senator comment on that?

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I wholly agree with the objectives sought by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, but I should like to add a footnote. I agree that for the American people words can never be a substitute for deeds, and that our deeds must fit our words, and our words must fit our deeds. This is in line with the temperament of the American people. Nothing else is possible for us as an instrument of policy. Unhappily, however, the Soviet Union has mastered the technique of using words as a substitute for deeds, and this is one reason why our own deeds are no longer enough. Our deeds must be supplemented by an explanation. Otherwise, when we are in South Korea with the deeds, spending half a billion dollars trying to help the South Koreans create a successful democracy, while we are there on that kind of a peaceful policy—the Koreans and all Asiatics are told by the Soviet Union that we are there for exploitation, and millions believe it, including the fighting North Koreans.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BENTON. I yield to the senior Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am a great believer in the philosophy of the United Nations idea, but who from the United Nations, outside of citizens of the United States, are dying in Korea?

Mr. BENTON. I apologize to the Senator; I missed his question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I ask, what other nationals, what other class of people, whether British, French, or any other nationality, are dying in Korea, outside of the people of the United States, with Koreans themselves?

Mr. BENTON. I know no more about this than what I read in the papers, and what is known to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. I have read that Australians and New Zealanders, for example, are prepared to participate, and I know other nations are considering a similar policy. I do not have information adequate to enable me to answer fully the question raised by the Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The only difficulty I find with the United Nations is that they want us to join and do this and that and the other, but they are not willing to die, as American boys are dying in Korea.

Mr. BENTON. I, of course, have read in the newspapers that the British have had casualties; that the Australians have had casualties.

Mr. CHAVEZ. At a distance, while shooting from sea, but they are not on the land. The French have said they are not willing to go.

Mr. BENTON. I do not have information adequate to do justice to that question, Mr. President.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BENTON. I yield to my colleague from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to comment very briefly upon the remarks made by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] when he said that deeds and not words were the things that would count in the world today. Of course, we must have deeds. The Senator and I realize that. When General Eisenhower was testifying the other day with respect to the resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Connecticut, I am sure the Senator will remember that he said it was necessary, of course, to be armed and it was necessary that our economy remain sound. He said that, and that alone, however, is not enough. He said that above all we had to have morale. Of course, morale is just another word expressing what people believe.

Mr. BENTON. General Eisenhower went so far as to state that the Marshall plan was aimed wholly at morale, and I am sure the Senator will recall his statement.

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Woodrow Wilson, in the First World War, did more to break German resistance by the proclamation of the Fourteen Points than perhaps many divisions of troops.

I remember so vividly reading recently what Tojo said in September of 1945, when he was interviewed and asked what had had the greatest effect in bringing about Japanese surrender. I think I quote him correctly when I say he replied that the fire raids were horrible, that the atomic bursts were catastrophic, but the thing which divided the imperial Japanese staff from the Japanese people was the millions of leaflets which were dropped to the Japanese telling them what our war aims were. I think that is worth reiterating at this time. It was the enunciating of the principles of the Atlantic Charter in the last World War that had such great effect in strengthening the people on our side.

We have always had the genius of having a moral position which matched our physical power. Today, above all times, when we have a moral position, it is essential that that moral position be stated to the world in no mistakable terms, because if it is so stated it will result in that morale which General Eisenhower talked about, and which will make the host of freedom invincible. That is as I see the situation.

Mr. BENTON. I thank my distinguished colleague from Connecticut, who was one of the early Members of this body to see this issue, when we were working together while I was Assistant Secretary of State and he was a freshman in the Senate, as I am today.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me a moment further?

Mr. BENTON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. In April of 1948 I wrote an article for Collier's magazine, which I called Operation Freedom, which was inserted in the RECORD. I should like to insert it and will insert it, with the Senator's permission, in the record which he has made in favor of this resolution. I reread that article just recently. In it I pointed out that it was high time we began to push Operation Freedom with the Marshall plan and all the other things we have done since, the Atlantic Pact, and the implementation of both, and above all, our own rearmament. The Senator knows I have been for every one of those things. I believe we have not been as vigilant as we should have been, that we have not been industrious enough in going forward, but I think that error is about to be corrected, and, I hope, in time, by the implementation of the Senator's resolution.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to have the article referred to by my colleague inserted in the RECORD. I, too, have had the glad and happy feeling, when rereading an old magazine piece of mine, still to find it good, though written years before.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Like the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] and other Senators, I, too, lay great stress on action. Action undoubtedly does in many instances speak louder than words. Therefore, as Senators know, I have favored and do now strongly favor the implementation of our military strength and that of our allies and friends in every way possible. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States have any realization yet as to the great responsibility and the great burdens with which we will be faced during the coming months. So I shall favor any expenditures that may be necessary for the strengthening of our arms and the strengthening of the forces of our allies and friends who, like ourselves, are fighting in the cause of democracy and freedom.

There is no doubt, however, Mr. President, that the Soviet Union and her satellites have made great progress in deluding the people of the world, particularly the people of Asia. They have met with a considerable degree of success, in my opinion, in making people believe that we are the aggressors; that they are the ones who stand for democracy, freedom and security, and that we seek some selfish and material gain in the undertaking on which we are embarked in Korea and elsewhere. In my opinion it is absolutely essential to use every means to combat that propaganda, and to make the people of Asia and of other parts of the world realize that we have no ulterior motive, that we have no selfish motive, that we are not aggressors, that we are fighting for the cause of the freedom of all liberty-loving people.

I can say, Mr. President, that even if we can, in a military way, contain all the forces directed against us by the Soviet Union and her satellites which are now striving to destroy democracy, we still would require a plan of this kind to add and increase the good will of the other peoples of the world toward us. We still must prove to these people by our words, by our purposes, and by our acts that we have no ulterior motive, that we seek to help them, that we seek to preserve their liberties, that we seek to free those who are now under the heel of the tyrants—the leaders of the totalitarian states. So I strongly support what the Senator from Connecticut is doing. I am proud to be one of the cosponsors of his resolution, and I very much hope that its great purpose will be recognized and approved by this body.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the eminent Senator from New York. I commend to the Senate his brilliant statement made at the hearings last week.

I wish to comment further with respect to the testimony on the question of deeds and words, to show the great gaps which exist between our deeds and our words. I hope the Senate is mindful of the fact that we have put roughly $500,000,000 into South Korea. Yet, while we were putting half a billion dollars into South Korea on the economic front, we appropriated $1,400,000 last year for information and educational work. This $1,400,000 was regarded by the State Department as a large sum. I am told it was the largest sum the State Department had for any country.

The big broadcasting station at Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea, has a power estimated at 50,000 watts. It blanketed all Korea 24 hours a day with its barrage of lying Communist propaganda. On the other hand, the little South Korean station—and there are 20,000,000 people in South Korea, as against 8,000,000 in North Korea—could not generate more than three or four thousand watts of power.

The North Korean station boasted all day long about the hundreds of North Koreans who were being sent to Moscow for study and instruction, at the rate of 200 a day, at times. On the other hand, the United States, spending half a billion dollars, had funds only sufficient to send less than 20 Korean students to the United States.

The North Korean radio kept describing the hundreds of Communist cultural centers which had been set up in North Korea. On the other hand, the United States, spending half a billion dollars in economic aid, had only nine little information centers—to cover 20,000,000 persons; and only one of those centers had any American personnel.

Scores of Communist books were translated into Korean. On the other hand, we could manage to translate only a few of our books into Korean.

Our motion picture equipment in Korea was old and worn out and insignificant.

Mr. President, I have this information from a cultural relations officer who returned from Seoul only 2 weeks ago.

I told Senator Thomas' committee that I though it was a fair metaphor, in connection with this particular area of our foreign policy, when I said that we would never think of matching little Willie Pep, the tiny boxing champion from Hartford, against Joe Louis in the prize ring. Yet that is, in effect, exactly the way we have been conducting ourselves in this cold war, in operations in Korea. Indeed, I enormously compliment ourselves when I make the comparison to Willie Pep.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. First, of all, Mr. President, I wish to say that the question of adequate coverage by the Voice of America, or otherwise, I think is of extreme importance. I think the Senator from Connecticut has accurately stated the situation which has prevailed in Korea and, as a matter of fact, the situation which prevails in other sections of the world.

To get back to the colloquy had a little earlier in the day between both the Senators from Connecticut and the Senator from Michigan, and in which the junior Senator from California participated, let me say that I was hopeful that the Senator from New York also would express his viewpoint on that matter. It seems to me that all of us have supported the United Nations and all of us have been hopeful that in that organization the world would establish a system of law and order which would preserve the peace of the world for this generation and future generations of Americans.

However, the point which I think needs to be emphasized here in the Senate, by Senators on both sides of the aisle, is that up until yesterday, at least, only one nation, aside from the United States, had offered to send ground troops into Korea in support of the United Nations resolution. That nation was the Republic of China. It is true that the United Kingdom has sent some ships, and some casualties have been suffered on those ships. It is true that Australia has sent some ships and some airplanes. It is true that Canada has sent some ships, that the Netherlands has sent part of its navy, and that New Zealand has offered to send part of its navy.

However, the only nation, other than the United States of America, which until yesterday, so far as I know—and I believe the statement is accurate—has offered to send its ground troops is the Republic of China, which offered to send three divisions of approximately 30,000 men, and some 20 C–46 airplanes.

My only point—and I think it needs to be emphasized—is that although all of us recognize the fact that there are only a few great nations in the world, yet it seems to me that regardless of how small any nation may be, even if it offers to send but a single battalion, even if—in the case of some of the smallest nations—it offers to send only a company or a regiment, as the case may be, if we are to have a system of international law and order, if all the nations are to assume their obligations in connection with the preservation of peace in the world, there is no member nation of the United Nations—regardless of how small or how large it may be—which does not owe a duty to the peace of the world to forthwith offer to send at least some ground troops in order to help preserve peace under the United Nations resolution. I do not believe the nations discharge their responsibility as members of the United Nations merely by voting for a resolution or by sitting on the sidelines and applauding the resolution which has been passed and the action which has been taken by relatively few of the member nations. There is no reason in the world why the United States and half a dozen other nations should assume the entire burden of this police action.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, of course, there are many gradations, as I am sure the distinguished junior Senator from California will agree, in connection with the discharge of responsibilities. All of us are glad that the nations voted as they did in support of the United Nations resolution; but I wholly concur that it is eminently to be desired that other countries join us and furnish, within their means and resources, troops to serve alongside our troops in Korea. I urge, however, that we seek their participation not only from the point of view of military assistance, but also from the point of view of the very important and symbolic psychological values which would be involved in such participation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BENTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wish to thank the Senator from Connecticut. I did not mean to interrupt his very able address.

However, inasmuch as he was discussing the psychological aspects of the situation, it seemed to me important to say that if there were that type of contribution, I think it would clearly appear all over the world as concrete evidence that men of all the free nations of the world were willing, if necessary, to sacrifice their lives as well as their property in defense of the maintenance of a free world of free men.

Mr. BENTON. I agree wholly with the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. President, I have listed the first of my six points. I have five other points, which I should like to present very briefly, to serve as examples of the kind of thinking which I believe is needed in connection with our foreign policy.

My second point is that we can assume that the Voice of America will do its best to tell this story straight—both behind the iron curtain and in front of it—and that the British Broadcasting Corp. is doing the same. However, we are now facing a crucial emergency and it calls for quick, bold action. Unhappily, as General Sarnoff pointed out at the hearings, our radio facilities are pitifully and tragically weak, or are lacking entirely in many areas of the world. If the United Nations or the United States cannot get adequate free time on the existing domestic standard-band radio stations of the various nations to supplement these facilities—and this will show the Senator from California that I want the cooperation of the other nations, not only through the United Nations but with the United States on every front—then I want to have the money to be able to buy radio time if such time can be purchased and will give us the coverage we need. I feel that the Congress should provide this money. For example, let us take the powerful long-wave radio station at Luxemburg. That station alone can add greatly to the strength of our voice in Europe. Along the lines suggested by General Eisenhower, I submit that plenty of talent is available to produce highly effective radio programs.

My second suggestion is a stop gap measure only—a way to get more broadcasting quickly—while we proceed with the development of our own facilities.

My third suggestion, Mr. President, I picked up from reading the newspapers covering Mr. Samuel Goldwyn's return from Europe. Some of the Senators may have noticed that he called upon the United States to spend $1,000,000,000 to combat Russian lies. Perhaps, if he is asked to do so, Mr. Goldwyn will undertake to produce a documentary motion picture presenting the true facts about the North Korean aggression, not only to be shown in the commercial theaters all over the world, but to be shown to organized groups in every accessible country, and by projection trucks to every accessible village square in the world. Of course, Mr. President, I used Mr. Goldwyn's name in a symbolic sense; I use it because he is thinking about the problem, and wants something done about it. My point is that in this supreme crisis, we should immediately mobilize the creative genius of our motion-picture industry to the constructive use in this international crisis of this most powerful medium of communication. The motion picture is, to all of us who have worked closely with it, admittedly and by far the greatest potential means by which ideas can be quickly and forcibly communicated. Not only do we need the one picture made by Mr. Goldwyn or by anyone else, but in this area we need a new motion picture every week, and with a real system of weekly distribution.

My fourth idea, Mr. President, is that there should be an enormous increase in the use of leaflets and similar printed matter used in psychological warfare and which proved so effective during the war, as has been described by the senior Senator from Connecticut.

These psychological warfare techniques used by ourselves and our allies in Japan and elsewhere during the war have been used against us in Korea by the Communist propagandists and have been used with crushing impact.

Let me show the Senate some of the examples of this Communist propaganda which is being spread everywhere and with telling effect in South Korea. I have here on the floor a number of illustrative pamphlets, booklets, and comic strips used by the Communists and made available to me through the State Department. In them we see the techniques which we ourselves have mastered in this country in our comic strips and in our comic books. All of us with children know the impact and appeal of these comic books. Here we have the Communists using this combination of pictures and words that can be understood even by people who cannot read. And what do we have on the cover of this sample I have here before me? Here is a giant man with dollar signs for his belt and a greedy look. Fawning on him, this little knee-high figure down at the bottom, is Syngman Rhee, who, again and again, in these pictures, is shown as the tool of self-seeking American capitalism.

Here in this picture we have the American soldiers shooting little babies, and so forth.

Here are some cartoons. Here we have the virtuous North Koreans holding up a banner labeled "Motherland—Unification—Complete Independence," and here we have portrayed the South Korean stooges, with the military officer behind, representing Japan or the United States, forcing these reluctant South Koreans forward to shoot at the innocent North Koreans.

Here is another. This shows the arm of Uncle Sam behind Syngman Rhee, who is shown stealing the crops from under the feet of the Korean farmers. This cartoon is entitled "Farmers, Don't Be Robbed of Even One Grain Which You Harvested With Your Bloody Perspiration."

Here is the moral. At the very time that we are putting a half billion dollars into South Korea for economic rehabilitation, we are being portrayed as robbing the farmers of South Korea for our own gain.

Mr. President, I have also brought here a batch of unusual booklets to illustrate to the Senate the skill with which the Communists concentrate their evil talent on propaganda. These are not booklets to be read by any South Korean or North Korean. No, these are booklets to be read by U. S. S. R. propagandists in North and South Korea. Here are handbooks on propaganda which the Communists take into Korea, with which to train their agents. Here is one labeled "Propaganda Material for the Compulsory Education of Primary School Children." As we know, that is where the Communists start—with the children—pumping them full of hate for the United States.

Now, of course, I feel that we should develop in simple, easy-to-read form our own printed material, and should distribute it widely. That has been advocated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] and by many other Senators on the floor of the Senate, again and again. But we have not given the State Department the money or the appropriations with which to carry through on this manifestly needed activity.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Touching the last point raised by the Senator, with respect to the Voice of America, I first want to commend the Senator upon what he is attempting to do here. One of the things which the Senator from Illinois has been primarily interested in ever since the Voice of America was set up, was this: It seemed to me, in view of the unusual amount of money which Russia was spending in propagandizing all the satellite nations, as well as other nations throughout Europe and Asia, that we ought to do something there to counteract that offensive. I have at all times struggled for appropriations which would meet that particular situation. The State Department has been denied by the Congress of the United States sufficient funds to do any kind of job whatever. I do hope that this is an awakening to the value of the Voice of America. Simply because there were a few little things which happened with respect to the Voice of America that were not quite in keeping with what certain Members of the Senate thought was right, on that basis appropriations were denied for a mighty worthy cause, and we are today suffering as a result of it.

Mr. BENTON. I thank the majority leader for that comment. Of course, I well remember, in the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses, the leadership which the distinguished Senator from Illinois took in this field, when it was so little understood and when it met with so much resistance—how, again and again, he took the floor here in the Senate and, but for his efforts, I have no means of knowing that our program would have survived as it has to this day.

I have two further quick examples, Mr. President, to complete my six points and to illustrate the kinds of things we can do at once if we, here in Congress, agree on the urgency which faces us with respect to this program.

My fifth point: I feel there should be a tremendous and immediate expansion of exchange of leaders in many fields of life in the United Nations countries and those in the critical areas, particularly in southeast Asia. My own background in this kind of activity, Mr. President, dates to my association with Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, who same to Washington 2 years before our entry into World War II, and who pioneered in this field in relation to Latin America. There is a great deal of evidence that Mr. Rockefeller's program was enormously effective in Latin America. We need a revival of that program on a vast scale, on a world scale, today.

We have an excellent illustration of exchange of personnel in the ECA technical-assistance program. But there were only 350 or 400 people—some small number of that kind—who were brought into this country last year on the ECA technical-assistance program. The ECA program should be enormously expanded, as I have advocated previously on the floor of the Senate.

I am talking here about leaders—present leaders who can be immediately effective when they return home—and not only businessmen and technicians but also journalists and, notably, labor leaders—all drawn from the many and diverse national strains, colors, and creeds, which have combined their talents to build the New World we know and cherish.

Mr. President, my last point, my sixth illustration or example, deals with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. I feel that the State Department should ask UNESCO at once to develop those of its projects which can have immediate effectiveness, in line with UNESCO's charter and basic aims on the cause of world peace. The Senator from California has given support to this kind of approach to the problem in his earlies comments on the floor.

We in the United States should be prepared to finance those UNESCO projects which have the leadership and which have suitable objectives. I cited, in Florence, Italy, at the UNESCO conference 3 or 4 weeks ago, when I was a consultant at that conference, the problems of education in Germany and in Japan, as illustrations of what UNESCO could tackle, and on a significant scale.

Surely it is as suitable for the United States to finance UNESCO projects, in what I have called a point 5 program, as it is for us to finance the United Nations on point 4.

Dr. Stoddard, the world famous psychologist who is president of the University of Illinois, and chairman of the United States National Commission for UNESCO, was a brilliant witness before the Thomas committee, and gave many illustrations which helped to indicate how UNESCO can become far more effective in the cause of world peace if it has the money and the leadership. Mr. President, I have completed my six illustrations.

I should now like to remind the Senate that Secretary Acheson advised the Thomas committee that President Truman will shortly send to Congress a message requesting substantial new appropriations—for a great campaign of truth. I know how these appropriation proposals are developed. It takes months and months and months—taking them through the State Department, through the Bureau of the Budget, through the White House, through the offices and the Appropriations Committees here on the Hill.

Much of the thinking in connection with this proposal traces back many months. It takes months to get it where it is. In the meantime, these hearings of last week and the urgency of the North Korean crisis make the issue much more apparent to us.

I understand the proposal of the President will be particularly directed to the areas of the world which are now under immediate and critical pressure by the Soviet forces and their satellites.

The Smith-Mundt Act, sponsored by two distinguished Members of the Senate with whom I worked in connection with the passage of the act, affords all the legislative authorization needed for a greatly expanded appropriation and program.

The President's new program will largely cover appropriations for long-range efforts for new facilities and transmitters, and similar investments, such as the building of great new radio facilities which require months or even years to work out. However, the President's proposal, I am told, will also support the immediate expansion of existing programs and the greater utilization of existing transmitters.

Such an expanded program is bound to present challenging problems in personnel, in organization, and in new techniques to be adapted to the changing situation throughout the world. It will demand seemingly large expenditures, but these expenditures to prevent the spread of communism will seem small in comparison with the appropriations which must be made to combat that menace once it has gained its foothold by subversion and propaganda. They are indeed tiny as compared with the money invested in other areas of our foreign policy.

A few days ago the junior Senator from Massachusetts proposed a two billion dollar increase in the arms program for Europe alone, and today one of the most distinguished and revered Members of this body said to me that he expected the armed services would request, before the end of the year, an additional $5,000,000,000 in appropriations.

That is the way in which we are talking about billions of dollars in the field of armaments, and they are the sums we must keep in mind when we consider this relatively tiny sum in the field of ideas.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Would it be fair to sum up the argument of the distinguished Senator by saying that he believes and I believe that we should do everything possible in a military way in times of crisis, but we shall not accomplish the full objective of our efforts unless we do something at the same time to try to tell people what our purposes are in helping them and educating them to the point of view of what we believe is a more peaceful world which will give greater security to them as well as to ourselves?

Mr. BENTON. That is a perfect summary. It is not only the summary of the distinguished Senator, or my summary; it is the summary of General Marshall, General Eisenhower, and General Bedell Smith. General Smith confessed to the committee that not too many years ago he had not recognized the importance of this area. Indeed, he said that when he was in a key role in London during the war, he looked on the men who came in to work on propaganda and morale as crackpots whom he unhappily and unfortunately had to put up with. But his feeling changed, and fast, and greatly, as did that of General Marshall and General Eisenhower—if on their part they had ever showed such an attitude.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I shall be through in a moment, but I shall be glad to yield at once to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I admire the statement of the Senator from Connecticut. I think he is making a wonderful contribution. I also admire the contribution made by the Senator from Massachusetts. But I should like to ask the Senator what nation other than the United States is trying to contribute something to carry out the program.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, if we had had a program in this area 5 years ago, and had consistently adhered to it during the past 5 years, it is my conviction that there would now be much more eagerness and much more vitality in the actions and attitudes of other countries throughout the world than the Senator from New Mexico thinks he is witnessing as he observes current events.

Mr. CHAVEZ. As I observe current events, I see American boys dying, but I do not see anything being contributed in order to carry out the laudable and noble ideals which the Senator is talking about. I am sorry to say that.

Mr. BENTON. If we do not see contributions from other nations, I regret it as much as does the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. But it is also true that the world looks to us for leadership. It takes time to get followers. It is true that we are not in South Korea fighing for the South Koreans; we are there fighting for the United Nations and for the concept of world peace represented by the United Nations. If other nations are not equally quick to do that, in some cases it may be because they have feared that leadership will not be forthcoming from the United States. We have this penalty of leadership, as we conduct our policies in today's world.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I think we have the noblest and the most laudable record of ideals in trying to bring about peace in the world.

Mr. BENTON. Unhappily, many people throughout the world do not agree with the Senator or with me on that subject. I agree with the Senator, but many people in the world do not agree with the Senator. That is our dilemma.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct. I am not worried about those who do not agree with it. I am worried about the ones who are supposed to agree with it, the ones we have helped. I am not worried about Soviet Russia or her satellites. We never could get them to agree. But there is no particular reason why the ones we have saved, the ones for whom Americans by the thousands have died in order to bring about liberty, should not agree with it. That is what I am complaining about. I am not complaining of the sacrifice. I think it is worth it.

Mr. BENTON. I am not going to say that your complaint is in any way illegitimate. I do not have the necessary facts as to what is now going on in this area with which adequately to reassure the Senator from New Mexico. I hope such facts will be forthcoming.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I hope the facts will be forthcoming, because up to this time the fact actually exists that the only ones dying in Korea are American boys, and the fact exists that England and France are not going to send their boys into Korea because they might accidentally get killed.

Mr. BENTON. I do not know whether the distinguished Senator was on the floor when the Senator from California pointed out that there are ships and airplanes and men from other nations, but there are no ground troops.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The ground troops are the ones who receive white crosses.

Mr. BENTON. There have been casualties already among English troops, and, I gather from the comments of the Senator from California, among other troops as well.

Mr. CHAVEZ. If the Senator from Connecticut will be so kind, the point I am trying to make is that I think the effort is worth it. Irrespective of the crying mother of the boy who died in Korea, I think it is still worth it for society and for civilization. However, it does get irritating at times that we unselfishly do all these things, that we contribute the money, contribute the groceries, contribute the food, contribute the guns, contribute this, contribute that, contribute everything else, and we are the only ones who do the dying.

Mr. BENTON. It is also a very unhappy fact when we think of the many American boys who died out in the south Pacific during the last war only to have the Russian propaganda machine make tens of millions of people in Asia feel that it was the Russian troops who won the war, who were the conquerors of Japan, and the real victors in the war. In the Far East that is the Russian propaganda line. I regret the situation described by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. However, it does not in any way contradict the need I am trying to set before the Senate in my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut. I agree with him completely and entirely. Neither are we going to contradict the Russian propaganda by helping the French kill Indo-Chinese people in Indochina. We are not going to contradict that fact no matter what happens, if liberty is worth while, if peace is worth while, if freedom of action is worth while. It could happen in Hong Kong, Singapore, Gibraltar, or even in Malta.

Mr. BENTON. As my concluding comment, Mr. President, I hope that before Congress adjourns we shall have established an emergency budget and appropriation in this area of far greater magnitude than the one I understand is now under contemplation by the State Department and the President.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTON. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. In furtherance of the question recently asked of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, I should like to ask him whether it is not the Senator's belief, which I do not believe he has expressed fully yet, that someone must pioneer in any field in order to sell others on the idea and convince them that it is worth while. If we pioneer this field and accomplish some results in getting truths to people who heretofore have been hearing nothing but untruths, other peace-loving nations in the United Nations will in time join in the same effort. Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. BENTON. That is not only my idea, but I see no alternative to the idea of giving hope to the world over a period not only of years but of decades, the hope that by achieving world understanding we can create an atmosphere in which the chance of peace will grow greater and the chance of war will diminish. That is the hope to hold out to the peoples of the world. It is not a certain hope, but it is the only hope. We must hold out to the world the hope of smaller armaments and less tension, the hope of greater understanding, and the hope of maximizing the chance for peace and minimizing the risk of war. We must pursue this hope, and pursue it vigorously.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not the Senator's idea that due to the position we now hold in world affairs we are the only nation which can pioneer the campaign against the untruths being spread by the satellite nations of Russia and by Russia itself?

Mr. BENTON. We are the only nation which has the resources with which to do the job that needs to be done.

Mr. KILGORE. That is correct. We are the only ones who can pioneer the subject.

Mr. BENTON. Today Britain and France are doing more in the line of broadcasting than we are. Russia is doing between four and five times, measured in hours per week, more than the United States is doing. General Sarnoff testified, as the record shows, that the Russians are putting on over 800 hours of broadcasting per week—and in every language of the world. We follow along with one-hundred-eighty-odd hours per week. That is some twenty-odd percent of the Russian volume. Our United States facilities have never matched the British radio facilities.

We are also below the French in programming hours.

I agree with the distinguished Senator from West Virginia that we should be the leader, though we must encourage other countries which believe in freedom to do all they can. We have not been the leader. I agree with him that we should be out in the forefront. It is for that reason that I am addressing the Senate today. The urgency is now such that the matter cannot be longer or safely postponed.

The sums involved, though large by peacetime standards, are small in contrast to the great gains and goals which may be achieved. No one knows whether the North Koreans would have attacked if we had done the right kind of job in this field. No man knows whether our Armed Forces would feel warranted in demanding a far larger military budget, as we head toward this crisis, if we had done the job here which we could have done and at relatively small expense. The expenditure of several hundred million dollars over a period of years is small indeed in this great area, in contrast to our investment of tens of billions on armament and the other facets of our foreign policy. It is tiny indeed if it will surmount the crisis described by Ambassador Dulles. Indeed, as I have said, such sums would be small if the chances were only 1 in 5 that Ambassador Dulles is correct in his analysis. He does not have to be right. Let us just give him one chance in ten of being right, and we would be negligent indeed if we did not move ahead aggressively and at once in this area. Of course I think the chances are better than 1 in 5. I agree with Ambassador Dulles and congratulate him on his patriotic candor.

What I am discussing today is thus as urgent as any matter before the Congress or before the American people.

Further, Mr. President, here is an area in which we can act. Here is an area in which we can do something, and we can do it fast. This fact in itself should give new hope to our people, and new hope, in my judgment, to the people of the world.

Mr. President, I should like to insert at this point in my remarks the lead editorial in the Washington Post of this morning. It bears directly on the subject I have been discussing. The Washington Post has run many distinguished and able editorials over a long period of years, showing great insight in this field, and this is an excellent example of this insight.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR OF THE MIND

We are glad to note the report that the State Department is about to accept the challenge of Communist propaganda and ask for $100,000,000 to conduct its foreign information and education program. It is about time. The value of the information program is one aspect of foreign policy upon which there has come to be general agreement. If the administration had not been overly timid in asking for the funds necessary to do an all-out job there might have been less quibbling over pennies in Congress.

It will be necessary, of course, to expand the program constructively and not indiscriminately. Propaganda is a job that requires skill, not mere verbiage. Nevertheless, there are many outlets which have not been fully utilized. For example, radio programs to some areas are pititfully inadequate; they could be greatly improved by more transmitters and continuous broadcasts. More use might be made of existing national facilities in some countries. Just as important is expansion of the libraries which have become small outposts of America, along with more films and more personal contacts. The export of American talent is in itself a medium of propaganda. There is need to try new and unorthodox methods. Nor are iron curtain countries the only important focal points. It is imperative to get the truth across to friends in the free world, especially to countries such as India and Indonesia and in the Middle East. Latin America, too, has been largely neglected in what Senator MCMAHON recently termed the "whisper of America."

More than a national program is involved. A coordinated international propaganda effort, as we remarked the other day, is one of the measures on which the free world can get together in furtherance of what President Gonzales Videla of Chile described as a "democratic international." The free world has joined in a common effort against the Communist aggression in Korea. But it would be a mistake to think that it will remain united automatically in the face of the Communist distortions for 24 hours a day. Neutrality is the aim of the Kremlin's propagandists, and they seek to achieve it by implanting the little doubts which pave the way for the big lies. The poisoning of men's minds, of course, is one of the most effective methods of warfare.

It has been observed that actions speak louder than words, and this may be true as respects the short-sighted cut in point 4 funds by the Senate Appropriations Committee. But it is also true that the best-intentioned actions can be hidden or misconstrued unless people are constantly informed about them; indeed, there is a big job just in counteracting the ingrained misconceptions about this country. But above all, the information program must serve as the medium for explaining those decisions on policy and principle which are so subject to Communist distortion. In other words, the "truth offensive" is the best tool for making American—and free world—purposes perpetually and unmistakably clear.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, General Eisenhower has rightly called the program I am stressing today democracy's T-bomb.

I hope every Senator will read his testimony and that of Secretary Marshall, Secretary Acheson, Mr. Baruch, and the many distinguished witnesses who appeared in the hearings before Senator Thomas' committee. I do not feel that any impartial or objective person can read these hearings without discovering that we have in this new field a weapon of enormous potential strength. The situation in Korea now should make it clear to all of us that this is a weapon which we dare no longer suppress or deny. For as Wallace Carroll who served so brilliantly in the OWI has well said, the forces of freedom no longer have a choice. With him I agree: We must persuade—or perish.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, first of all I should like to pay appropriate tribute to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] for the splendid proposal which he has offered and to which he has given such inspiration and direction. There is no doubt that we have been sadly lacking in the field of informational services. I know and understand that the Senator from Connecticut would include in this great program of public information, not merely dissemination of radio broadcasts, but also creation of information centers throughout the world, the exchange of students, the exchange of scientific, social, and political information, so that the true picture and the true story of America and democratic living could be made available to the peoples of the world.

Mr. President, I sometimes feel that we may have been telling an all too grandiose story of the so-called better things of life instead of portraying the true picture of the way the American family, worker, businessman, and teacher lives. We ought to tell the story as it is. We ought to tell the peoples of the world that we are not a miracle people, mysterious, or unusual. We ought to tell them that because we have been able to create a society in which we have protected individual rights, recognized the fraternity and equality of mankind, and accepted the doctrine that certain truths are self-evident, we have been able to release to the fullest the capacities and capabilities of men and women from all over the world in the building of a new society and a new order in the United States and on the great North American Continent.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BENTON. I pointed out to Senator Thomas' committee that these great self-evident truths of our information policy are not self-propagating. They are self-evident, but they are not self-propagating. What we need is every device or technique for propagating them, to give hope to the people of the world everywhere.

The greatest of all devices to persuade people is face-to-face contact. The radio is merely a substitute for face-to-face contact. That is why the proper exchange of personnel between countries is the most effective insofar as those people whom it reaches and whom it affects. This cannot be done quickly, however, or ever done on a broad enough scale and so we must use printed matter, photographs, radio, and the like.

Mr. President, I merely wanted to reenforce what the Senator is saying.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. As he has pointed out on other occasions, it is almost ironical that a Nation which prides itself upon its great ability to dramatize its ability to achieve the spectacular, should be in a position where it is running a poor fourth or fifth in the competition of ideas and in the competition of public information.

The Senator from Connecticut has truly challenged the thinking of every thinking person by his proposal. It is a great testimonial to him that men of the caliber of General Marshall, General Eisenhower, Mr. Dulles, the great statesmen, Mr. Baruch, and others, have seen fit to come before the committee on their own and to testify in behalf of his proposal.

Mr. President, my remarks today are directed in part to the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut. In a more direct reference to one aspect of the appropriation bill which I know will be given discussion later, namely, the point

4 program, I have taken this opportunity to address the Senate on the issue of the point 4 program and the appropriation because I had heard that there might be a very severe limitation on debate in order to expedite the passage of the appropriation bill. I do feel, however, that the point 4 program having to do with technical, scientific assistance to the underdeveloped areas of the world is so important that every voice needs to be raised in its support. I believe it ties right in with what the Senator from Connecticut has been discussing, and I think my remarks will point that out.

Mr. President, if the Senate were to refuse today to appropriate funds to provide ammunition for American soldiers fighting in Korea, that would be regarded as an act of incredible folly. Yet we are being asked to commit an equally unreasonable act in the vitally important battle for the support and allegiance of the peoples of the earth.

The action in Korea is the military phase of the world-wide conflict between freedom and tyranny, and it is of the greatest immediate importance. Sometimes I think we would be better off if we would describe this conflict as the conflict between freedom and tyranny. I repeat, the action in Korea is the military phase of the world-wide conflict between freedom and tyranny, and it is of the greatest immediate importance. Yet the other phases of the struggle—economic, moral, and psychological—are also crucially important. If we win the current battle in Korea and in the long run lose the support of the peoples of the world, we will surely be defeated in the end. I believe that is the thesis to which the Senator from Connecticut has been directing a great deal of his remarks.

A few days ago, in the caucus room of the Senate, the Secretary of State, his Republican adviser, Mr. Dulles, General Marshall, and General Eisenhower appeared to testify in the strongest terms for the need of a great intensification of the overseas propaganda efforts of this Government. All of these leaders vigorously supported the commendable resolution of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] in which 13 Senators have joined, for launching a Marshall plan of ideas which would convince other peoples of the rightness of our aims, and counteract the vicious and lying attacks of the Communists against this country and democracy in general.

At the same time these gentlemen were urging a more powerful, sustained effort to appeal to the peoples of the world, in another room in this same Capitol the Senate Appropriations Committee was cutting the heart out of the most persuasive and effective argument the United States has yet advanced to win the support of millions of people in other countries—I refer directly to the point 4 program—to assist the peoples of the underdeveloped areas to achieve success in their own efforts for better living conditions.

Permit me, Mr. President, to digress to point out that the Communist attack today is in the underdeveloped areas. The critical portion of the world today is in the poverty-stricken, fever-ridden areas of Asia, especially southeast Asia, where people are sick at heart, cynical, and bitter, where the Communists have been able to play upon the colonial exploitation of the years past. It is to this area that the point 4 program is directed as if it were a guided missile.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BENTON. Would the Senator care to comment on an aspect of the Communist propaganda we do not adequately appreciate in this country, which has an overwhelming effect in these backward areas, namely, that it addresses itself to the legitimate aspirations of the people themselves.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is so right.

Mr. BENTON. How seldom do we recognize that and face up to it. That is the reason why the propaganda hits so hard in these underdeveloped areas, and it is why those are the weak spots, in which the Communists find the attack easy and the opposition fading before them. This is why we are vulnerable in so many spots throughout the world today, and why the point 4 program is of such enormous importance as a symbol of our intentions and desires to assist these people toward attaining their own legitimate aspirations, helping with our engineers and machinery and not just with propaganda, with technical assistance and not just with words.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. I had a pleasant experience this morning. The former Minister of Labor of the South Korean Government was my guest, and we had an opportunity to talk in the privacy of my office. That gentleman—educated, refined, cultured, here as a guest of the United States Department of State on a 90-day visit to the United States—told me the story of Communist propaganda in Korea. Every word the Senator from Connecticut has uttered is documented by the on-the-spot observations of the former Minister of Labor of the South Korean Government, Mr. Lee.

Mr. Lee told me that the Communists geared their propaganda to the desire of the peasants for land, for food, for education.

Mr. BENTON. Legitimate desires.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Legitimate desires, and of course once the Communist government took over in North Korea, these promises turned out to be false. But in the meantime these unhappy people were taken in, as it were—they were taken in as many an innocent American is sometimes fooled at the sideshow. It looks very good out in front, particularly when the ballyhoo artist is there talking it up, but when one gets into the show, he finds it is not what it is described to be on the outside.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. By way of preface, I have felt for a number of years that we have been very parsimonious in the whole program of information, and I have attempted on one or two occasions in the past to have the appropriation increased. I approved the effort to get a much larger appropriation, and I went before the Committee on Appropriations in behalf of the existing program, which started out with a budget recommendation of approximately $36,500,000. The House cut it to $34,000,000, and the Senate committee cut it to $32,700,000. Although we are dealing with a very small amount, comparatively, I find it extremely difficult to have allowed the amount the budget has already approved. I intend to offer an amendment, when we reach the item, to get the appropriation back to the budget figure. I should like to raise it to 50 or 60 million, but I thought we should get at least what the budget approved.

The Committee on Appropriations has been extremely unsympathetic to this program ever since I have been a Member of the Senate. That is what has been bothering me about the whole program. I think we have been very remiss with respect to the amount of money we have spent in the field of information and exchange of students. We have had authority for it. We have authority for it now. In my opinion the authority under the Smith-Mundt Act is quite broad enough to do everything that can be done under the point 4 program, but we cannot get the money in the committee and in the Congress. I hope the Senator from Minnesota can do something toward aiding us to secure a little money for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Arkansas. Long before I came to the United States Senate I had heard of the splendid work and leadership of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas in the field of foreign policy, and particularly in the field of public information and education. I can assure him that if he places an amendment before the Senate to augment the appropriation at least up to the suggestion of the Bureau of the Budget he will have all the support that one United States Senator can offer him, and he will have my vote. The program which the Senator from Arkansas initiated years ago is one, as he says, which is under way. It is authorized. It is operating. It has paid great dividends. If we had a measuring rod with which to calculate just how much had been done by the exchange of students, and by the information services, I think we would find that these programs have built great good will for democracy and for the American people.

The point 4 program has already made great headway—it has done so even before it has been formally put into operation—in winning the support of other peoples, which is essential if we are to repulse the all-out offensive of communism against the democratic way of life. Mr. President, let us make no mistake about it; we need the support of these other peoples. The United States of America cannot stand alone in the world against the Soviet Union and her satellites. We need the support of these other peoples. Our very existence as a free and independent Nation may ultimately depend on whether we or the Soviet Union win them to our side. True, we have the support of the majority of the nations in the battle for Korea, but there may be other Koreas before the widespread, deep-rooted Communist conspiracy to blot freedom and democracy from the face of the earth has been finally defeated. In fact, I think all reasonable people believe we are going to have other Koreas. The battle for Korea is only a skirmish in what is likely to be a long-drawn-out battle for the world. Certainly every American citizen ought to prepare himself psychologically and in every other way for what is going to be a long-drawn-out struggle in our generation and maybe in generations to come, as to whether this will be a world governed by the despots of tyranny or whether this will be a world in which the principles of freedom survive and in which its banners will remain unfurled.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] has demonstrated courage and vision by his proposal of "a Marshall plan of ideas." I join with others in vigorously supporting his measure. I am sorry he has left the floor for the moment. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut would be the first to recognize that any expansion of our educational, informational, radio, and news services for the dissemination of democratic ideas will be fortified a thousandfold if we can tell the world of our deeds that carry out our ideals. The emphasis today needs to be placed upon deeds, programs, accomplishments. Then we should strengthen our informational and educational services to tell the true story.

As the Senator from Connecticut pointed out, the Koreans were not even told about the tremendous amount of help we gave to them. The story was never told in such vivid terms that the average Korean listening at his little radio or in the public square would know the full truth of the contribution of America to the independence and freedom of the South Korean people.

The people of the world are dizzy and confused by the propaganda barrage of the east and the west. I think we ought to put it down now once and for all that we can never outpromise the Communists. It is foreign to our nature to be so irresponsible. We can, however, utilize the resources at our command and by our own deeds prove to the peoples of the world that democracy is a realistic, practical answer to the perplexing problems which beset mankind.

Technological and scientific assistance in combatting malaria, in overcoming tuberculosis, in improving the use of the land and the development of new crops—these are things that people can understand. They do not require any interpretation. These are problems that strike powerful blows in the cause of freedom, in the struggle against communism.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The amount which was requested for the point 4 program, as I recall, was $35,000,000, was it not?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. And the Appropriations Committee cut that amount to $20,000,000?

Mr. HUMPHREY. To $10,000,000.

Mr. LUCAS. To $10,000,000. In other words, the small sum of $35,000,000 was requested by the President of the United States with respect to point 4, in order to point the way to something really worth while for the future of this country; yet the Appropriations Committee denied the President that small amount, when billions of dollars are being appropriated for other purposes.

I simply cannot understand how the Appropriations Committee could slash $25,000,000 from the small request of $35,000,000 to carry out the point 4 program. Before the debate is concluded I hope someone will explain why that was done. I will say, however, it cannot be explained to my satisfaction. I care not whether evidence on that point was presented before the committee; I care not whether there was anything other than the President's message—and that we know about—before the committee. We all know what point 4 means. We all know what the objectives of point 4 are. Certainly $35,000,000 was a small sum indeed with which to start the program, with which to do something which in the future might be of tremendous constructive help to this Nation. At this particular time, when, as the Senator said, the Communists, through their propaganda methods, through their lying methods, are giving democracy a real test, we, so to speak, take the wrong horn of the dilemma and retreat, rather than go forward with the point 4 program.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Illinois has surely stated the issue in concise and pertinent terms. I am very grateful and thankful to him for having done so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. With respect to the request for $35,000,000, I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that $7,600,000 was appropriated under the Smith-Mundt Act, under the Fulbright Act, and under the item for the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, out of $8,100,000, which, as I recall, was requested originally by the Bureau of the Budget. After deducting the $8,100,000, leaving $26,900,000, the Senate Appropriations Committee in its wisdom cut it down to $10,000,000. I personally do not approve of that, and I have, together with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] prepared an amendment which is now on the desks of Members of the Senate, to increase the $10,000,000 to $20,000,000.

I personally believe in the principles of the point 4 program. Whether the amount for that program should be $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 in addition to the amount provided under the Smith-Mundt Act and under the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, is a question of judgment and is a question of a relatively small amount.

The reason which I think influenced the majority of the members of the Appropriations Committee—and I do not speak for them because I was in the minority—was that there was not sufficient justification before the Senate Appropriations Committee for the amount requested. I believe it would be extremely helpful to have, and, as one Senator, I certainly am going to try to have a better justification on the floor of the Senate than was presented in the Senate Appropriations Committee for that amount.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; but first I wish to thank the Senator from Massachusetts for what he has said.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from Minnesota for giving me an opportunity to make the statement, and I hope he will support me in my amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation in regard to this item. It applies not only to the cutting of appropriations for point 4, but to the cutting of the appropriations for the existing program. The action of the committee was to recommend a cut, under the budget request for funds for the existing program, which was $36,600,000. The House cut that amount to $34,000,000; and the Senate committee has voted to cut that amount by another $1,300,000.

I can see no justification for such action. Every detail was presented to the committee on regard to what the money would be used for. Nine nations, in addition to the ones participating in this program last year, are now participating in it; and that fact would justify a considerable increase in the appropriation. Furthermore, there is all the justification now being presented by the Senator from Minnesota and by other Senators who have spoken about this matter. Yet the Appropriations Committee quibbled over $1,300,000, voted to cut the appropriation for this item more than the House cut it. The committee has done that now for more than 2 years running. That action by the committee indicates that it has no real concern with this program. The committee voted to cut the appropriations for this item more than that 2 years ago, even although the program is designed for the same objective as that of the point 4 program, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I may be confused in regard to what the Senator from Arkansas has said, but I believe we are talking about the same thing. Of course, one is the appropriation item for information and educational activity, which was approximately $36,000,000. The House cut that item to $34,000,000; but now the final result, on the basis of the action of the Senate Appropriations Committee, is an item of $32,700,000.

Included in that item is the $7,600,000 for the Smith-Mundt Act program and the program in connection with the Institute of Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That $7,600,000 will be moved over to and included in the amount appropriated for the so-called point 4 program?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes. The attempt is to take it out of the existing program and mix it up with the other one. In effect, there would be no improvement at all. By legerdemain it would be moved out of the existing Voice of America program and would be moved into the program for point 4. I assume that the committee has voted to do so on the basis of the belief that there will be some backing or some votes on the floor of the Senate for such action.

The point is that no real progress at all will be made as a result of such procedure. Why the Appropriations Committee voted to cut the item by $1,300,000 after the item was reduced by the House of Representatives is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am extremely happy to witness the rightful indignation of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Of course, I am indignant. The committee has acted in this way for 3 years. Such action on the part of the committee is nothing new. The committee always has tried to emasculate the program so far as it could do so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let me say that I do not like to stand here and be criticized, seemingly, as having tried to decrease the funds available for this program, when the fact is that I am one of those who take the same view the Senator from Arkansas takes. I merely wish to say that the State Department did not present its case very well in its testimony before the committee.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Certainly I presented my case fairly well.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to compliment the Senator from Massachusetts for being on the correct side, except I point out that his amendment does not go so far as it should. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators will vote to increase the amount available for this purpose.

It seems to me that when we are asking for $35,000,000 for this program, as the Senator from Arkansas said a while ago, it is tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum for the Appropriations Committee to vote to strike a million and a quarter dollars from this item. Why the committee should vote to take such action is difficult for me to understand. However, perhaps I understand it correctly; in other words, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, over all these years the committee has attempted to emasculate the appropriations for this program, although this is the program which today is advising people everywhere in the world that we have been proceeding with the proper purposes. In fact, if we had spent more money for these educational programs, perhaps we would not be in our present position.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Illinois for his observations. He has presented the case forcefully.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator can yield only for a question. However, in the light of the observations made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the majority leader, if the Senator from Arkansas is talking about the justification for appropriations for the point 4 program, that is one thing, of course. If he is talking about the justification for the requested appropriation of funds for the Fulbright student-exchange program, that is another thing.

I happen to be a member of the Appropriations Committee; and at the committee hearings I listened to the testimony and the presentation given by Mr. Thorp in regard to the point 4 program. I am satisfied that the other members of the Appropriations Committee will bear me out when I say that Mr. Thorp did not at all justify this appropriation. He did not present a thing, not a solitary case, in justification of the appropriation called for by the budget.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota and of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the majority leader, to the fact that there was an absolute failure of justification, regardless of whether we believe in the merits or in the demerits of the program. If Senators will read the testimony in the hearings in that connection, I am sure all Senators will agree with me on that point. No justification at all was given.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, let me say that it is my purpose to give the justification.

Mr. WHERRY. I hope the Senator will do so. After all, if there is to be any effort on the floor of the Senate to increase the amount of the appropriation for this item, and to do so on a fair basis, certainly such justification should be presented to the Senate; and, if possible, new evidence should be presented on the floor of the Senate, because in my opinion the committee hearings contain no justification at all to warrant an appropriation of $35,000,000, $8,000,000 of which, as the Senator from Massachusetts already has said, has already been provided, and as to that much of the item there was no objection at all.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. If there is no justification at all, as the Senator from Nebraska has just said, why should anything at all be provided for this purpose? Yet the committee has voted to provide some funds.

Mr. WHERRY. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska not to interrupt me. The Senator from Minnesota has yielded to me, and I should like to make my statement without interruption.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska constantly says that in the committee record there is no justification at all for such an appropriation. Yet arbitrarily, apparently, the committee has voted to reduce the item from $35,000,000 to $10,000,000.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield, to permit me to make an observation?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the majority leader is entirely correct; in other words, why do we provide anything at all for this item? I think there was a failure to justify the appropriation of a single dollar or a single dime for this purpose. Of course, the question of whether we believe or do not believe in the merits or demerits of the point 4 program is another matter; but I say to the Senator from Arkansas, who sincerely believes in this program, and who is joined in that belief by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, that the merits of the program are an entirely different matter. I am merely saying that if the Senator expects to justify even the appropriation of $10,000,000, or whatever amount the Senate may finally decide upon, to my mind additional testimony will be required; and I believe that it should be brought to the attention of the Members of the Senate generally, because in my personal opinion there has been absolutely no justification for the appropriation of this money.

The fact is that Mr. Thorp went to the United Nations and made commitments without any authority at all for doing so. If it had not been for that, there would not be even the slightest justification for even the appropriation of $10,000,000.

So I say to the distinguished Senator, with all due respect for his sincerity in this matter, which I grant—and also I grant the sincerity of all other Senators who believe in the point 4 program—that there should be more evidence to justify this appropriation item than that which was offered by Mr. Thorp in regard to this particular phase of the point 4 program.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I shall make several comments about what I believe to be the approach made by representatives of the State Department in their appearance before the Appropriations Committee; and I hope my comments will be worthy of the attention of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, of course I always listen with great interest to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I merely wish to say that I did not hear all the testimony in the committee regarding the point 4 program, but I did appear before the subcommittee presided over by the Senator from Nevada, when it was considering the Smith-Mundt program, namely, the regular information program under the Smith-Mundt Act and the program which I sponsor. There is in the record in that connection very excellent testimony. I myself testified, as also did Mr. Johnstone, Mr. Sargeant, and Mr. Barrett. The Budget Bureau approved the item. It has been thoroughly gone over. The program has been in operation for a number of years. Yet the Appropriations Committee voted to cut the item by $1,300,000 below the cut the House of Representatives already had made. In my opinion there was no lack of justification for the appropriation requested, but the action taken was simply an attempt to cut down the activities which already have been established.

The effect of the action of the committee, if supported by the Senate as a whole, would be to restrict the activities, and to do so more than they were restricted last year, in the case of the only program for this purpose which now is in existence. While I am sympathetic to and will support point 4, I still say, as I did before, when we had the question under consideration, that it is possible to do, and there is being done on a small scale, exactly, under the Smith-Mundt resolution, what can be done under the point 4 program.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not on the subcommittee which handled the appropriations for the State Department. I think most of the appropriations about which the distinguished Senator is talking, relative to the Fulbright resolution, are carried in that appropriation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I only heard the evidence on the particular matter about which the Senator is talking when he himself appeared before the full committee when it was considering the matter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to correct the Senator on that point. That is not the testimony to which I am referring. I went before the subcommittee. I did not anticipate, before the full committee, that the idea that anyone who does not appeal to us is a Communist had become so thoroughly spread about in the Senate. I am checking upon that matter very carefully at the moment. That was not at all my testimony to which I am referring, and which is in the printed record.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield this time, after which I shall continue my remarks.

Mr. WHERRY. I was not on the Foreign Relations Committee, and therefore did not hear the Senator when he testified before the subcommittee. I only heard him testify before the full Committee on Appropriations, which considered the subcommittee's report on the State Department appropriations, which contained the recommendations about which the distinguished Senator is talking.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is what I am complaining about. I think it is very short-sighted.

Mr. WHERRY. I followed the recommendation of the Senate committee, because the subcommittee said the members prepared the best bill they could, after giving it full consideration. Naturally, when one is not in a position to go into all the ramifications of appropriations, it is necessary to be guided by the recommendations of the subcommittee. I quite generally follow the recommendations of a subcommittee.

I did not want to discuss this issue and I am only talking about the point 4 program. I am not stating on the floor of the Senate that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas did not present a full case to the subcommittee. The only testimony I heard him give was some of the testimony before the full committee, and that developed into an argument regarding one professor who came here, who was a Communist, and another question of whether any of the students had been properly screened, and what not. To be perfectly frank, the impression I got was that certainly more screening was needed. But I am not complaining about the merits of the Fulbright exchange legislation.

Neither did I hear the testimony before the subcommittee. But I did hear the testimony about point 4. I wanted the Senator to know that. I went into it very thoroughly, and my opinion is, if the Senator will read the record, that there is not a Senator who can approve an appropriation of $35,000,000 on the evidence which was submitted, regardless of the merits of the undertaking. After all, that is the job of a member of the Appropriations Committee, whether he agrees with an authorization bill or not. I have always taken the position that, once Congress approves an authorization, then my job is to see to it that it is justified, whether I voted for the authorization or not. On that basis alone, I judged Mr. Thorp's testimony, and I submit to the distinguished Senator that in my humble opinion there was no justification. There was not even justification for the $10,000,000, if you please.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota will try to complete his remarks. I am very grateful for the observations which have been made and the debate which has been carried on, because I believe that it has been helpful in promoting a proper understanding of what has happened in the Appropriations Committee, particularly the remarks which have been directed to the informational and educational program. I shall direct some of my remarks toward the comments and observations of the distinguished minority leader, and I surely am grateful for his participation, because it is true that there was inadequate representation before the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am going to make that point later on in my address. I believe it is our job here, now, on the Senate floor, to dig out the evidence we need, and to support this program. That is why I wish to make these comments today. These are but preliminary remarks. Others will have much more information to offer.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator from Minnesota will yield for a brief remark?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to include in my colloquy, if the Senator does not mind, a reference to page 295 of the report on the pending bill, to which the Senator has no doubt already called attention, and which thoroughly explains the $10,000,000 appropriation and also the $8,100,000 item about which the Senator from Massachusetts was talking, and about which there was no argument, the Senator will understand.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am very happy to have yielded for that purpose.

Mr. President, I was saying a moment ago that technological and scientific assistance in combating diseases, such as malaria, in overcoming tuberculosis, in improving the use of land and the development of new crops, strikes a powerful blow in the struggle against communism. These programs are understandable to the people, and, I repeat, they strike mighty blows in our struggle against communism. When we take these programs and discuss them, when we talk about these projects and programs through our informational, educational, and radio and press services, we reveal a telling story, we present a meaningful story to the people of the lands where the technological and scientific programs have been used. I think it is imperative that, as we talk about information—and I know my good friend from Connecticut will agree with me—as we talk about public information, radio and news publicity and educational programs, that we remember that hungry, weak, unemployed, distraught, cynical, sick people just are not revived or rehabilitated by a soothing voice on the air. We must have something to talk about, and what we need to talk about in these areas of the underdeveloped parts of the world, where the people are underprivileged, where they have been under the colonial yoke of exploitation, where they have never had a break in life—what we ought to be telling them is the accomplishments which have been made available under the technological, scientific assistance program.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. BENTON. I am dreadfully sorry I am unable to remain to hear the remainder of this very interesting and instructive argument by the Senator from Minnesota. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], before the Thomas subcommittee, last week, testified that he felt that this program should be increased to $100,000,000?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am aware of that, and I would say that the Senator from Oregon is not being a bit extravagant in his remarks. I think he is being quite practical. I make this observation, and I think it is one anyone would make if he has ever had the misfortune of being a little bit hungry. Hungry people want food, not advice; they want something to eat. Impoverished people want an opportunity to earn a living, not somebody to talk to them. Unemployed people want work. The point 4 program of technological and scientific assistance attacks these social and economic evils at the source of contamination, namely, in the local environment of every country where economic and political chaos consumes the population.

This is a program through which the United Nations agencies, the United States Government, and the other governments participating joined together. It is a self-help program. It is not charity. It is not work relief. It is not a hand-out. It is not a gift. It is a program dedicated to utilizing the manpower and the physical and natural resources that are available, so that these can be created into constructive, good products and services for the benefit of the people in the Nation.

The Voice of America and the Marshall plan of ideas can and will be effective only when we have the right to things to talk about. I know that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] has told us again and again that we have failed to tell our story about some of the good things that we have done—and we have done much good. There are yet other things to be done. We need to be as bold and as courageous in our struggle against poverty, ill health, the general breakdown of economic and social conditions as we are in our military efforts in combating world aggression. Our radio and publicity efforts, telling about the wonders of democracy, can breed a cynical despair in the hearts of the underprivileged people in the underdeveloped areas, if these people never have the opportunity to apply the wonders of science and technology to their own lives, their own soil, their own interests, and their own institutions.

If one wants to lose a friend, here is one way to do it—just go around and tell people how well off you are; just go around telling your poor neighbors what a fine home you have, what a fine automobile, what a fine job, what a good income, when the friend or neighbor is without a home, without an automobile, without an income, and without a job.

That is the quickest and surest way in the world to make a real enemy. The cynical attitude grows into bitterness and jealousy.

The point 4 program is an effort to help people to help themselves to make something out of their lives. It appears to me that the best publicity and propaganda for democracy is the application of scientific and technological knowledge to the economic and social structure of the underdeveloped areas.

The appalling contrast between these concurrent actions in the Capitol last week, Mr. President, is enough to shock us into asking ourselves some blunt and forthright questions. Are we really in earnest about winning the support of other peoples or are we just trying to kid them and ourselves? If we really want to win their support, how do we think it can be done? Can it be done with words alone or does it require more and more deeds—deeds that will have meaning to other peoples as well as to ourselves? Are we so blind that we refuse to recognize the true value of this incomparable instrument we already hold in our hand—so unwise that we are ready to cast it aside without even putting it to use? Are we true to ourselves when we readily vote billions for necessary military expenditures and refuse to spend a few million to help construct the equally essential economic and spiritual bases of democracy in the world?

Let us be charitable and assume that a clear understanding is lacking of the connection between point 4 and the battle of Korea—between point 4 and other battles it may prevent if it is put to full and effective use in time. Just what is the significance and the value of point 4 in this world-wide struggle in which we are engaged?

I think all of us concede, Mr. President, the vital importance of winning the understanding and active support of the peoples of the world for the cause of freedom and democracy if that cause is to triumph. How can this be done? We must realize that words alone will not suffice to touch the hearts and win the minds of mankind. We must understand that millions of people throughout the world do not live as we do—that theirs is an existence made almost intolerable by pitiless poverty, disease, and ignorance. We must also realize—contrary to the smug belief in some quarters that these people live in such conditions because they choose to—that they are aware of the subhuman existence to which they are condemned and are resentful of it.

These are the people to whom the Communists insistently promise a better life if only they will throw in their lot with communism.

We should know by this time that the Communists have been able to make great strides by their appeal to the misery of the people. We ought to know that much of the Communist aggression has not been by the force of marching men, but by the tragedy of the breakdown of social and economic society. We know that their promises are false. We see every day that communism actually offers nothing but slavery, with not even better living conditions to compensate for the loss of freedom. But the millions to whom the Communists make their promises do not know this, or, at least, they did not know it early enough.

How can we convince them that the promises of communism are false and the ways of democracy are better? We cannot convince them by words alone—we cannot outpromise and outlie the Communists, even if we tried. Our most convincing argument must be directed to the human needs; to put it more bluntly, to the pits of their stomachs—where there is an aching void instead of satisfying food—where there is a vacuum which the Communists try to fill with Communist promises and slogans and doctrines, just as they try to fill political vacuums with Communist power.

On many occasions, Mr. President, I have mentioned on the floor of the Senate that one of the places where Communist ideology is working overtime and with feverish effort is the Republic of India. That great Republic has sought in the past 7 or 8 months to procure grain to feed the hungry millions. We can talk to those people about democracy all we want to, but what they want is something to eat. When they see that we have food in surplus, that we even destroy it, as they are told by the Communists; when they see that we have to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars even to store this food when they would like to buy it, it really gives the Communists something to talk about. Everything we can do in Indonesia, everything we can do in southern Asia, Burma, Thailand, Indochina, to raise the living standards of the people through their own efforts, through the use of knowledge and information, through the transfer of experts to those nations to help the people, will do more to beat down communism than will all the pamphlets we can possibly send there. People have got to be pretty hungry before they will eat pamphlets. A hungry man is an available person for the Communist line.

What can we offer these people that is more convincing than Communist propaganda—that will really fill their stomachs, that will really alleviate their misery, that will really give them new decency and dignity, to which even the lowliest aspire? We can give them, Mr. President, the most irrefutable kind of proof that democracy is immeasurably superior to communism—demonstrable proof in the form of the methods, the skills and the knowledge that have enabled us to attain in this country the high standard of living that is the envy of the world. We can make this demonstration in a form that can be understood and appreciated by the humblest peasants and workers in every country—tangible, effective advice and assistance that will enable them by their own efforts to raise themselves and their families to a new level of well-being. What better answer can there be to communism?

This is the most effective answer to the false promises of communism, Mr. President, because it is the stuff of life. It makes itself felt in the daily lives of the masses of people, because it deals with the things in which they are most vitally and immediately concerned—more food to eat, more clothing to wear, better shelter for their households, better health for their families, and better opportunities for their children.

This is what point 4 means. This is what point 4 can accomplish. How do we know? Because we have tried this method for 10 years at least, and have proved that it works. We have proved that it is practical, it is effective, it is inexpensive, and it convinces the people whom it benefits both of the friendship of the United States and of the efficacy of democratic principles.

During World War II, the technical assistance program carried on by the Institute of Inter-American Affairs was one of the most effective instrumentalities for gaining support of the United States in the Latin-American countries. American agricultural experts showed their farmers how to grow more food to offset the reduction of imports caused by the war; American doctors and engineers improved the health and sanitation of thousands of workers producing war materials. By the end of the war, surveys indicated that 25,000,000 Latin Americans had benefited from these efforts. This work was known and appreciated by the people of those countries, as well as by their governments.

Since then, this program has been continued on a reduced scale by the institute, while a parallel program of 26 United States agencies, under the leadership of the State Department, has been in continuous operation for 11 years. At the beginning, the United States put up most of the money for the health and sanitation, agricultural, and educational programs; now the Latin-American countries put up $3 to every $1 spent by the United States.

After the Institute of Inter-American Affairs had participated in technical-assistance projects in Costa Rica for 5 years the President of that country in 1947, Jose Figueres, dedicated a local office of the joint agricultural service. He emphasized the cooperative nature of the work, and smilingly told his audience: "This is the Yankee imperialism you have heard so much about."

That is the kind of testimonial we want from peoples in other lands.

In the capital of Chile the Institute of Inter-American Affairs helped install a sewerage system that serves 200,000 people in a quarter of the city inhabited by workers and their families. The project not only provided sanitation for people among whom the Communists had been very active, but also made possible the cultivation of crops on 100,000 acres formerly unsuitable for food production because the irrigation ditches were polluted by sewage. When the project was completed the people of the district, of their own accord, arranged a public ceremony at which they sang the Star-Spangled Banner and dedicated a marble marker expressing their gratitude to the United States.

Believe me, that kind of gratitude is hard to find, and demonstrations like that are few and far between, when we are merely exporting arms or talking in terms of a direct-relief program. Here these people helped themselves. They were grateful for the assistance they received in their self-help program.

In Ceylon a representative of the United States Bureau of Reclamation is advising the Government on the construction of a large dam that will provide irrigation for enough land to feed half a million people. In the same country the World Health Organization assisted in an intensive campaign that entirely eliminated malaria at a cost of 20 cents per capita. They have eliminated malaria, the dread disease of the tropics, in the country of Ceylon at the cost of 20 cents per person. By way of comparison, it has been estimated that the direct cost of malaria for every person who has the disease in India is $2 a year.

One American agricultural expert in Guatemala has shown Latin-American coffee growers how they can double or triple their yield without increasing acreage, simply by selecting high-yielding strains of coffee trees. Another American technician helped save Brazil's citrus industry by finding the cause of a ruinous plant disease, at a cost of $30,000.

These instances are only a few of hundreds that could be cited. The fact is that the point 4 principle has been proved time and again: It is inexpensive, it is practical, it is effective in persuading the people among whom it is applied of the good intentions of the United States and the benefits of the democratic way of life.

I want to say right now that I think that kind of program will do more to save the world from aggressive, militaristic communism than any pamphlet, radio broadcast, or feature movie, because when we get right down to it the peoples of the world turn to a foreign ideology or subversive doctrine, and turn away from principles of human freedom, only when they are sick, down and out, without property, and without a chance to make something out of their lives.

We have only to apply this principle on a much broader scale, as President Truman has suggested, to have an unbeatable weapon against communism.

We frequently hear anguished outcries from leading Americans, including Members of Congress, about the dangers of communism, and demands for positive, imaginative, appealing measures to counter the threat of communism. Well, here it is. What could be more positive, constructive, dynamic than point 4?

The trouble is that many Members of Congress, many officials of the Government, do not know a good thing when they see it. Even the State Department, as I pointed out to the minority leader, has been entirely too slow and reticent in realizing the enormous potentialities of point 4, and too timid to put it to full use. That seems to be the trouble with our Foreign Service officers. They are afflicted with timidity and caution. They are always far behind the people. You can bet your bottom dollar that if our positions were reversed, and the Russians possessed the tremendous advantage that our technological resources give us, they would be using it to the hilt all over the world against us. Here we have in our hands the best imaginable weapon against communism, and we do not have the gumption and the sagacity to use it.

The American people are far ahead of the Government in realizing the great potentialities of point 4. There is tremendous interest and enthusiasm all over the country for this program, especially among people who understand it best. Let me quote a statement. It comes from a highly respected American citizen.

I quote:

> It is our firm belief that the interests of the United States will best be served by helping nations and peoples to help themselves. It is in our interest to help the distressed attain their needs so that they will have the physical strength to defend and carry forward their intellectual, moral, and spiritual freedom.
>
> Thus, by helping others to help themselves, we will aid them in achieving independence from domination of any kind. * * * Our interest and the best interest of the people throughout the world are inseparable, and thus in reality we serve our own best interest by helping others achieve strength and health, opportunity, and freedom through rising standards of living.
> The sooner all of us recognize the fact that the welfare of the world is indivisible and that our freedom and the freedom of other nations are inseparable, the sooner we will be able to face with all our force the gigantic task that exists today, the task of raising the standards of living of peoples of all lands.

That statement, Members of the Senate, was not made by an official of this Government, a visionary planner, a college professor, or even a Democrat. It was made by one of the foremost industrialists and one of the foremost financiers in this country, Mr. Nelson A. Rockefeller.

What then is the source of the opposition to point 4? It can hardly be based upon the amount of money involved, since only a total of $35,000,000 was authorized for point 4, whereas we are appropriating approximately $3,000,000,000 for direct ECA assistance and about a billion and a quarter for additional military assistance. There is little doubt but that we will appropriate even more in view of the dire and critical international situation.

It is interesting for me to observe that, every time Senators are asked if more money should be needed in the international situation because of the Korean struggle would it be forthcoming, to a man we say, "Of course it will." We say to the President, "Send down your requests. They will be voted immediately." I want to state as loudly as I can that we cannot whip communism with arms alone. If we alone are in an arms race with world communism, we are licked right now. They will bleed us white. What we must recognize is that we need allies, and the friendship, understanding, and devotion of millions and millions of people who are being sucked into the Communist orbit. If the Congress of the United States persists in ignoring this program and only spends money in a great armaments race, we have lost all hope of being able to maintain a free world.

The opposition to point 4 cannot be based upon any claim that it is new or a theoretical matter. This program has been operating in limited areas for several years, and it has operated successfully. It has operated to the satisfaction of the peoples receiving the aid and our own country that has given the aid.

The opposition to point 4 surely cannot be based upon the assertion that this is some new untried venture within the framework of the United Nations. The programs of world health, food, and agriculture and other related UN agencies are directed toward similar ends. We have joined in these agencies in full knowledge of their work and objectives.

What then is the basis for the opposition? Are the American people to believe that the opposition is one based upon economy? That will hardly stand the test of public scrutiny when the limited sum of $35,000,000 is requested. Compare this small sum to the military expenditures.

Are the American people to believe that the curtailment of appropriations for the point-4 program is primarily a political move because it was proclaimed and has been vigorously championed by President Truman? I am sure that this is not and will not be the intention of the Senate. I am confident that party politics does not control in the field of foreign policy.

We in the Congress must keep pace with the American people in their understanding of the political, social, and economic conditions which provide a fertile soil for communism. The American people know that communism grows and expands where there is sickness, hunger, and poverty. The American people know that where men and women enjoy some of the good things of life, communism finds it most difficult to make inroads, and the American people have a right to expect the same kind of intelligence and competent observation on the part of their representatives in the Congress.

The American people are a generous people. They want our country to share its scientific and technological knowledge with our friends. The American people expect their Congress, which represents them, to translate their wholesome desire "to share" into public law. Our people are crying out in desperation for a Congress to be as positive in its search for peace as it is in its willingness to meet the armed force of communism by military strength.

Let no one forget that for a moment. There is sadness in the hearts of millions of Americans, and they are looking to the Congress for some guidance, not merely on appropriations for new bombs, which we must have because of the sad, sick, and sorry world in which we live, but they are looking to the Congress for some light and some leadership to get at and to destroy the sources of contamination, of communism, wherever we find them. The way we do that is in the economic, social, and political areas, not in the military alone.

Let there be no misunderstanding of my words. The people of this Nation recognize that our struggle with communism is twofold. It is one of meeting the Communist ideology by democratic ideas and democratic performance. It is the other of meeting the brutal military power of Communist conspiracy by a united, strong, and prepared nation. Our people, the people of America, expect the Congress to interpret their ideas and their wishes into public policy.

The Congress and the American people have rallied almost unanimously in support of the President's courageous decision on Korea. A drastic cut in point-4 funds at this time would mean that we are ready to follow him when he stakes the fate of the Nation on military action to check aggression, but we refuse to follow his lead in a long-range effort to prevent future Koreas. It would mean that we actively seek the support of other nations when we are directly engaged in military action in which our national prestige and security are involved, but we tell them they can shift for themselves, can go their own way, as far as their own welfare is concerned.

Only 4 weeks ago the United Nations held a conference to raise funds for its expanded technical assistance program, which was inspired by President Truman's initiative in proposing point 4. This conference was held only after Congress had authorized $35,000,000 for technical assistance and specified that part of this amount could be used in programs conducted by international agencies. This Government pledged $12,000,000 to the United Nations program, and, on that understanding, 49 other countries pledged $8,000,000 more.

A drastic cut in the point-4 appropriation, as proposed by the Appropriations Committee, would make it necessary for this Government, at this critical hour in world history, at a time when the United Nations has stood with us and we have stood with them, to renege on at least part of its pledge to the United Nations. This would hamper, if not cripple, the United Nations program of technical assistance. Moreover, it would embarrass not only the President and our representatives in the United Nations, but it would also seriously damage the prestige of the United States itself.

Such a result could only be interpreted throughout the world, at a time when the free world is striving to achieve solidarity under the banner of the United Nations, as a vote of "no confidence" by the United States in the economic and social activities of the UN.

Communism is an international conspiracy. That is what communism is, an international conspiracy. It is a philosophy that has military adherents and supporters in many lands. International communism is directed by the evil, and, may I say, very clever, men of the Kremlin. Its center of power is the Soviet Union. Yet the military aggression that we see in Korea and the aggression that we saw in Czechoslovakia were not the direct product of an attack by Russian soldiers. We see a new form of aggression. We see an international army, an international program, an international philosophy, which repudiates the whole structure of international law based upon territorial integrity and freedom, and national independence.

We see Koreans attack Korea for Russian Communist purposes. We see Czechoslovakians destroy the independence of Czechoslovakia as a part of the master plan of the Kremlin. We see Chinese Communists destroy independent China to fulfill the plan of the Communist leaders. We see Communist Indochinese attacking and ravaging their land as a part of the evil plot of the international Communist movement. We watched the Communists of France and of Italy—yes, of every land—do the bidding and the work of their masters in the Soviet Union. Time-honored principles of national pride and national patriotism and devotion have been cast away by this evil insidious philosophy of international communism.

What does this tell us? Surely it tells us that no one nation alone can successfully meet the attack of an international movement that has its slaves, its dupes, and its servants in every land.

One hundred and fifty million Americans cannot meet the attack of 800,000,000 enslaved Communist-controlled people. It is impossible, unless we want to get ourselves down into the pitiful condition in which their slaves and dupes find themselves. So it resolves itself into finding friends, and building for ourselves and our principles an international organization.

I was very much pleased to see the editorial in the Washington Post of today, which stated that the former President of Chile, Gonzalez-Videla, when he came to Washington, suggested the creation of a democratic international to stop the spread of the international Communists. What a wonderful idea, a democratic international to stop the spread of international communism. If the Communists can pick us off one at a time, that is what they are going to do. Surely we have discovered that the one instrument through which we can work so as to have a great, united international movement dedicated to democratic humane and decent purposes, is the United Nations.

The very obvious fact that Communists have but one loyalty, namely, the loyalty to a totalitarian philosophy with its prophets of doom working from behind the walls of the Kremlin, should make it crystal clear to all freedom-loving people that if we are to counterattack, if we are to meet this menace and destroy its effectiveness, we too must have an international movement, an international forum, an international government to carry forth our program of freedom and democracy, and to implement our ideas. Here again it seems as if divine providence is on our side. This Nation has been blessed many times by the good fortune, I am sure, of having divine care and counsel.

Fortunately, a great international instrument of law and order is available. That international body finds itself revealed in the United Nations. The United Nations is now a working instrumentality to preserve international law. This great international organization into which we should be directing this point 4 funds, to give it life and to give it something with which to work, was inspired by the ideals of Woodrow Wilson. He was the great philosopher of our time, of our century, in the cause of international order and world peace. The UN was also given guidance by the late President Franklin Roosevelt. We are its creators, and must be its stanch defenders.

The declaration of the United Nations was written in this Capital and subscribed to by 26 nations on January 1, 1942. The preliminary proposals for the creation of a great international organization, later to become the United Nations, were written at Dumbarton Oaks right here in the Nation's Capital. The conference that drew the Charter of the United Nations was held in the great city of San Francisco, in the United States of America, as I said, it appears to me that divine providence has given to us and to every freedom-loving people the tools and the weapons to meet the evil philosophy of Communist totalitarianism. The free people of the world have a charter to fight for and to work for. The free people of the world have an instrument of law and order that they can use. We here in America above all others should be able to understand the importance of working through the United Nations and of strengthening its agencies.

I plead for the kind of understanding that will save us from the peril which will be upon us if we do not act in concert with freedom-loving peoples.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a series of editorials pertaining to American participation in the United Nations.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

WAR OF WORDS

Acheson and Dulles, Marshall and Eisenhower—all four spoke up forcefully Wednesday in behalf of an expansion of our information program. They pointed to the immense resources that the Russians are throwing into the battle of words over Korea. Actions are said to speak louder than words, but one of the wonders of the twentieth century is that they don't. Our actions in Korea are pure enough, and the actions of the aggressor that we are coping with are just the opposite; but let us remember that millions of people depend not upon unadulterated sources of news, but upon words whispered across the diameter of the earth by men who not only have the resources but are supreme technicians in the art of bamboozling and befuddling.

To be sure, 43 nations have testified to our virtue by supporting our action against the aggressor, and you would think that this fact would in itself be eloquent enough. But the testimony is that it isn't. Thus the great need from all these supporting nations is that they shall mobilize their communications resources to spell out their support of the sanctions undertaken in Korea. They should be asked to join with us and the United Nations Organization at Lake Success in revealing the true position. They all have facilities of communication. All of them have their own peculiar audiences in which what they say is predominantly influential, and some of these go beyond their frontiers. In the present crisis, certainly, national propaganda should be secondary and the first item in the 43 nations' program should be an explanation of why they demand a cease-fire and a withdrawal in Korea.

Parallel propaganda is something for which this newspaper has long pleaded as the bounden duty of all nations who prize their liberty. The last occasion was when President Gonzales Videla of Chile came to Washington. The Chilean suggested the creation of a democratic international to stop the spread of international communism. The idea had merit, but this newspaper observed that, without benefit of new machinery, there was something that the free nations could do right away, and that was to unite their propaganda resources in behalf of the free way of life. There is now a specific occasion for uniting propaganda on the specific issue of the struggle upon which the free world is engaged.

Propaganda is a device in which the United States is deficient, and this is curious, for the United States has made an art of advertising and salesmanship and public relations. The deficiency is due to disinterest—expressed in a budget of only $34,000,000, a sum which, moreover, includes items that do not properly belong to an information budget. The amount is less than that spent by the British, let alone the Russians. Yet no country needs to spread the light about itself and its situation more than this country; for no country has been more defamed and maligned, and no country is more responsible for defending the peace. In India, for instance, the picture conjured up of America by all classes of society up to the top level of sophistication is a curious sort of Wall Street-Hollywood amalgam. Millions of people in out-of-the-way places, as the result of the long start of the Russians and the American neglect, speak the Muscovite patter about America, and thus the Russians may be in a better position than we realize of making their own barefaced aggression seem like innocent self-defense in the minds of the world's guileless.

AGENT OF THE UN

The only legal problem that has given United Nations officials any real concern in connection with the UN policy in Korea has been successfully worked out in the Security Council's resolution asking the United States to designate the commander of the anti-aggression forces. Some experts on the UN Charter had feared that it would be difficult to carry out military police action in Korea without activating the Military Staff Committee on which the Soviet Union is represented. The Charter provides that the Military Staff Committee shall be responsible under the Council "for the strategic direction of any armed forces placed at the disposal of the Security Council." But the Charter has proved to be flexible. Unity of command is being achieved without any reference to the Military Staff Committee.

It was obvious at the outbreak of the fighting that the Security Council could not itself put down the aggression of the North Koreans. No troops had been placed at its disposal, as contemplated by the Charter. But the Council could and did act under article 39 of chapter VII. This article directs the Council to determine the existence of any breach of the peace or act of aggression and to "make recommendations * * * to maintain or restore international peace and security." The Council took such steps in its resolutions of June 25 and 27. On Friday it took the additional step of "recommending" that all members responding to its call place their forces at the disposal of a unified command under direct control of the United States. In other words, the Council gave its blessing to the practical measures already taken by the nations cooperating in this joint undertaking.

Use of the United Nations flag, along with the national flags of the nations resisting this aggression, was also authorized. The United Nations is as much committed as if forces directly under its command had gone into action. We think the Council is to be highly commended both for shouldering the responsibility laid upon it by the Charter and for working out a practical means of making its will effective. No doubt the logic of events drove it to the conclusion that the anti-aggression forces in Korea should be placed directly under American command. But the initiative came from the British and French rather than the American delegates. And since 45 of the 59 members of the United Nations have approved the use of armed forces in Korea since the United States took the lead in supplying men and equipment, it may be assumed that the arrangement meets with general satisfaction.

The most heartening fact about the Korean episode thus far is the courageous and forthright manner in which the Security Council has responded to the challenge of armed aggression. The dramatic manner in which it has emerged from its moribund state has been tonic to the entire free world. In our enthusiasm for what the Council is now doing, however, it is well to remember that it was able to act in this emergency only because of the Russian boycott of the UN in violation of article 28. The Soviet's incredible blunder in absenting itself from the Council has resulted in a demonstration of unity against aggression that scarcely seemed possible a few weeks ago. The disturbing thought is that the Council's spurt of activity could be squelched overnight by the return of a Soviet delegate to the Council. Of course, Russia could not stall the forces that have been put into motion. But her veto could prevent the Council from taking any further action to counteract the present or future acts of aggression. That possibility must be giving the jubilant statesmen at Lake Success more worry than is apparent in any of their current statements.

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 8, 1950]

UNDER ONE FLAG FOR ONE PURPOSE

By a 7 to 0 decision—with India, Egypt, and Yugoslavia abstaining—the Security Council of the United Nations now has taken another historic step to emphasize that the effort to repel the Red invasion of Southern Korea in an effort being made not by our country alone but by the UN as a whole.

As far as specific action is concerned, the Council's new resolution paves the way, first of all, for a unified command of the military forces which numerous members have provided to help the Council carry out its decisions of June 25 and 27—decisions aimed at forcing the Northern Korean invaders to withdraw to the thirty-eighth parallel. The command is to be under the United States—the chief power involved—and the top commander is to be an American, General MacArthur.

In addition to this move—which is essential to the efficient use of the multinational forces available—the Council has decreed that the new unified command may at its discretion fly the flag of the United Nations, concurrently with the flags of the various participating powers, during military operations in Korea. Nothing could better symbolize or dramatize the fact that those operations—legally, morally and militarily—are not a one-country enterprise but the enterprise of the overwhelming majority of the UN.

Never before in history has there been anything quite like this—never such a unified command over a great company of nations fighting together under one flag for the sole purpose of putting an end to criminal aggression. Here is the nearest approach the world has yet made to a concrete, flesh-and-blood realization of the international police force called for by the UN charter. Though it can accomplish no overnight miracles, the development is potentially a thing of first importance. Certainly, in an immediate sense, it can do much to counter the Kremlin's propaganda effort to blame the Korean war on American "imperialists."

In effect, moreover, this latest of the Security Council's history-making actions serves as a stern rebuff to the Soviet Union's continuing attempt—made once again in the note protesting against our naval blockade of Korea—to depict the Council as a kind of outlaw violating the Charter and operating as the tool of "imperialistic" America. With more than two-thirds of the UN against it, the Kremlin must fully realize that this particular phase of its propaganda is a complete dud in the free world.

All of which suggests that the Russians, now that they have virtually branded the United Nations as a criminal, may formally withdraw from it. Whether they do or not, however, its course is set and determined in Korea: Flying its own flag, it proposes, regardless of grave risks, to do everything possible to beat back the aggressor. The Council has made that much very clear.

WE NEED ALL OF POINT 4

President Truman's point 4 program for providing technical aid to underdeveloped countries ought to appeal to anybody with an economical drop of blood in his veins. In contrast with the billions spent or to be spent for Marshall-plan aid or the military-aid program, point 4 needed only millions. Mr. Truman had asked for $45,000,000 for the 1951 fiscal year, or about 30 cents per capita for the United States population. Subsequently, in bills pending in both Houses of Congress, the 30 cents was whittled down to about 23 cents. Yesterday it was reported that the Senate Appropriations Committee had cut the figure at least tentatively to as low as 7 cents per capita. Is 7 cents as much as each of us would like to spend on this really very magnificent enterprise?

Point 4 contemplates technical aid to United Nations and other agencies, national and international, in the fields of health, agriculture, education and industry. In his address at the American Newspaper Guild convention on June 29 Mr. Truman gave some instances of what technical aid could do. It could clear the malarial mosquito out of a rich farming area in northern India which otherwise was being abandoned. It could bring pure water to an area in Iran. It could stimulate the production of lumber, rice, palm oil, and cocoa in Liberia. It could be supplemented by investments made through the World Bank, the Export-Import Bank and private agencies. The whole program is extremely elastic in that it might mobilize all sorts of public and private agencies at relatively little expense to the public agencies.

The point 4 program will not win a war or a police action in Korea. It might, however, over a period of years, alleviate the conditions that aid the Communists to penetrate the Far East and other relatively undeveloped regions. It might demonstrate against the flood of Communist propaganda that mid-century capitalism is energetic, intelligent and humane. We hope that the Senate Appropriations Committee and its opposite numbers in the House will realize these facts in time and will not commit the egregious error of trying to remake the world with a handful of pennies.

[From the Washington Post of July 9, 1950]

FUTILITY ON POINT 4

It is hard to imagine a worse time for the kind of narrow-mindedness shown by the Senate Appropriations Committee in its decision announced yesterday to cut point 4 funds in half. If the cut should be sustained by the Senate, it would mean that the United States could conduct practically no independent program of technical assistance over large areas of the world at the very time that the Russians are doing their utmost to exploit discontent. It would be tantamount to telling India, for example, that in return for her support on Korea we would eliminate the technical aid on which she has been counting heavily.

Of the President's original request for $45,000,000 for 1951, the Senate authorized thirty-five million. The Appropriations Committee, however, slashed this to seventeen and six-tenths million, including seven and six-tenths million for existing programs under the Institute of Inter-American Affairs and the Smith-Mundt Act. This leaves ten million. Yet the United States already is committed to furnish $12,500,000 to the United Nations technical assistance program for the period ending December 31, 1951. Even if ECA appropriations might be squeezed to provide technical help for colonial Africa and southeast Asia under the general area of China authorization, there would be no such funds for India, Pakistan and the Middle East. Yet it is precisely in those areas where this most enlightened form of help, the stimulation for self-help, is most vitally needed.

The administration must bear some responsibility for the bungling manner in which the whole point 4 program has been handled since its inception 18 months ago. But point 4 is more than an administration proposal; it is an American answer to a desperate need. Yet the Appropriations Committee seemed to retain a preconceived hostility toward the program, except for the protests of one or two members. Assistant Secretary of State Thorp, for example, was browbeaten almost from the moment he set foot in the committee room, and was never allowed to complete his prepared statement.

One would think that the parallel with our world information program, which most legislators now recognize to be inadequate, would be strikingly clear. It costs a lot more to fight communism after the fact than to prevent it from taking hold in the first place. In justice to this country's interest in the world struggle, the Senate should take a sounder view of what is meant by real economy than its short-sighted committee has done. As Senator LODGE said in commenting on the information program, it is American deeds that count. "Isn't it true," he asked, "that a doctor going into a fever-ridden area is our best story?"

[From the Christian Science Monitor of July 7, 1950]

MAKING IT POINTLESS

We hope it is only a rumor. It is one of those things that certainly ought not to be so.

But there is a report that the Senate Appropriations Committee has voted to reduce the initial appropriation for the point 4 program from the $35,000,000 Congress authorized to a miserly $10,000,000.

This, for a world-wide program of technical assistance to economically backward countries, would make point 4 practically pointless.

To scuttle one of the few affirmative contributions America can make toward a betterment of world living standards would be the height of crass stupidity and political pettifogging.

The United States is spending nearly $14,500,000,000 a year on its own military budget, plus additional costs for the fighting in Korea and a possible 70-group air force.

It authorized last year more than $1,000,000,000 of arms aid to western Europe. It spent $345,000,000 to help win a civil war in Greece, and since has furnished $375,000,000 worth of arms to that country and Turkey.

How much is the United States willing to spend to help improve the opportunities of world neighbors whose economic level is pathetically and irritatingly lower than its own?

Is it true, as its enemies say, that all America cares about is armed might and exploitation?

No, it is not; and $35,000,000 under present circumstances is small earnest to give of a deeper and more benevolent interest.

The $35,000,000 which both houses of Congress have authorized for this purpose is less than the cost tag on 4 hours of World War II.

That is a small enough effort toward kindling hope in the world.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the recent developments in Korea have again demonstrated the importance of this great body, the United Nations. We did not hesitate to promptly reply to the resolution of the Security Council. We did not hesitate to offer all possible assistance to restore peace and order in Korea. We did not bicker and quibble over a few dollars when the Security Council asked for assistance to enforce its resolution. We answered the call.

Mr. President, I did not see any resolution come from the Appropriations Committee which said, "Now take it easy. Do not spend too much on gasoline. Let us not be spending too much now for airplanes or for munitions." Not on your life. Every person, as he should, every Senator, every member of the Government, rallied as one to see to it that every available bit of equipment and material was there to do the job.

The United Nations has asked for assistance in another effort—a fight against poverty, misery, unemployment, disease, and malnutrition. The members of the United Nations believe that this war against communism is a twofold thing, not just one. They not only have adopted a resolution to restore the peace in Korea which we quickly supported as we should have. The United Nations also has taken another action. The United Nations has asked for assistance to combat poverty, misery, unemployment, disease, and malnutrition. It seems to me that both these statements of policy are of great importance. We have committed ourselves to aid that noble struggle. I cannot believe that we will hesitate to fulfill our obligations in the field. I cannot believe that we will fail to give support that is expected of us in this other area of our struggle against the forces of evil.

A further consideration is that a virtual repudiation of the point 4 program at a time when the United States is taking military action in Korea and Congress is voting the full amount requested for military assistance would encourage the belief—already strong in many parts of the world—that we choose to emphasize military force in preference to constructive and humanitarian measures.

As for the harmful psychological effects throughout the world if the committee's recommendation is allowed to stand, here is what an American Ambassador, in Washington for consultation—this Ambassador returned from one of the underdeveloped areas—said:

I am embarrassed to return to my post next week. I dread facing the president of that country after this reported vote in the Senate committee. We have not made any commitments under the point 4 program, but that program has become a world-wide symbol. It is regarded as an American proposal that everyone roll up his sleeves and work on the problems of hunger and sickness. Now the reported action of the Senate committee seems to say we really did not mean it. No action by the United States could be better calculated to injure our prestige abroad.

By merely proposing point 4, before it goes into effect, this Government has forged an anti-Communist weapon of the utmost importance. It has brought hope to millions of human beings formerly without hope—and hope is a force more powerful than guns, more precious than gold. We have created hope that lifts up the hearts of these people and encourages them to hold up their heads.

We have had plenty of illustrations in history of men and women who had hope, who had a sense of dignity and self-respect, who were valiant soldiers even without adequate weapons. We have in recent months had plenty of illustration of the will to fight, the will to resist, just as we had in World War II when the Britsh stood alone in the Battle of Britain, without the great air fleets and air armadas, without the great weapons of modern war. But they resisted because they had something to fight for and to die for. People need hope—they need to feel that life is worth great sacrifices.

If this hope is now disappointed, we will not only have destroyed the great potential good of point 4 in the future; we will have destroyed much good will and replaced it with resentment toward us and resignation to the encroachment of communism. We will have shamefully bungled one of the best chances we have of promoting peace, freedom, and democracy.

I protest with all the vigor at my command, Mr. President, at this shortsighted attempt to wreck this constructive program which means so much toward winning the peoples of the world to the cause of freedom and democracy.

I say right now that I would feel very derelict to my responsibility and duty if on the one hand I, as a member of this great body, having voted for selective service, having voted for military preparation, were to turn my head and not be willing even to try to take a forward step in eradicating those conditions of confusion and chaos and discontent that make it necessary for boys 19 and 20 years of age, to be sent thousands of miles away from home in battle. I urge the Senate to approve the full $35,000,000 authorized for point 4, which is the very minimum required to achieve substantial results.

I want to commend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] for his amendment which would raise the amount to $20,000,000. But let no one try to tell me that we cannot spend $35,000,000 in the cause of food, shelter, better lands, and health and education in this world.

Korea is a solemn warning that we need to win the masses of the people to our side. With this warning clearly before us, this attempt to butcher the point 4 program in the name of economy is a self-defeating luxury which this Nation and the free world simply cannot afford.

We are fighting the Communists in Korea with our right arm—our military arm. I submit this is certainly no time to cut our left arm off at the elbow—the point 4 arm for fighting Communists in other parts of the world.

Mr. President, let us move ahead with the point 4 program as we have with ECA, as we have with military assistance. Let us have the same unanimity of effort. If there ever was a measure that will affect the thinking of men in the world it is the amendment of the point 4 program. Everyone is going to watch what we do with respect to it. Let us act with boldness. Imagine what it would look like not only to the world but to all soul-searching decent Americans, if we were to reject one of the most humanitarian, effective, constructive approaches toward eradicating the cause of discontent and communism, namely, the point 4 program.

I appeal to my colleagues to join with me in a full measure of support for the full appropriation for the point 4 program

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 3876) to provide free postage for members of the Armed Forces of the United States in specified areas.

AMERICAN CASUALTIES IN KOREA—RAY RICHARDS AND ERNIE PEELER

Mr. DONNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Casualty lists are now coming in from Korea. I note with sorrow that my good friend, Ray Richards, is listed among those who have given their lives in Korea.

Ray Richards, a newspaperman who served here in Washington, was not only an indefatigable gatherer of news but an expert on the Far East, and enlightenment could be obtained by talking with him on that subject.

He was born 56 years ago in Minot, N. Dak. He went to the Oklahoma A. & M. College, and then became a newspaperman, serving in many capacities. As I knew him in Washington, he was with the Hearst newspapers or with the International News Service.

I realize, as I know the Senate realizes, the great value of those who go forth to bring us the news—I refer not only to the newspaper reporters but also to the photographers—so that we may have first-hand knowledge about conditions on the battlefield. These men go on the battlefield, not with guns or other weapons in their hands, but with pencils or cameras, so that they may inform their country, and, in fact, the entire world, about what occurs there. It was in that service that my good friend, Ray Richards, gave his life.

Mr. President, I also find that Corp. Ernie Peeler is listed in the same newspaper item as having lost his life. He was one of the editors of the Tokyo Stars and Stripes, a United States service newspaper.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the Associated Press dispatch from Tokyo in regard to the death of these two men.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO UNITED STATES CORRESPONDENTS KILLED AT FRONT-LINE POST IN KOREA—RAY RICHARDS, FORMER HEARST BUREAU CHIEF HERE, REPORTED SLAIN

TOKYO, July 11.—Two American correspondents were killed on the Korean war front yesterday.

A regimental adjutant reported their deaths to field headquarters.

Presumably they were Ray Richards, correspondent for the Hearst newspapers, and Corp. Ernie Peeler of the Tokyo Stars and Stripes.

International News Service here was informed that the report came from a regimental adjutant identified as Captain Downey.

(Mr. Richards, 56, was chief of the Hearst Newspapers Bureau in Washington from 1944 to 1948, when he went to Greece to do a special series on guerrilla warfare there. He came to Washington in 1942 and made his home at the Wardman Park Hotel.

(In September of 1949 he returned to Washington briefly, then went to Korea as an adviser to Dr. Syngman Rhee, President of South Korea. He joined the staff of International News Service at the outbreak of the Korean war.

(The INS bureau in Washington said his daughter, Dejon Richards, a student at Duke University, is en route to San Francisco now and had planned to join her father in Tokyo for a month's visit.)

The Army reported the bodies were not recovered because fighting still raged around the outpost where the newsmen were killed.

Mr. Richards and Corporal Peeler had been reported missing since Sunday night, when they went forward to observe results of the first American around-the-clock bombings.

Corporal Peeler was a newspaperman in San Bernardino, Calif., before entering Army service.

Mr. Richards had been covering wars off and on since he served, as he termed it, as a photographer's assistant in the Francisco Villa campaign on the Mexican border. He was then with a Denver newspaper, which he told fellow newsmen was the old Republican.

He worked subsequently on the west coast and in Hawaii, Tokyo, Manila, and Shanghai.

After World War II he reported hostilities in Manchuria and Greece. He returned to Tokyo some months ago and was among the first correspondents to reach South Korea after the fighting started.

Meager reports said he and Corporal Peeler were at a front-line outpost when Communist forces overran it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, these two newspapermen died in the service of their country, as men from all the States are now dying in the service of our country. We hope and we pray that these men and all the men who will die in this conflict will not die in vain, but that from them and from the taking of their lives there will arise liberty for more people in the world.

STRIKES ON RAILROADS

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, as bearing on the importance of the enactment into law of Senate bill 3463, which, if enacted, would make unlawful any strike or any lock-out by a carrier arising out of or in connection with any dispute falling within the purview of the Railway Labor Act, it is my desire to submit certain facts and views.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday there appears a copy of an article appearing in the Washington Post of yesterday. The article is entitled "Wage Dispute Still Unsettled; Army Running Rock Island Railroad as Strike Ends by Court Order."

Earlier we had learned of the fact that as to the other four railroads involved in the strike—in all, five western and midwestern railroads—there had been a termination of the strike, arising out of the announcement by the President which was given attention by the strikers.

As to the Rock Island Railroad, it will be recalled that there was a refusal on the part of the labor union to halt the strike, and that it was only by virtue of a temporary order issued by a Federal court one night recently that the strike against the Rock Island Railroad was halted.

Mr. President, as the matter now stands, therefore, these five railroads are, I assume, to a greater or lesser extent—possibly almost entirely, I trust—again in operation.

There is an interesting attribute of human nature which seems to be inherent in Senators as well as in other persons, namely, that upon the passage of a crisis there is a tendency to cease efforts to remedy the conditions out of which the crisis grew. That situation is well expressed by a writer in the Detroit News of July 4, in an editorial in which the following is stated:

Whenever transport strikes occur, Congress talks about finding a way of keeping the men on the job; but the minute they are settled it relapses into apathy.

Mr. President, I hope it is not true in this instance that Congress is lapsing into apathy because of the halting of this particular strike. We have had too many illustrations within recent years—yes, even within recent months—of the fact that railroad strikes at times strike at the very national welfare and almost the national existence, if you please. We have had too many such illustrations to justify any lapsing into apathy on our part because of the fact that this particular strike no longer is in progress.

Mr. President, in a moment I shall call attention to the fact, as set forth in the article appearing yesterday in the Washington Post, that the wage dispute still is unsettled as to the Rock Island Railroad. I shall have a few words to say as to the present situation in that regard.

A moment ago I referred to an article appearing in the Detroit News, and I read an apt sentence appearing in that article. Let me read two other sentences, preceding the one I read, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate:

The commentator therefore asserts what he has so often said before—that some way must be found to prevent transport strikes. They are already guarded against by law; but once the legal barriers have been cleared, strikes occur, and may grow, as this one—

He was referring to the switchmen's strike—threatens to do, into a national calamity if other unions take similar action.

What is the situation confronting the American people at the moment upon the immediate horizon in the railroad industry? Although this particular strike has been halted, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact, as set forth in an article in today's Chicago Sun-Times, that—

Meanwhile, the Rock Island, strike-bound for 14 days, was back to normal operation Monday under Army supervision.

Then there is a subhead, followed by further text, reading as follows:

SEEK COURT TEST

Spokesmen for the switchmen said no attempt will be made to negotiate with the road until it has been determined whether the Federal court's no-strike injunction issued Saturday is legal.

In this connection I call attention again to the headline of the article in the Washington Post, to which I referred a moment ago, namely:

Wage Dispute Still Unsettled.

I return now to the article appearing in today's Chicago Sun-Times:

A hearing has been set for July 17 in Buffalo, N. Y., headquarters of the union.

Union officials said if the court finds the injunction invalid, the strike will be resumed. If not, the union said it will seek the "best settlement" possible without a strike.

I am not criticizing the union for following through on the court action; but the point I make is that the condition under which the strike has been halted does not mean that there has been a settlement of the controversy in regard to the Rock Island Railroad system, the great 8,000-mile railroad system which, incidentally, traverses the State in which resides the distinguished present occupant of the chair [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and of which he was governor. We do not know whether it will be settled. If the court's action was valid, it would appear that it has been subject only to future negotiations for the best settlement possible without a strike. If the court's action should be proved to have been invalid, then, according to this article in the Chicago Sun-Times, the strike will be resumed.

But, Mr. President, that is not the most ominous cloud in the present railroad sky. This same article from the Chicago Sun-Times is headed—and it is today's newspaper—"Weigh new rail strike of 250,000." I wish to read a portion of this article:

Leaders of the conductors and trainmen's unions met here—

That is, in Chicago—

Monday to discuss whether to pull their 250,000 men out this weekend on a strike against 100 railroads.

A joint committee of 250 general chairmen of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and the Order of Railway Conductors gathered at the Congress Hotel to debate their next move.

A spokesman for the conductors said the court order sending A. F. of L. switchmen back to work on the Rock Island Railroad and Federal seizure of the road has not made any difference in our thinking.

W. E. B. Chase, vice president of the trainmen, said no decision would be reached until after another joint session Tuesday.

The two A. F. of L. unions technically are free to go on strike Saturday when the cooling-off period under the Railway Labor Act ends.

So, this is a possibility which may ripen into an actual strike within the next few days. Today is July 11, and they are free to strike, so this article tells us, on Saturday of this week.

The Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., published yesterday, likewise comments on this situation in an Associated Press article. I do not mean this is an editorial; it is a news article by the Associated Press, set forth in the Evening Star of yesterday. It is from Chicago, and it is headed "New rail strike threat rises as court forces switchmen to return." The article reads:

CHICAGO, July 10.—With one major rail walkout ended, the Nation faced possibility of another today.

A strike by AFL switchmen which had stopped service on four roads and hampered a fifth was halted in two stages by Government pressure.

Last Thursday the union canceled its walkout against four of the roads after President Truman said the strike was stopping the flow of grains and cattle, and threatened national defense. The strike remained in effect against the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad because, the union said, parallel rail services were available.

A Federal court late Saturday night sent the last 1,500 striking switchmen back to work on the Rock Island.

Today, three other rail unions met in Chicago to decide whether their 250,000 members will strike to back up their demands for a shorter work week and higher pay. They are the trainmen, conductors and yardmasters.

A cooling off period under the Railway Labor Act ends Saturday leaving these unions—

I call attention to this statement contained in the article—

free to strike at any time after that. A spokesman for the Order of Railway Conductors said the court order to the switchmen and Government seizure of the Rock Island lines Saturday "have not made any difference in our thinking."

The three brotherhoods which are considering this question in Chicago are the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Railroad Yardmasters of America.

Mr. President, the ticker, with which the Senate is provided, today contains this interesting and important recital from Chicago:

Union officials representing 250,000 railroad conductors, trainmen and yardmasters—

That is a quarter of a million persons—today formulated strategy in their drive to win reduced working hours without a cut in pay.

General chairmen of the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and the Railroad Yardmasters Union resumed talks on whether to call members out when they become legally free to strike Saturday.

Now, Mr. President, I call especial attention to this item, from the ticker tape:

A walk-out would shut down operations on most of the Nation's railroads, rail officials agreed, and probably would invoke Government intervention like that which halted the strike of A. F. of L. switchmen against five western railroads last week.

Union officials said the threat of Federal action would not change our thinking. But they admitted that they would have to discuss at length the possibility that the Government would not tolerate a rail tie-up during the current Korean fighting.

A union source said the current conferences might continue several days.

In today's Washington Post there also appears an article from Chicago. I shall not read it, but I should like to have unanimous consent to have it incorporated in my remarks at this point. It is entitled "Three Unions Consider New Rail Strike." It is an Associated Press dispatch from Chicago.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THREE UNIONS CONSIDER NEW RAIL STRIKE

CHICAGO, July 10.—Leaders of three unions today weighed whether they will apply the year's third strike against the Nation's railroads.

Action by President Truman last week end cut short a 14-day strike of A. F. of L. switchmen on five railroads.

The switchmen's union abandoned its walk-out on four railroads voluntarily at the Government's urging Thursday. But, when the union said its strike would continue against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, the President ordered the Army to run the railroad.

The Army moved into the Rock Island's Chicago offices Saturday, and within a few hours a temporary injunction ending the strike was obtained by the Justice Department.

The three unions trying to decide whether they will strike are the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and the Railroad Yardmasters of America.

Today general railroad chairmen of the conductors' and trainmen's union met jointly, then went into separate session. A spokesman said they probably will meet jointly again before announcing their decision.

The three unions are free to strike under the Railway Labor Act after Saturday, July 15, having completed a 30-day cooling-off period following a report of a Presidential fact-finding board.

Mr. DONNELL. In the Evening Star of Washington, yesterday, appeared an editorial entitled "Not the Army's Work," and it reads:

NOT THE ARMY'S WORK

It is a shame and a disgrace, at a time like this, that the Army has to divert any part of its energies to running a railroad.

Presumably the Army's role in the Rock Island strike will be negligible, since the switchmen, confronted with a Federal court injunction, have been ordered back to work. But the fact remains that the President, in order to restore service on the Rock Island, had to direct the Army to take over the railroad, and the switchmen, even then, refused to cooperate. They would not budge until contempt-of-court penalties were looking them in the face.

The union president, Arthur J. Glover, took the position that his men would not work for the Army unless and until the Government "seizes the profits of that railroad as well as the labor of free men."

That is a typical bit of demagoguery. The simple fact of the matter is that a Presidential fact-finding board, appointed under the Railway Labor Act, had recommended a settlement which the railroad had agreed to accept. It was the union which refused the recommendation and went out on strike.

It is true that the present law permits strikes on the railroads.

Yes, Mr. President, that is true; and that is the defect in the Railway Labor Act which the bill which I advocate most earnestly would cure.

I continue reading from the editorial:

And it may be that under existing law, when a strike is called, the President has no alternative except to bring the Army into the picture. But it is not the Army's job to run railroads.

Let me read with emphasis the concluding sentence of that editorial:

The proper remedy—

Let me read that again—

The proper remedy is to revise the law to forbid strikes which tie up all or any significant part of the Nation's vital transportation system.

Mr. President, the New York Times of July 11, which has expressed itself as being opposed to compulsory arbitration, contains an editorial entitled "End of a Railway Strike." I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be set forth in full at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

END OF A RAILWAY STRIKE

Citing the threat of direct Government action, Arthur J. Glover, president of the striking switchmen's union, ended the walk-out on four large western railroads last Thursday, but announced that switchmen on the fifth road, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, would not return to their jobs. The union meant to find out, he said, whether it could not strike against one road, even if it was not to be permitted to strike against five roads simultaneously. This experiment, however, did not get very far. On Saturday, acting on orders from the President, the Army seized the Rock Island, backing up its action with a temporary injunction. In the face of this show of power the union's president conceded defeat.

This unfortunate episode, it might be said, ended on a note of poetic justice. The president of the switchmen's union had elected to stress the issue of peace and war. With the Korean situation in mind, he made much of the fact that there had been no declaration of war, and he quoted Mr. Truman's own statement to the press that "we are not at war." The question of whether the Nation was at war had, of course, no bearing on the principal issue involved, the issue of the rights—in peace or war—of the general public. There is a gentle irony in the fact, therefore, that Mr. Glover was tripped, in the end, by his own legalistic line of reasoning. He was correct when he said we were not technically at war in Korea. What he overlooked was that we are still legally at war with Germany and Japan, and that there is a statute, passed during another war, in 1916, empowering the President to seize the railroads in wartime if necessary.

While this solution of the railroad strike has a certain appropriateness in view of the position taken by the switchmen's leader, the fact is that there is little else to be said for it. Railroad labor resents this technique, which it refers to as token seizure of the railroads. And we think that their resentment is instinctively sound. The switchmen invoked the argument on behalf of this strike that the country was at peace. The Government replied, quite rightly, that this had nothing to do with the right or wrong of the union's high-handed action. Then it promptly turned around and employed, to end the strike, a legal instrument devised purely for use in a wartime emergency. This is not to suggest that the President's action involved the conscious use of deception or misrepresentation. In ordering the seizure of the Rock Island he was entirely consistent. He was taking the road over, he said, "because Government seizure is imperative for the protection of our citizens." And he referred specifically to "the public health" and "the public welfare generally."

In short, Mr. Truman employed the emergency statute of 1916 because it was the only weapon available for the purpose. We think the time is long overdue for remedying this situation. Congress, in the Taft-Hartley Act, expressed the will of the people in laying down the principle that a strike which endangers the health and safety of the people is intolerable, whether the country is at war or peace. In the interest of common honesty that principle should be written clearly into the legislation dealing with labor disputes on the railroads.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I invite attention to this significant observation in the editorial, notwithstanding the position which the newspaper has taken with respect to compulsory arbitration:

Congress in the Taft-Hartley Act expressed the will of the people in laying down the principle that a strike which endangers the health and safety of the people is intolerable, whether the country is at war or peace.

Let me read this with the utmost emphasis:

In the interest of common honesty that principle should be written clearly into the legislation dealing with labor disputes on the railroads.

Mr. President, Senate bill 3463 writes into legislation, if the bill shall be passed, a provision that no strike, and no lockout by a carrier, which arises out of or in connection with a dispute under the Railway Labor Act, shall be lawful. Stating it conversely, every such strike and every such lockout shall be unlawful.

The bill provides that which was found necessary in order to secure return of the men to work in the Rock Island case. It provides the remedy of injunction or whatever order the court may deem it proper to make in order to carry into effect the provisions of the law.

Mr. President, I have dwelt upon the fact that, in the first place, there is a tendency of human nature, and of Members of the Senate as members of the human family, as soon as an urgent situation has been alleviated, to fall into a condition of apathy. I have pointed out that this is no time for apathy, with the situations to which I have referred presently before us. But, Mr. President, I lay down a further proposition, far more important than the one I have just stated, and that further proposition is that even if there were no strike in sight, this bill should, nevertheless, be enacted.

The history of the railway situation as written in our memories in the past few years is too vivid to justify us, even if no strike were presently in prospect, in refusing to pass this type of bill when the need for it is pointed out. In World War II, in 1943, President Roosevelt seized the railroads to prevent a strike over wages, and the Army kept possession until mid-January of 1944. The facts are disclosed in an article which I placed in the RECORD yesterday. I read from that article:

The Government kept the Toledo, Peoria & Western in its possession for more than 3 years to block a strike.

1946: Seizure of the Nation's railroads on May 17, 1946, failed to prevent a 48-hour strike of engineers and trainmen May 23–25. President Truman broke the strike by giving the strikers an ultimatum to get back to work or the Army would operate the trains.

1948: Mr. Truman again seized the railroads on May 10, 1948, in a dispute over wages and working rules, involving the engineers, firemen, and switchmen. This time he succeeded in preventing the strike altogether by getting an injunction.

Yes, Mr. President, the writer of that article might well have said it was only by getting a court order that the President succeeded in preventing the strike, for Government seizure had occurred.

The President had warned the country of the fact that the interference with nationwide transportation would not only affect the Nation, but would have international repercussions, and yet the unions refused to call off the strike. It was only the operation of the court order that called it off.

Mr. President, I read the final sentence in yesterday's Washington Post article which appears at page 9798 of the RECORD:

The railroads were restored to their owners on July 9 of that year, after a settlement had been reached.

Someone may ask if the President can secure court orders or can seize the railroads by virtue of an act passed away back in 1916 or 1917, why should strikes be prohibited? Well, Mr. President, I think it is perfectly obvious that our Nation and our officials should not be remitted to the necessity of seizing and taking the railroads over into governmental operation. The Presiding Officer will recall that back in our old Latin days in school we read the orations of Cicero, one of which began as follows:

Quousque, tandem, Catilina?—How long, Oh, Cataline?

I ask today, how long are we to be compelled to undergo these dangers to our national economy and the possibility of injury to our Nation from the standpoint of international welfare? How long are we to be compelled to endure this condition? How long is the President going to be compelled to resort to efforts of seizure, and then, when seizure does not bring the desired result, have to go into court to secure the cessation of the strike?

Mr. President, I undertake to say that the sensible thing to do, as has been indicated in article after article which I have placed in the RECORD from newspapers and commentators in various sections of the country, is to forbid by law and to penalize strikes arising out of disputes within the purview of the Railway Labor Act, to impose penalties for the violation of that statute, which penalties are prescribed in Senate bill 3463, and to give the Federal courts the power to enforce the law. I feel that is the remedy which should be placed in effect. In a few moments I shall have a few more words to quote with respect to that view. I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Another Rail Strike," published in the St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette, of June 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER RAIL STRIKE

For the third time since the end of World War II our country is faced with a strike in important elements of its railroad transportation system. With 4,000 switchmen going off their jobs this week on 5 midwestern and western lines, operations on 4 of the lines have come to a complete halt. Although the East may not feel the effects of the walk-out for some time, the problem is one which affects the whole country.

As in the case of the strike of locomotive firemen last month, the switchmen's walkout involves only a segment of our railroad network. Perhaps the switchmen deliberately adopted this piecemeal approach to avoid the possibility of Government seizure. But whatever the reason for limiting the walk-out, the fact remains that the men are off the job, operations have ceased, and we are compelled to realize that the Railway Labor Act is not functioning as it was designed to do and indeed as it did work for many years.

In fairness to the public and its dependence on this basic part of our national transportation system, a growing number of citizens believe compulsory arbitration should be adopted in railroad disputes. The right to strike is a precious one, but is it justified when thousands, perhaps millions, of innocent persons are inconvenienced, when the health and business of entire communities may be endangered?

Congress could easily amend the Railway Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration. Both parties in a dispute would be bound by the recommendations of fact-finding boards, unless set aside by Federal courts.

This may not be the answer to present upheavals on the railroads, but at least it would protect the public interest. And that, after all, is the paramount issue.

Mr. DONNELL. I read a few portions of the editorial to emphasize them.

In fairness to the public—

Yes, Mr. President, let us remember the public. Let us not remember only the strikers, owners, employees, and railroads, but let us remember the public. The public has an interest here which is paramount and far superior to the interests of all others concerned.

In fairness to the public and its dependence on this basic part of our national transportation system, a growing number of citizens—

Let me repeat that—a growing number of citizens believe compulsory arbitration should be adopted in railroad disputes. The right to strike is a precious one, but is it justified when thousands, perhaps millions, of innocent persons are inconvenienced, when the health and business of entire communities may be endangered?

The editorial writer says:

Congress could easily amend the railway Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration. Both parties in a dispute would be bound by the recommendations of fact-finding boards, unless set aside by Federal courts.

The writer concludes:

This may not be the answer to present upheavals on the railroads, but at least it would protect the public interest. And that, after all, is the paramount issue.

Mr. President, if we have abandoned the old idea of settlement of disputes by combat between individuals, why should we have this euphemistically termed economic force, meaning strikes? Why should we have force of any kind used as the remedy to settle disputes which not merely affect the parties immediately connected with the dispute, that is, the employer and employee, but affect the people of the United States as an entirety, and may even endanger the very life of our Nation?

I submit that it is logical to say, as this writer says:

Congress could easily amend the Railway Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration. Both parties in a dispute would be bound by the recommendations of fact-finding boards, unless set aside by Federal courts.

Why should they not be bound? No one in our country has the innate right to operate a railroad. As the distinguished occupant of the chair, who headed, with distinction, the public utility commission in his own State, so well knows, the right to operate a railroad is a right which a railroad possesses solely by virtue of the fact that States grant to them the right of operation. Every person who invests his money in a railroad does so subject to the right of the State or the Nation to impose such regulations with respect to the operations of the railroad as may be reasonable. No person would be employed on a railroad if the State had not granted to the railroad the right to operate it. Every employee takes his right of employment subject to the rights which the public itself has with respect to them.

Mr. President, to say that we should not have a final finding by a competent authority, which should be binding upon both parties to these controversies, is to my mind to overlook the fundamental theory on which the public welfare rests and must be supported.

I have in my hand an editorial entitled "What Other Answer?" published in the Greenville (S. C.) News on July 2, 1950.

I digress to say that it should be observed by those who may read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from day to day beginning with the 21st day of April, when Senate bill 3463 was introduced in the Senate, that these editorials and articles have not come from any one section of our country. I have placed in the RECORD numerous articles from various parts of the country. They have come from the North, South, East, West, and the center of the country.

In fairness I may say that not everyone favors compulsory arbitration. I realize that I could find many editorials which favor the opposite view, which editorials could be placed in the RECORD; but, as has been indicated by one of these editorial writers, there is a growing feeling, realization, and recognition of the fact that this problem is of such great moment to our Nation that it must be solved, and that the only practicable means which has been suggested for a solution of the problem is the plan of compulsory arbitration, which in substance is the plan contained in this bill.

Mr. President, this editorial is from a newspaper in South Carolina, which is far removed from the locality of these midwestern and western railroads. It is dated July 2, 1950, and is entitled "What Other Answer?" I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be incorporated at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT OTHER ANSWER?

Railroad transportation in a large area of the country is again to a considerable degree paralyzed by a strike against five western and midwestern railroads.

At last reports only one of these roads, the Great Northern, was attempting to operate trains. The strike was called by the switchmen's union and the struck railroads have laid off some 40,000 employees.

Meanwhile Congress seems still unable to develop an effective plan of protecting the public from the serious effects of widespread interruption of railroad transportation service.

Congressional committees are still discussing the Donnell bill, which would outlaw railroad strikes by requiring compulsory arbitration of railroad disputes.

But it seems rather clear that there are only two methods of attempting to maintain railroad service when labor disputes threaten suspension. One is Government seizure and the other is an outright legal requirement for compulsory arbitration as a basic condition of labor railroad employment and relations.

And majority sentiment in this country does not favor Government ownership and operation of railroads, either as a permanent policy or as a temporary step unless a grave emergency is created which cannot be met in any other way.

That leaves compulsory arbitration as the only apparent method of revising our Railway Labor Act to give the public assurance of uninterrupted service.

The case for this policy has undoubtedly been strengthened by the railroad strikes of this year, for they have given evidence of the failure of the Railway Labor Act to fulfill the expectation held when it was adopted that it would prevent any railroad strike.

Spokesmen for the railroads are now pointing out to the committee that railroad seizure is not the answer to settlement of pending railroad disputes. And they have a logical foundation for their view that compulsory arbitration is "the only answer we can see short of giving the unions everything they want."

The railroad spokesmen say they have come around to support of compulsory arbitration with a great deal of reluctance, and perhaps there are many others who are also reluctant to see the positive abrogation in this instance of what labor calls its right to strike.

But what other answer is there if the public is to be protected in its right to uninterrupted service of such vitally essential public utilities?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I read only 2 sentences, or possibly 3 sentences. Perhaps I shall read a little more of the editorial. The editorial refers to the switchmen's strike, to which the writer of the editorial refers in this language:

Railroad transportation in a large area of the country is again to a considerable degree paralyzed by a strike against five western and mid-western railroads.

The writer says:

Yes, Mr. President, it does appear to be the only method. I may say that even then it might be necessary in some cases to invoke Government seizure later on, but certainly so long as our people are law abiding, so long as courts can function, and so long as railroad men will obey injunctions, as they obeyed the one in the switchmen's strike, to my mind this bill should be enacted. I believe it would provide the desired result.

The writer says:

Yes, Mr. President; they have shown a great deal of reluctance. I think the fact that there has been a great deal of reluctance is in itself a strong argument in favor of the plan. It was not a plan into which they rushed hastily. These men have considered the matter before they testified on the bill. They considered the merits and the demerits. They are not advocating arbitration in all industries, nor am I. The men who testified in favor of the bill—the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the president of the New York Central Railroad, the president of the Santa Fe, the vice president, I believe it was, of the Southern Railway System, Mr. Neff, the general manager of the Missouri Pacific, and Mr. Loomis—testified in favor of this plan with reluctance, but with a realization that it is the only method which has been suggested by which this problem can be solved. The writer of this editorial continues:

And perhaps there are many others who are also reluctant to see the positive abrogation in this instance of what labor calls its right to strike.

But what other answer is there, if the public is to be protected in its right to uninterrupted service of such vitally essential public utilities?

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a clipping from the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle, a newspaper published in the State from which our present presiding officer comes. It is an editorial entitled "Scorn the Government," and was published in the Wichita Eagle on June 28, I think it is. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCORN THE GOVERNMENT

Strike of switchmen which has tied up five major lines is the latest disturbance in the railway industry, following closely the recently settled firemen's walk-out which seriously halted the Nation's transportation system. In the making is a strike by members of the Trainmen's and Conductors' Brotherhoods, scheduled for July 15 unless settled in the meantime.

Failure of the Railway Labor Act to halt the strikes is a significant development. This has long been held up as a model law, under the provisions of which there could be no strikes. The law provides that in the case of disagreement between labor and management the President would appoint a fact-finding board, whose recommendations would furnish the basis for settlement. In no case has the union been willing to accept the report of the fact finders. The switchmen even refused to submit their case to the board.

Legislation outlawing strikes and providing for compulsory arbitration of railway disputes was believed to be a national safeguard in time of war. The need is equally great in times of peace. Regulatory agencies sponsored by the Government have lost their effectiveness because too few continue to have faith in a Government which has become the greatest meddler of all time.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I read only one or two sentences from the editorial in order to emphasize them.

Legislation outlawing strikes and providing for compulsory arbitration of railway disputes was believed to be a national safeguard in time of war. The need is equally great in time of peace.

Mr. President, I have also an editorial from the Des Moines Tribune of July 7, 1950. The headline is There Must Be a Better Way, and under that there are in parentheses the words "Indianola Record-Herald," which I assume indicates that the editorial appeared first in another newspaper. It reads:

If labor leaders are interested in the good of working people, they will find some way to settle grievances other than strikes in industries of continuous necessity, such as railroads, food deliveries, light and power plants, etc.

I digress to say that my bill goes no further than those industries which come under the Railway Labor Act. I am not advocating an extension of it further.

Civilized people long ago stopped settling their differences by duels and feuds. Labor leaders are merely 200 years behind the times.

Is there any more reason why conflicting interests in a labor dispute should not be presented to a jury or court than for the collection of a note, personal damage, disagreements in interpretation of contracts, or any one of the other things which men have long since ceased fist fighting, stabbing, and shooting about?

Of course, nobody contends that a man should be compelled in peacetime to work against his will. But there still lingers in the effete heads of labor tycoons that it is all right to prevent him from working when he wills to work. It is hard for a man on the sidelines to understand where one differs from the other.

Thousands of men are out of work and hundreds of communities are suffering because of the grievance of a few switchmen. We don't pretend to say which side in the dispute is in the right, or whether either of them is.

We do say without hesitation that a better way can and should be found to settle the dispute other than a strike.

Mr. President, this afternoon I close this recital of facts as I presently see them with renewed emphasis upon the proposition that the history of railways in recent years has demonstrated the necessity of some method being adopted to prevent recurring strikes.

In the second place, the only practical means I have been able to find, and the only one which seems to have been suggested to prevent strikes, is to make strikes unlawful, and to provide in the statute such penalty and such power of enforcement as will give the courts power to enforce the statute.

Bearing in mind the fact that the railway and the airplane, the latter being a carrier, for it is also embraced under the Railway Labor Act, are vital to the Nation, that in degree they are far more vital to great expanses of our country than any other utility which may be mentioned, though the others may be vital in their particular localities, it seems without a possibility of doubt that some type of legislation should be and must be passed to prevent such strikes, if the national safety is to be preserved, and to make it possible for the public to pursue its way free from interruptions of the national welfare and possibly the national safety.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JULY 11, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art of all counselors the wisest, of all companions the nearest, and of all helpers the ablest and most willing, grant that during these strange and strenuous days we may avail ourselves confidently and constantly of that wisdom which never errs, that love which never forsakes, and that strength which never fails.

We pray that Thou wilt take over our groping and faltering spirits, emancipating us from all fear, assuring us that Thou art the God of justice and righteousness.

We thank Thee for the men and women who are now giving themselves so courageously and valiantly in order to safeguard our noble heritage of freedom. May the day soon come when the forces of evil shall be forever banished from the earth and men and nations shall walk together in love and good will, carrying the banner of peace.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO HAVE A DOCUMENT READ

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in connection with the remarks I shall make on the bill H. R. 8083 the Clerk may be permitted to read a letter which I have received from the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a newspaper editorial by Constantine Brown.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GAVIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DONDERO asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes tomorrow, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

WHAT ARE WE DOING IN KOREA?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, we are not at war in South Korea—that is, we are merely engaged in a little police work under the aegis of the United Nations—so we are reliably informed. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this once august body is now regarded by the administration in power as little more than a useless and slightly irritating appendage. Nevertheless, for the RECORD, I would like to ask what other members of the United Nations are doing in South Korea; what are they contributing in men, ammunition, and supplies? I believe Australia has some planes there, but apart from that I have heard of no active participation by any other members of the United Nations. Is the United States of America to become the police force for one-half of the United Nations? Because quite obviously Russia and her satellites are not joining us in this struggle. They are on the other side. It is now proposed that our soldiers should fight under the United Nations flag.

Mr. Speaker, if our men are fighting and dying, alone in South Korea, I believe we and they want them to fight under Old Glory.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

GREENSBURG, IND., THE CITY OF DEMOCRACY

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, in 1949, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce was looking for a program which would show to the world the advantages of the democratic way of life. As a part of this program, it was decided to select a typical American small town with a suitable balance of agriculture, industry, churches, schools, fraternal organizations, and service clubs and to publicize the way of life of the people of this town to the young leaders of the world at the first postwar International Congress of Junior Chambers of Commerce to be held in Brussels, Belgium, in April of 1949. After much consideration, the city of Greensburg, Ind., was chosen as most nearly meeting these requirements and designated the city of democracy by the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce.

To properly demonstrate the way of life in an American small town, it was then decided to contruct a replica of the city and to display this in Brussels, and elsewhere in Europe if possible, and to send with this replica a delegation of Jaycees from the city of democracy to answer any questions and describe the workings of this city.

The replica was completed and had its first showing in Greensburg, Ind., in April of 1949. At this showing, the replica was received with outstanding enthusiasm by the public and it has been so received at every showing to date.

From Greensburg, Ind., the replica went to London, England, to Paris, France, and on to Brussels, Belgium, for showings all in April of 1949. In May 1949 the replica was taken over by the United States Department of State and shown under their auspices in western Europe during the summer.

In May 1950 the replica was shown in Fort Wayne, Ind., at the State convention of the Indiana Junior Chamber of Commerce, and in June 1950 it was shown in Chicago, Ill., at the national convention of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce. The replica was returned to Greensburg, Ind., late in June in time to be shown along with a replica of the Liberty Bell to further the sale of savings bonds in the present bond drive.

The replica is at present on display in the lobby of the New House Office Building in Washington, D. C.

THE DRAFT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, last week I voted for the draft. I did so reluctantly. I did so because many Members of the House on this side of the aisle said, "BOB, you cannot afford not to vote for this because it is going to determine whether the United Nations is going to act as a unit now in trying to keep some big countries from running over little countries of the world."

I decided that was the case. But when I learned the other day that the President said we are not at war, I think it is up to him to ask the United Nations to get in there and pitch, and to get in there and fight. If he is going to send our boys to war—and this 20,000 draft is coming because we voted for it—and these other nations are not going to send their boys to do the fighting, then we ought to call our own boys back home and stay here and tend to our own business. We cannot send our boys to fight for others when they do not and will not fight for their own protection.

I say we ought to give some arms and ammunition to some of these other countries and let us see if they do want to fight to protect themselves. American boys are our greatest assets. If we kill them to protect others who will not fight to protect themselves, then we are not good Americans. We are not worthy of the trust imposed in us by our constituents. Mr. Truman says we are not at war. If we kill over 300 of our boys with tanks, guns, and planes during the past week, then I ask Mr. Truman what in the name of all that is good does he call war? That old golden voice I hear, "I say again and again and again I'll never send your boys to fight on foreign soil."

POINT 4 BASING PROGRAM

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under the point 4 program, being considered today, I wish to point out that ECA is now spending more than $85,000,000 in some 20 far-away places, which has the same purpose as that in the present bill under consideration.

I would point out further that there are now eight different Government agencies spending millions of dollars on foreign projects, such as building of roads, irrigation, bridge, and power projects. They are located in Africa, India, the islands of the Pacific, and Indian Oceans. To originate these projects, ECA asked for $85,000,000. It will take another three hundred million to complete them. The other body saw fit to write into the ECA bill, that the projects they were undertaking should not be in conflict with those under point 4.

It seems to me that it is about time this country stopped spending money for social rehabilitation, not only of the world but here at home, and begin to channel all of its efforts toward finishing this war. We cannot continue to bleed ourselves white. There is not enough blood in the world to give us a transfusion—to keep our economic system in balance if we waste our resources as we propose to do under some of these world-wide rehabilitation and socialized programs. It is time that we cleared the deck for action and stopped such foolishness.

There is no question but that there is evidence everywhere of global explosion. It is time for unity and not spending of money on socialized programs. We must face the cold, hard facts and quit dreaming about bringing the rest of the world up to a new high standard of living. It is nice to do it if you can, but can we afford it?

We ought to stop all socialistic programs, including socialized housing, slum clearance, and everything under the Marshall plan, except that which is definitely channeled for the military.

The administration should stop all efforts to adopt socialized medicine and the controversial Brannan farm program. We should reexamine every kind of Federal spending and cut out all fat, and programs not necessary to the full and complete prosecution of the war.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is time to clear the decks for action. There should no longer be strikes and stoppages of work and bickering over wages. This war is one of survival of the human race. We cannot afford to put our feet further in the mire by accepting the responsibility under the point 4 program, which we cannot afford.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN THE ARMED SERVICES

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, everyone in the United States today has a sad heart. "We are not at war," yet our boys are being killed.

I rise to remind the House that we must insist that freedom of speech be allowed among all of our services. I rise to warn the House that the Navy was never allowed to testify, during unification, nor allowed to talk. I rise to warn the House that Admiral Louis Denfeld was removed as Chief of Naval Operations because he dared to talk to the Armed Services Committee. If it had not been for the retirement of Admiral Denfeld and some other naval officers and the indignation of a thoroughly aroused and protecting American public the Navy today would not have the strength that it has and the Navy carriers and other armed strength. Every effort was made by the administration to weaken the Marine Corps. Freedom must be maintained and the services must be allowed to give their side of the story. If they had been, we would be in a much stronger position in the Pacific and elsewhere today.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

ATTORNEYS EMPLOYED BY SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 180) to suspend until December 31, 1950, the application of certain Federal laws with respect to attorneys employed by the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in connection with the study and investigation ordered by Senate Resolution 140, Eighty-first Congress.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That service or employment of one person as an attorney on a temporary basis prior to December 31, 1950, to assist the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare or its duly authorized Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations in the investigation ordered by Senate Resolution 140, agreed to August 15, 1949, and Senate Resolution 217, agreed to February 1, 1950, shall not be considered as service or employment bringing such person within the provisions of section 281, 283, or 284, of title 18 of the United States Code, or of any other Federal law imposing restrictions, requirements, or penalties in relation to the employment of persons, the performance of service, or the payment or receipt of compensation in connection with any claim, proceeding, or matter involving the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MILLER of California addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

DISTRICT BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY OR THURSDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on either Wednesday or Thursday of this week for the Speaker to recognize the Committee on the District of Columbia for the consideration of District bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

AS SHAKESPEARE EXPRESSED IT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under a similar condition as that with which we are faced today Shakespeare said—

So shaken as we are, so wan with care;
Find we a time for frighted peace to pant,
And breathe short-winded accents of new broils
To be commenced in strands afar remote.

He described our situation better in those words than I could describe it myself.

Let me say, though, Mr. Speaker, that I am one Member of Congress who is opposed to letting the United Nations declare war for the United States. I am opposed to subordinating my country to the domination of foreign powers. I am opposed to this bypassing of the United States Congress which is vested by the Constitution with the power to declare war.

Next we may be sent to war in some other foreign possessions.

I am unwilling to surrender the powers vested in the Congress of the United States to any foreign power or group of foreign powers.

YAKIMA RECLAMATION PROJECT

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I insert at this point in the RECORD a resolution which was adopted by the Public Lands Committee of the House this morning, and two acts relating to this procedure, concerning the expenditure of rehabilitation and better costs on certain reclamation projects. This resolution approves the findings of the Secretary of the Interior on this contract as outlined in his letter to both the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and to the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, dated July 6, 1950.

On October 7, 1949, the President approved an act to provide for the return of rehabilitation and betterment costs of Federal reclamation projects, and on March 3, this year, an act was approved amending that act to a slight degree, whereby it becomes possible for the above-named committees to express their approval of the determination by the Secretary of the Interior of the terms of a contract for the repayment of rehabilitation and betterment costs on reclamation projects.

The two acts referred to and the resolution which was adopted by the Public Lands Committee of the House are as follows:

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE EXPENDITURE OF REHABILITATION AND BETTERMENT FUNDS ON THE STORAGE DIVISION OF THE YAKIMA PROJECT, WASHINGTON

Whereas the act of October 7, 1949 (Public Law 335, 81st Cong., 1st sess.), as amended by the act of March 3, 1950 (Public Law 451, 81st Cong., 2d sess.) provides that expenditure of funds specifically appropriated for rehabilitation and betterment of irrigation systems on projects governed by the Federal reclamation laws shall be made only after the organizations shall have obligated themselves for the return thereof in installments fixed in accordance with their ability to pay, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior; and

Whereas the determination of the Secretary of the Interior does not become effective until the expiration of 60 days after it has been submitted to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate and the Commitee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives or on a date prior to the expiration of such 60 days in any case in which each such committee approves an earlier date and notifies the Secretary, in writing, of such approval; and

Whereas in a letter dated July 6, 1950, the Secretary of the Interior submitted to the Committee on Public Lands his findings relating to the return of rehabilitation and betterment funds to be expended on the Storage Division of the Yakima project, Wash.; and

Whereas the Committee on Public Lands has, in session with a quorum present, this day approved the findings of the Secretary of the Interior in these premises: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands give notice in writing to the Secretary of the Interior of its approval of his determination in these premises.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS,
J. HARDIN PETERSON, Chairman.

Adopted this 11th day of July, 1950.

[Public Law 335—81st Cong.]
[Ch. 650—1st sess.]
H. R. 1694

An act to provide for the return of rehabilitation and betterment costs of Federal reclamation projects

Be it enacted, etc., That expenditures of funds hereafter specifically appropriated for rehabilitation and betterment of irrigation systems on projects governed by the Federal reclamation laws (act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto) shall be made only after the organizations concerned shall have obligated themselves for the return thereof in installments fixed in accordance with their ability to pay, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior in the light of their outstanding repayment obligations, and which shall, to the fullest practicable extent, be scheduled for return with their construction charge installments or otherwise scheduled as he shall determine. No such determination of the Secretary of the Interior shall becom effective until the expiration of 60 days after it has been submitted to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate and the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives. The term "rehabilitation and betterment," as used in this act, shall mean maintenance, including replacements, which cannot be financed currently, as otherwise contemplated by the Federal reclamation laws in the case of operation and maintenance costs, but shall not include construction, the costs of which are returnable, in whole or in part, through "construction charges" as that term is defined in section 2 (d) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 (53 Stat. 1187). Such rehabilitation and betterment work may be performed by contract, by force account, or, notwithstanding any other law and subject only to such reasonable terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem appropriate for the protection of the United States, by contract entered into with the organization concerned whereby such organization shall perform such work.

SEC. 2. This act shall be deemed a supplement to the Federal reclamation laws.

Approved October 7, 1949.

[Public Law 451—81st Cong.]
[Ch. 47—2d sess.]
H. R. 7220

An act to expedite the rehabilitation of Federal reclamation projects in certain cases

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of the act entitled "An act to provide for the return of rehabilitation and betterment costs of Federal reclamation projects," approved October 7, 1949, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a semicolon and the following: "except that, any such determination may become effective prior to the expiration of such 60 days in any case in which each such committee approves an earlier date and notifies the Secretary, in writing, of such approval: Provided, That when Congress is not in session the Secretary's determination, if accompanied by a finding by the Secretary that substantial hardship to the water users concerned or substantial further injury to the project works will result, shall become effective when the chairman and ranking minority member of each such committee shall file with the Secretary their written approval of said findings."

Approved March 3, 1950.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK GUARANTIES OF UNITED STATES PRIVATE CAPITAL INVESTED ABROAD

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 650 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8083) to amend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended (59 Stat. 526, 666; 61 Stat. 130), to vest in the Export-Import Bank of Washington the power to guarantee United States investments abroad. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by request I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] in order that he may ask consent to speak out of order.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, about 3 weeks ago I received a number of communications, especially from the New York area, commenting on, or inquiring as to, a purported demand I was supposed to have made as a member of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities for the probe or investigation of the B'nai B'rith, a national Jewish fraternal organization.

It was not until I received, through colleagues and friends, clippings of an article by Robert S. Allen, news columnist, appearing in the editorial section of the New York Post on Tuesday, June 20, 1950, that I knew the source of these reports.

In his column, Mr. Allen, with whom I have been acquainted for a long time as a fellow newspaperman, made the flat statement—and I quote him:

> The Ohioan demanded a probe of the B'nai B'rith, a large Jewish fraternal organization.

Mr. Allen, in his article, also directly quoted what I was supposed to have said in an executive session of the committee:

> "I believe we should investigate the B'nai B'rith," the Ohioan declared; "they do a lot of lobbying and are behind a lot of this stuff."

While I realize Mr. Allen has had some means or method of obtaining a great deal of information, factual or otherwise, as to what has gone on in the executive sessions of the Committee on Lobbying Activities, I wish to take this means of publicly branding the statement contained in his column as to what I was purported to have said and done as being entirely false and untrue. I also wish to state unequivocally that at no time have I demanded the Committee on Lobbying Activities, or any other congressional committee, probe or investigate any fraternal or religious organization—the B'nai B'rith or any other.

I do not want to believe that Mr. Allen would deliberately engage in smear practices against me or any other individual, and I am, therefore, publicly calling upon him, and upon the New York Post, to retract the statements they have made regarding me in this matter.

May I add that after I learned of the publication of this Allen article I brought up the matter in a session of the Committee on Lobbying Activities, and each and every member of that committee then and there agreed and declared that I had never made any such demand for an investigation of the B'nai B'rith, or of any other religious or fraternal organization, and that the committee has never at any time since its inception discussed or considered the investigation of any religious or fraternal organization.

I therefore respectfully refer Mr. Allen, the New York Post, and any other interested persons to the members of the Committee on Lobbying Activities, all of whom I am sure will fully support the statement I have just made.

I regret the necessity of taking the time of the House on this situation—the first personal matter I have ever discussed on the floor of the House in my 12 years of service here. However, I have done so because of my belief the time has come to set the record straight on this subject.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] says. There is absolutely no truth in the statement contained in the article by Mr. Allen. I do not mean to say that Mr. Allen deliberately falsified the record, but his information was certainly incorrect, because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] made no such request and no such statement as Mr. Allen has indicated; and no other member of the committee ever suggested that B'nai B'rith, or any other religious or fraternal organization, be investigated. As a matter of fact, we all agreed that no religious organization or fraternal organization should be investigated so far as the lobbying activities they might have been engaged in were concerned.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the statement just made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANHAM]. At no time in any executive session, open session, or in private conversation have I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], or any other member of our committee, suggest that the committee would or should investigate any religious or fraternal organization.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I was present at that meeting. I have a very good memory. I know exactly what went on in that meeting. The statement alleged to have been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] was not made by him; nothing like it was made by him, and clearly from my own personal knowledge I know that the statement attributed to the gentleman is not true. I am glad to lend my voice to the others that have been raised here in setting the record straight.

I may say at this point that we on the Lobbying Committee have undertaken a very difficult assignment. By and large while we have had some difference of opinion on occasion on the whole we have progressed quite well and with a high degree of cooperation among all of the members. It is rather unfortunate that things of this sort should develop which make our work on the committee more burdensome and difficult.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman very much.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I was present during the meeting in question, and I agree with the gentleman from Ohio completely. He has stated what was the absolute fact.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I express my gratitude to all of the members of the committee who have spoken here today. May I say further that each and every member of the committee has read the statement I have just made and agrees with it, and I am sure if they were all present on the floor they, too, would agree with the statements which have been made here this morning.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 23 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Indiana [Mrs. HARDEN].

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention of the membership of this House to the fact that tomorrow is Indiana Day in Washington. As a part of the sequicentennial observance, more than 3,000 Hoosier women are here in Washington, and tomorrow night will participate in a choral program near the Capitol. The chorus, composed of members of home economics clubs from each of the 92 counties of Indiana, is under the direction of Mr. Albert P. Stewart, of Purdue University, a distinguished conductor of national renown. On behalf of the Indiana delegation, I should like to cordially invite all Members and their families to attend this program, and we wish for the chorus members and their friends a pleasant stay in this, our Nation's Capital.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I sense that friends of mine, members of the minority, have begun to square themselves off for a fight on this bill when, as a matter of fact, if an amendment that I shall offer, and which I am confident the Committee on Banking and Currency will accept, is adopted, there will be no excuse for any fight at all.

I do not know that I can be helpful to my colleagues in bringing to them a better understanding of the proposal which the pending rule makes consideration in order, but I shall make an attempt in the serious endeavor of giving them information which should remove all doubts from their minds as to the wisdom of adopting the proposal.

Mr. Speaker, what is intended by the resolution is to implement point 4 of the President's inaugural message. This proposal has been given a good deal of bad advertising. Gentlemen have referred to it in terms that would indicate that it is globalony; a proposal to give away the people's money when as a matter of fact it is no such thing.

Mr. Speaker, what is proposed is that our Government guarantee our own nationals wishing to invest abroad in economical undeveloped countries against losses due to political upheavals, giving them a guarantee that their properties will not be subjected to confiscation by the countries where the investment is made. I think it ought to be understood at the outset that there is no intention whatever of authorizing the Export-Import Bank to guarantee any investor against the ordinary risk incident to the carrying on of business as between people of our country and the people of foreign countries. What we are doing is simply authorizing the Export-Import Bank, for a fee, to guarantee our investor against the expropriation of his investments made abroad and certain other risks incident thereto.

I have examined with a good deal of interest and a good deal of pains the record of the hearings conducted by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I was impressed with the observations made and the questions asked by a number of the members of the committee, and particularly the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TALLE], who manifested a fine understanding of the whole proposal and therefore the strength resulting from such understanding. My committee colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER], testified before the committee, and he likewise manifested a fine understanding of the whole question. And I want to say to these gentlemen that I sympathize with the view that they took. I not only sympathize with the views that they have expressed—with the objections that they have raised, but I have adopted them as my own, and in the amendment which I will offer I have undertaken to meet every one of them. Now, I should like for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TALLE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER], and particularly the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], one of the clearest minded and ablest one I ever knew and who participated in the discussions in the Committee on Rules, and who will soon be severing his relations with this body, leaving it poorer than before, to examine this amendment and see if it does not meet the objections they raise.

If there are those of you that have doubts in your mind or have some particular objection to the proposal, you will be doing me a great kindness if you would make it known, because I should like to combat any argument that any Member of this House might see fit to lodge against the adoption of this measure.

The bill is simple. There is nothing complicated about it. It is not a give-away proposition. Where our investor finds a field where he thinks it would be fruitful for him to invest, the Export-Import Bank would be authorized to step in, to survey the whole proposition, and, if indication of making good on the investment is favorable, then, for an appropriate fee, to guarantee against expropriation, confiscation, seizure by action of public authority, or nonconvertibility.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Do I correctly understand the gentleman to say that he is not in sympathy with the bill presented before us?

Mr. COX. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. Let me say to the gentleman that the safeguards which the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Snyder, and the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Webb, said ought to be set up or at least taken into account by the Export-Import Bank, would, if the amendment which I will propose is adopted, be written into the law. In other words, if the safeguards about which the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Webb, Under Secretary of State, and others, had so much to say are written into the law, then every objection that is made by anyone of which I have any knowledge will have been completely removed.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. The gentleman feels, then, that the bill should be amended?

Mr. COX. I do feel that the bill should be amended.

The State Department was interested in leaving it to the discretion of the Export-Import Bank, but that would not be satisfying to a great number. Frankly, it would not be satisfying to me. If the Secretary of the Treasury and the Under Secretary of State insist that these safeguards should be observed by the Export-Import Bank, then there could be no valid reason for not writing them into the law.

I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] if he recalls the amendment which I proposed in the Committee on Rules and if, in his judgment, the adoption of that amendment would not meet the objections he has in mind.

Mr. HERTER. I may say to the gentleman I think the amendment he is going to offer will help the bill, but I am opposed to the bill in principle at this time.

Mr. COX. The gentleman made a very excellent statement before the Committee on Banking and Currency. He enumerated, and I have his remarks, the objections he had. Virtually every objection, I believe, is met by the amendment. As a matter of fact, the amendment was drawn in the light of what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] and the member of the committe [Mr. TALLE].

The gentleman did say in his appearance before the Committee on Banking and Currency that some guaranty against double taxation ought to be given, but of course that is something that could not be written into the law.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike to be in disagreement with my good friend from Georgia, but as I see this proposition the question is whether or not the taxpayers of the United States should guarantee the loans of private industry of this country with respect to certain undertakings in certain lands throughout the world. In more simple terms the question is whether the taxpayers of America, a nation that owes $257,000,000,000—a nation that is facing a war—should guarantee the investment of just a few international investors. That is the question in a nutshell.

Do we want to start the precedent of guaranteeing the loans of a few international investors and brokers? Do we want to embark on that policy? Who knows how far it will go?

Mr. Speaker, I happen to come from a community in northwestern Illinois, a community of frugal people. Over a century ago those people went out there in covered wagons and by boats and with nothing more than axes they cut down the trees and built churches and roads and hospitals and libraries. That is what our people did. They were not looking for some foreign people to come to this country and guarantee them anything. They knew they had to work or starve—and they worked. Today, as a result of their frugality we have these great buildings and homes and factories in the United States.

Here the Congress of the United States is asked to dissipate the savings of these frugal people and to go further into debt when we now owe more than the total assessed valuation of all the land and everything west of the Mississippi River. We are now asked to commit ourselves to guarantee the investments of certain international bankers throughout the world. If they make any profit, of course they keep that, but in the event that these international bankers should lose, then the United States Government, which has this gigantic national debt, will step in and pay the losses of these international investors.

Mr. Speaker, that is the proposition. As far as I am concerned, and I know that you agree with me, this will not help. It will just guarantee the risks of a few people in the entire United States. You know where these people reside. You know where their places of business are. There is not one of you who does not know that. There is not one of you who does not know where they reside and where their headquarters and where their business is. They are the ones who probably are responsible for bringing this legislation before us.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the gentleman visualize with me a situation which might arise under this bill. Suppose a large sum of, say, $500,000,000 was guaranteed under this bill which sum was invested in some foreign country. Suppose after a period of time there was an expropriation of that property by that foreign country. Would it then be incumbent upon the Government of the United States to send the marines in there to collect the bill since the United States Government had guaranteed that sum?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I think everyone knows that the gentleman is making a very important point. We know that many people believe that the causes of our wars is to secure certain foreign investments. With the young men being taken away from the farms and schools, and with the public mind as it is, do you think now is the proper time to say to the parents of those young Americans: "Wall Street is going to loan a few hundred million and you are going to guarantee it"?

Certainly I think the gentleman made a very vital point.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Did you ever know of this Government heretofore guaranteeing, to the extent of $250,000,000, any business enterprise that was established in our own country?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Not to my knowledge. That is the reason why we are content to let private enterprise in our own country take their own risks. I do not see why we should guarantee the losses of these international investors in other countries, when they have to take their chance in our own country.

Mr. RICH. If we never did that in our own country, why are we so desirous of trying to tax and tax and tax our people to death to send men to some foreign country to establish a business and then guarantee that business over there? If there is anything that is the height of folly or ridiculousness, I think this bill is it. What do you think of it?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I agree with you 100 percent.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. It seems to me it would be well to bring out this point, which I feel sure the gentleman would agree with: Many of us have had requests from constituents in our own districts who have a little bank account or some investment in a foreign country and they want to get their money out of that country and get it back home. They are our own American citizens, with a little investment in a foreign country. They are not able to get that converted into American dollars. There is nothing in this bill that would help them in any way, is there?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Positively not.

Mr. KEATING. The only people assisted in converting their foreign currency into American dollars are new bankers or big-business interests that go into those countries and do business there and then are given a guaranty by our Government, by our taxpayers, by the very people who are now not able to get their little savings out of those foreign countries? Still we guarantee that the money of those investors be returned to them in dollars. That is what this bill means.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The gentleman has made a very able and direct statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was there any testimony before the committee showing that the original purpose of the Export-Import Bank was to furnish credit for the purpose of facilitating the movement of goods in export and import between the United States and its Territories and other countries. And furthere to show that the original concept of the Export-Import Bank for the purpose of facilitating export and import was now getting into this new field? Did the proponents of this bill submit any evidence to the Rules Committee along that line?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. They did not go very far into the matter.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did the proponents of the bill indicate before the Rules Committee what fee is to be charged for the consideration of the guaranty given? In other words, this bill points out that the aggregate amount of such guaranty shall be $250,000,000; that is, temporarily; and that a fee is to be charged. An insurance premium, in other words. What was submitted along that line?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Very little, if anything.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In other words, the language of the bill is to guarantee an appropriate fee. Of course, there is no set figure included but the object is to set aside funds out of the appropriate fees that are charged on these loans, to take care of any losses that might occur on the loans that are made.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield for one other question on that same point?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, if a company is formed, it may be that a $250,000,000 loss will develop before there is any substantial reserve built up; so if you are going into the insurance business the theory is that you must have a wide enough spread to permit you to build up a reserve. Wherein does this bill do that thing—provide the spread?

Furthermore, as I read this bill, it does not protect the investor against this kind of situation: Suppose Republic A, we will call it, to the south of us, passes labor laws which apply to the operations of the company in question and operate in such way that that company cannot possibly survive and it is finally crowded out of business and its assets put on the bargain table. Suppose it is sold to the local people for 10 cents on the dollar; there is no guaranty in this bill against that kind of operation, is there?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. They could sell it for 5 cents on the dollar and the United States would be paying the bill to the international investor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This does not cover that type of operation.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. COUDERT. Then, I understand the gentleman from Illinois to make the point that there is nothing in this bill that provides any protection for existing enormous foreign investments of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is my understanding, and I shall want to dwell on that a little further. I cannot conceive having groups of our own investors in these foreign countries treated differently, the group before the passage of this bill having to lose what they have invested, perhaps, and then being taxed to pay for the insuring of their competitors from here on out.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. RICH. When I read the Treasury statement of July 6 and find that we are over $257,000,000,000 in the red, and we closed on June 30 farther in the red than we were last year, I wish someone would tell me how or what New Deal organization or Fair Deal organization trumped up such a ridiculous piece of legislation as this.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I may say to the gentleman that in all my 18 years' experience in this House I have never seen a worse proposal presented.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman repeat that statement?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I say that in my 18 years' service in this Congress this is definitely the worst piece of legislation I have ever seen presented.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman taken the care to read the testimony?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Most certainly.

Mr. COX. If he will do that and bring his fine judgment to play upon it I feel sure that he will conclude that it is the soundest proposal that has come here for a good long time.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I differ with the gentleman. I must hurry along for I have but a couple of minutes remaining.

Mr. Speaker, the question here is whether or not this Government should guarantee up to $250,000,000, if you please, of investments in foreign countries which will be taken out by only a few people from a certain street with which we are all very familiar and whose location we all know.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield me three additional minutes.

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman appreciate the fact that it has been a long-standing policy of this country to cooperate with other countries of the world that are economically weak in the endeavor to strengthen their economy and to develop an atmosphere of confidence under which our policy may profitably do business with one another?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I would say to my friend from Georgia that the building up and making prosperous of this country is paramount. I am not unmindful of the fact that the minute the solvency of the United States Government is impaired there is no one to come to our rescue. We already owe $257,000,000,000. Even with the greatest income in the history of our Nation this year we are going in the red.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman find in this bill anything more than an expression of confidence given on the part of our Government in the government in which the investment is to be made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I say that the issue is drawn here whether we want to guarantee these investments, the loans, of just a few of our international investors, permitting them to make profits in their business in foreign governments, which they will receive, but if they do not make any profit, while if they lose the American taxpayer makes up the loss. As far as I am concerned it is a precedent that should not be started now, because instead of being $250,000,000 it will go up and up and finally be untold billions of dollars.

I hope that the membership of the House takes some of these facts into consideration and I am hoping further that the bill will be defeated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a part of the original point 4 program enunciated by the President in his inaugural address. There were three separate bills introduced in the House as the result of that recommendation. One had to do with taxation, which is still pending before the Ways and Means Committee, the second had to do with technical assistance, which has now become law, and the third is this guaranty proposition.

The hearings on this bill were held over a year ago. The committee came before the Rules Committee requesting a rule about 1 year ago, just before the summer recess of the House. A rule was not granted at that time and the bill was recalled to the committee. The committee amended the bill and again reported it. They came before the Rules Committee about 6 weeks ago. This rule was reported by the Rules Committee on a very close vote, due to the absence of one member.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposing this bill for the reason that I think psychologically it is a very bad thing for us to do at this time. I have a great deal of sympathy with respect to the assistance that can be given by the technical skills, the capital, and the industry of this country in going to other countries. I think that is inevitable as a movement which will grow at an accelerated pace, provided the climate in foreign countries is receptive to American investments. That to my mind is the crux of the entire thing; that is, if the climate is receptive in other countries.

By our guaranteeing capital investments against expropriation and the convertibility of profits, we give the impression to every other country in the world that it is essential for us to push our capital out and almost regardless of the conditions maintained within any country we are going to encourage American capital to go into that country. That, I think, is an entirely wrong approach.

The correct approach is that which has been undertaken by the State Department but which has so far made very little progress. That is the approach of drawing up with foreign countries satisfactory investment treaties whereby those countries agree to treat foreign capital that may come to their shores with decency, with nondiscrimination, and with reasonable care that it can return to the home country its earnings, and so on.

If we begin to guarantee, I think we are going to weaken tremendously our efforts to make investment treaties with these countries. There are many score of these investment treaties now pending in the negotiation stage all over the world. Only two of them have been completed: One with Uruguay and one with Eire. We have one with Italy and one with China. Italy came with the war settlement and the one with China is worth nothing at all.

Although I believe the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia will be very helpful, certainly so far as narrowing the scope of any guaranties we might make, my second reason is what will inevitably happen if we treat new investments in a separate category from old investments? This bill will guarantee convertibility, which in effect means converting to dollars the moneys of foreign countries which represent earnings on new investments. This might well be a serious detriment to the legitimate investment which is already in the country. There is no provision to take care of that. It has been discussed at some length in the testimony, but we are dealing with human beings in the administration of this matter, and certainly this bill ought to make it very clear by amendment that it does not intend to discriminate against existing investors. What would happen? A new concern would get a guaranty on convertibility of its earnings. The only time it would have to resort to that guaranty would be when the dollar situation in the country in which it invested was so bad that it could not return its earnings in terms of dollars, and then it would get dollars from the Export-Import Bank, and the Export-Import Bank, in turn, would receive the foreign currency, and in the process of converting that currency into dollars it would naturally have to pinch those existing investments which were having difficulty in converting their own earnings into dollars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Speaker, the arguments of gentlemen opposing this bill surprise me greatly and make me wonder if at times I have not been wrong in voting with them on so many, many proposals that have come here for the consideration of this body. The gentleman from Massachusetts who just yielded the floor, in his appearance before the Committee on Banking and Currency, advocated everything that is in this bill with one or two minor exceptions, and with the adoption of the amendment that I have proposed I submit that every objection that he developed in the argument just made will have been met.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HERTER. If the gentleman will go to my testimony of a year ago——

Mr. COX. Yes; I have that before me and I have marked it rather liberally, for it is an excellent statement and with most of it I am in full agreement. The gentleman has said in a number of places that this was a very wise move and was deserving of careful consideration. The gentleman, in discussing foreign investments, called the committee's attention to the fact that it was foreign capital invested in our country that made possible our economic development and growth, and the gentleman said further that there is no way in the world of attracting private capital except through the creation of a climate which is favorable to private investment.

Mr. HERTER. That is exactly what I have been saying.

Mr. COX. And that is exactly what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. HERTER. I disagree with the gentleman, because I do not think it creates that climate.

Mr. COX. The gentleman said in his appearance before the committee that before we venture into this field that treaties ought to be entered into guaranteeing just treatment of investors, which is exactly what is provided for by the amendment that I shall offer and for the drafting of which the gentleman is partly responsible.

It would be senseless to make a treaty unless there was prospect of making an investment, just the same as it would be senseless to make a contract for the building of a house unless you had the intention to build a house. There would be no need for a treaty until there was business to be done.

Let me read my amendment for the information of the committee:

Page 2, after line 11, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. The Export-Import Bank of Washington (hereinafter referred to as the 'Bank') shall not, pursuant to the amendments made by the first section of this act, make any guaranty with respect to the investment of private capital in an enterprise in a foreign country unless there is in effect between such foreign country and the United States a treaty or treaties, agreement, or agreements containing the following provisions:

"(1) A provision which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Bank, adequately protects nationals of the United States against discriminatory and unduly burdensome measures and measures which unduly restrict the right of nationals of the United States to own, manage, and operate business enterprises within such foreign country.

"(2) A provision which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Bank, assures nationals of the United States that just compensation will be promptly paid to them if the government of such foreign country, or other public authority therein, (a) expropriates, confiscates, or seizes their business enterprise or any of their property, (b) deprives them of normal control over their business enterprise or any of their property, (c) imposes restrictions or charges on their business enterprise or any of their property (even though on a nondiscriminatory basis) to such extent as to deprive them of any substantial beneficial interest therein, or (d) destroys or substantially impairs the value of their business enterprise or any of their property by engaging in competition with such nationals either directly or through a corporate instrumentality.

"(3) A provision which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Bank, assures nationals of the United States that, subject only to the essential needs of such foreign country, such nationals will have the right (a) to convert into United States dollars an appropriate share of any currency of such foreign country received in connection with investments in such country, (b) to convert into United States dollars any currency of such foreign country constituting the just compensation described in paragraph (2), and (c) to transfer out of such foreign country all such United States dollars."

If that does not take care of the objections made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] then I should like him to indicate in what respect it fails.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I take it those provisions are provisions which the gentleman from Georgia feels should be written into the treaties?

Mr. COX. I do. Very frankly, I do. They are provisions which the Secretary of the Treasury and the Under Secretary of State said would be observed by the Export-Import Bank. Therefore, I can see no reason for not writing them into the law.

Mr. KEATING. If those provisions are written in by our State Department, as they should be, then is there any necessity for this guaranty we are asked to write into this bill?

Mr. COX. The guaranty is to our own nationals who invest in foreign countries where the promise of fruitful returns is good, but understand no such investment would be made except upon the invitation of the country concerned which would be backed up by treaty obligating the giving of proper protection.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has referred to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the effect that he thinks a climate should be created which is favorable for these investments. If that climate is created by the provisions which the gentleman from Georgia says should be written into the treaty, then having written those provisions in the treaty and having created that climate, is it necessary for us to guarantee that these businessmen will be able to convert their money and be free from the very things that we have written into the treaty itself?

Mr. COX. Yes, as an added inducement and as security for our own nationals against the assumption of extraordinary risks, incident to investments abroad. Here is all we do: the investor finds a field where he wants to invest. Then our country negotiates with the country where he desires to make investment. They create that favorable climate by entering into a treaty whereby the foreign country obligates itself to do the things which are enumerated in the amendment which has just been read and which will be offered.

Mr. KEATING. But if the foreign country does carry out its treaty obligations, then there is no need to write them into the bill.

Mr. COX. If there is no loss, there is no obligation under the guaranty. All there is to this bill is that our Government expresses a confidence in the foreign government inviting investments on the part of our own nationals that the foreign government will be fair and deal justly with them—that is all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course, the gentleman's amendment would completely rewrite the bill. Whether the bill is rewritten or not, however, is it not true that the number of people who may participate in this program are naturally very limited?

Mr. COX. Yes, the number is very limited. That is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Assuming the gentleman's amendment is adopted, does not the amendment in reality actually rewrite the bill in that it imposes on the recipient country the obligation of actually guaranteeing the investment through the investment treaty?

Mr. COX. No, there is nothing in this amendment which is inconsistent with any of the language of the bill. It simply spells out in the bill safeguards which the advocates of the measure say will be carried on by the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Where is there any language in the bill which imposes upon the recipient country any obligation to guarantee the lender against loss while the investment treaty will, if it carried the provisions the gentleman has advocated, and certainly I am not complaining against them.

Mr. COX. There is nothing in the bill to that effect. The bill is drawn so as to invest the power to do those things in the Export-Import Bank. The Export-Import Bank has a wonderful record and nobody here is finding fault with the operation of the bank. But we are insisting that things which the Secretary of the Treasury and the Undersecretary of State say the Export-Import Bank would do, be written into the law and not left to the discretion of anyone.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the gentleman would have this bill returned to the sponsoring committee so that the committee could incorporate in the bill provisions with reference to the obligation of the recipient countries to enter into investment treaties and carrying the provisions which the gentleman has submitted, then I think it would improve the bill by 199 percent.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I cannot see that the Government, by doing the things that are proposed, would incur the risk of losing one dime, because our investors are not going to put their money where they do not believe it is safe. Certainly our Government would not encourage them by offering to guarantee that they go into a field where a loss is likely to be incurred. All they are doing here is to help our own investors find a field in a foreign country where they may put their money to work with the hope of a reasonable return. That is all there is to it. We do not guarantee anything except against losses incident to revolution or losses incident to the nationalization program of a government. Even then, we have the treaty obligation of the country, whose nationals have been doing business with our nationals, to indemnify our nationals against loss.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike to bring this argument to a close if there are those who are still in doubt. I think it is a sound business proposition. I would be ashamed of myself, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding of the provisions of the bill that I have, if I hesitated because of the source from which the suggestion came to give it my support. There is nothing political about it and the vote should not divide along party lines.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I would like to say the only guaranty is against loss resulting from expropriation, confiscation, or seizure by a government or public authority.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8083) to amend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended (59 Stat. 526, 666; 61 Stat. 130), to vest in the Export-Import Bank of Washington the power to guarantee United States investments abroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8083, with Mr. GORE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] is recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] for 1 hour.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read a letter which I previously obtained permission for him to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 11, 1950.

Hon. BRENT SPENCE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPENCE: I hope very much for the passage of your bill, H. R. 8083. It is my conviction that private foreign investment can make a major and unique contribution to the common objective of underdeveloped countries and of ourselves for the expansion of the productive capacities of the less developed areas of the world. By facilitating the increased flow of American private investment abroad as this bill will do, this Government will, I believe, contribute to this objective and will benefit American businessmen and investors.

At the same time steps must also be taken by foreign countries to attract and encourage private capital. The guaranties which would be authorized by the proposed legislation are not a substitute for such steps, nor will the Bank wish to extend guaranties to investments in countries which are not giving evidence of establishing conditions favorable to the effective operation of private investment. But because conditions differ from country to country, it is essential that the program be kept flexible and left to the Bank to administer in the light of actual situations.

I regard this measure as an essential part of our program for carrying out the purpose of the American people to assist in the development of the underdeveloped parts of the world and thereby to contribute to the cause of world peace and freedom.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, there certainly should be no partisan division in the House on this bill. We have spent billions of dollars in order to encourage the good will and the confidence of the people of the world. We all know there is an expanding economy in a contracting world. George Washington said that because of our detached position we should have as little to do with foreign nations as possible, but today there is no detached position; the farthermost corners of the earth are of interest to us, and a spark may light a flame there that may consume the world. I think this is the best way to establish friendly relations. We have lent money, but Polonius said to his son:

Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.

That is true; you cannot make friends by lending; you cannot make friends by gifts. Gifts often produce nothing but ingratitude. But it seems to me that if we can establish American businesses that will develop the underdeveloped countries of the world, if we can establish relations with them, there will be a common interest that will encourage friendships that cannot be attained in any other way.

We are not using American capital in this bill; the American investor, small or large, can come to us and say: "We desire to invest, and we want you to give us a guaranty." A guaranty against what? "A guaranty against the inconvertibility of our currency in order that we may convert it into American dollars to pay our investors; a guaranty against expropriation, confiscation, and seizure by act of government." It is a limited guaranty. But the Government has heretofore gone into the business of insurance and guaranties; we did it in the War Damage Corporation; we did it in the FHA, in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, in the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation; and in every instance, since it was in a field which private enterprise would never have entered, and which the American people could never have benefited by if the Government had not entered it.

Now, in order to develop the underdeveloped areas of the earth we have said to the American investor: "If you want to go in there, we will not guarantee you against loss; we will not guarantee you against war; we will not guarantee you against many of the hazards of business, but we will make this limited guaranty in order that you may develop these underdeveloped areas." And why not? We ought to develop the underdeveloped areas. Many of them are the sources of plague, famine, and pestilence; there is where the great epidemics probably start. In one instance, in India, I think, the malarial mosquitoes drove the people away; their fields were devastated, their homes were vacant. But the American Commission went there, destroyed the mosquitoes, and the people are back again in their homes, and their fields are again blooming. These people are subnormal; these people need the advantages that we have, the advantages of science and of industry.

The American investor may profit because he will tap unknown sources of wealth that may in some measure make up for the devastation caused by the losses incurred in war.

But we have an amendment that none of this investment, none of these activities, shall result in uneconomic duplication or in competition with American industry. That can very well be provided. I heard the gentleman from Georgia talk about his amendment. He wants a treaty in every instance. In the case of many nations we do not need any treaty. We do not need any treaty with our good neighbor to the north, Canada; we do not need any treaty with Australia; we do not need any treaties with many other nations.

Treaties are matters of slow growth. It takes a long time sometimes to negotiate a treaty. It will probably tie the hands of the investor and of the Export-Import Bank in order to carry out the purposes for which this bill will be passed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will recall that the amendment I intend to propose was first drawn as he has indicated in the statement he just made; but there was developed the argument he has just given that maybe we should not draw treaties in every case. We therefore wrote in "agreement or agreements." I thought the amendment was acceptable to the gentleman.

Mr. SPENCE. I am going to study the amendment.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman is not going to accept the amendment he might just as well forget the bill.

Mr. SPENCE. I am just as willing for the bill to be defeated as having their hands tied so they cannot operate. I think it is essential that the purposes of this bill be carried out because it is one of the most constructive pieces of legislation that has been submitted to the Congress in a long time.

Mr. COX. I agree with the statement the gentleman has just made, but he will recall that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Under Secretary insisted upon everything that is in the amendment I shall propose.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not recall that.

Mr. COX. I have carefully examined the testimony on that.

Mr. SPENCE. That is not my recollection. I think we should have some agreements probably.

Mr. COX. We ought to have an understanding now. Is it the position of the gentleman that he will accept the amendment?

Mr. SPENCE. I do not accept the amendment at this time. I am going to study the amendment, and if I think it meets the requirements of the bill, I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. There must be some mistake in the printing of this bill because it only calls for $250,000,000. If you are going to guarantee loans in every underdeveloped country in the world, you should add about three ciphers.

Mr. SPENCE. The argument was made that this would cost billions of dollars. This is a limitation of $250,000,000. Now, $250,000,000 is a considerable sum in developing underdeveloped areas of the world. So we wrote $250,000,000 in the bill, and we also wrote in the bill that the guaranty should be for an appropriate fee.

If we are as successful in this undertaking as we have been in the other insurance features of the Government, it will cost nothing, because an appropriate fee would mean a self-supporting fee that will compensate the Export-Import Bank for their guaranty.

Mr. GROSS. In other words, then, you are just getting your foot in the door by this bill; is that it?

Mr. SPENCE. I do not think it could be called that. Maybe you are getting a little light in the room when you open the door.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. The other body saw fit to write into the appropriation on the ECA bill, in considering that measure, that projects undertaken under the ECA should not conflict with the work of point 4. I presume that was to keep the eight Government agencies now engaged in that work and the ECA, which was spending $84,000,000 on point-4 work, from conflicting with the point-4 program; is that right?

Mr. SPENCE. The ECA bill only applied to ECA countries, and I apprehend there were very few underdeveloped areas in ECA countries. This is really to carry out point 4 of the President's program in connection with the underdeveloped areas of the world, which are not in the ECA countries. I think this covers a field that is not touched at all in the ECA bill.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I do not believe the gentleman thoroughly understands the proposed amendment by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. SPENCE. Yes; I do.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. If he did I think he would be for it.

Mr. SPENCE. I will study the amendment very carefully.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I have studied it and I am supporting it and I will do everything I can for the amendment.

Mr. SPENCE. If the amendment requires a treaty in each case, I think it would tie the hands of the administration, because I think treaties are matters of great deliberation; it takes a long time to have them passed by both countries and approved. And I do believe that we ought to have a favorable climate. I think it ought to be assured by agreement, but I do not think it is essential to have treaties, and I assume there would have to be a treaty under the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman indulge me for a second? Here is a copy of the amendment that I propose and there is the language the gentleman suggested, and it is fair enough, because I understand a treaty is hard to make sometimes.

Mr. SPENCE. A treaty is hard to make sometimes, and it would tie the hands of the administration in every instance. Not only that, but a treaty could not be created in a reasonable time.

Mr. COX. It says "agreement."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under the Cox amendment would not an investment treaty between country A and the United States, for instance, cover any one and all loans made by American citizens in that country? In other words, why would you have to have a special treaty for each loan where poor loans are made in a country?

Mr. SPENCE. If that would be the construction of the Cox amendment it would be a futility, because you could not have a treaty for each loan; it would absolutely destroy the very purpose of the bill.

Now, I have not had a chance to study the Cox amendment, but I do feel that, if we are going to give them the power to guarantee these investors, we ought not to absolutely tie their hands. They talk about the priority given to those that are guaranteed over those who are not guaranteed. Certainly, it is not the business of the Export-Import Bank to give priority to any set of investors over any other set, because we are endeavoring to strengthen the economy of these nations, to strengthen their productive capacity, to increase their trade with this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. FARRINGTON].

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Hawaii?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, today's dispatches from Korea tell of the death of Ray Richards, a correspondent of the International News Service, and until a few months ago a distinguished member of the Press Gallery. I am prompted to pay this tribute to Ray Richards by reason of the fact that I knew him over a long period of years and because of the circumstances under which he gave his life to his country. I feel it is appropriate because of these circumstances that it should be called to the attention of the House.

Richards died when a Red Communist tank column of the North Korean forces overran the outnumbered American defenders of the South Korean line. The details are meager, but we know that a regimental adjutant, a Captain Downey, of the American forces, reported back to American headquarters that Ray Richards had been killed.

He had gone forward, far forward, to get the details from eye witnesses of the fight of the "Lost Battalion." He sent his jeep back to headquarters with the message that he was staying to complete his story.

He stayed and completed that story on the field of battle.

Those of us who knew him loved him for his help in our fight for statehood for Hawaii, for his crusading aid to Syngman Rhee and the liberty-loving Koreans in their fight for independence.

In his death there is glory for the American press, whose highest traditions were upheld by Richards. There is some palliation for the grief of his daughter, because Ray Richards died as he would have chosen to die—helping with his facile use of words the world fight against the menace of Red totalitarianism.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 19 minutes.

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KILBURN. I voted for this bill in committee on the understanding that we have a treaty with the country involved, whereby if any foreign country seizes our plants, we shall take their money in this country and reimburse ourselves for insuring the foreign investment of our local company. I think the bill is all right with that provision in it. I am for the Cox amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to stimulate the flow of American capital abroad. That is not my language, it is the language in the report. The report sets forth on page 4:

> Although it is impossible to predict how effective the offer of guaranties may be in encouraging the investment of additional private capital abroad, there is a real possibility that guaranties may well serve to stimulate the flow of such capital.

Then, of course, the policy provisions of the bill further indicate that it is the purpose of the bill to stimulate the flow of American capital abroad. Do we want to stimulate the flow of American capital abroad?

I recall some few years before the last war a good many American industries had established factories in foreign countries. I remember at one time all the Ford tractors which were sold to American farmers were made in Ireland, I believe, and England. I recall very distinctly that pharmaceutical concerns, optical concerns, automobile concerns, and food-processing concerns established branches in foreign countries.

I remember very, very well that electrical concerns established branches abroad. I think there are times when we here in the Congress must protect American labor against some of their own leaders. An effective labor leader, having in mind more the interest of the laboring man than any particular ideological premise, would be here fighting his head off against this bill on the ground that American capital can migrate; American capital can go to western Germany and England and Italy and France and to the Netherlands and to Tokyo, but the American laboring man cannot follow that capital. He cannot pick up and sell his home and follow American capital to the four corners of the earth.

I remember very well a few years ago, and you will recall the famous example, of electric light bulbs. Electric light bulbs had been manufactured by a great American industry, and were selling here domestically for 35 or 40 cents apiece. A great American industry was being threatened—we thought—by the importation of cheaply manufactured Japanese electric light bulbs. There was a factory outside of Tokyo which was making these electric light bulbs and sending them to the United States in competition with the domestically manufactured electric light bulbs.

You will recall all of a sudden almost every drug store and grocery store put in chicken wire trays of electric light bulbs which they sold for 10 cents. Here in the Congress we said, "What shall we do; here is a great American industry which needs protection. Shall we raise the tariff on electric light bulbs? Shall we put import restrictions against electric light bulbs to save this great American industry?"

We shed a lot of crocodile tears for that American industry before we found out that the factory outside of Tokyo manufacturing these electric light bulbs was owned by the American industry. They had taken American capital and built this competition outside of Tokyo. So our attention was immediately diverted from American capital to the problem of the American laboring man, the American men and women who were working in this factory here in America making these bulbs. They were the ones concerned. They were the ones who were being put out of a job by this cheaply manufactured product in Japan. American capital had gone to Japan. American capital could migrate. But American men and women working in the industry making electric light bulbs here in America could not migrate and go to Japan.

We had another outstanding example before the war of American capital going into a certain South American country and making a refrigerator box to sell in competition with cheaply made German refrigerators which were competing with refrigerators manufactured in this country. The American product could not be made and sold in South America at that time for less than $160. Yet, American capital could go into South America, establish its own factory, employ domestic labor on a standard of living proportionately lower than ours and manufacture a refrigerator box which could be sold for about $60 in competition with cheaply made German refrigerator boxes. Do we, under those conditions, want to encourage further the flight of American capital abroad, to the prejudice of the American laboring man?

The National Association of Manufacturers and industry generally tell us that it is because of the American productive effort that keeps the standard of living here as high as it is; our capacity to produce; but not our capacity to produce cheaply. When American industry finds it cannot compete in foreign countries because of the American standard of living, then it takes American capital and goes into that market and manufactures the product in that foreign market, to the probable prejudice of the American economy and with the probable result that when and if those foreign countries once go into full production, either through their own efforts or through the efforts of Uncle Sam, when we will have saturated the world markets, then who is going to be the sufferer? The American laboring man and the American standard of living and the American economy, and I might say world peace will suffer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

Now, we have reached the saturation point in many cases. Where is your New England watch industry? Where is your New England textile industry? Where is your New England shoe industry? About a year ago there was spotted throughout the United States areas in which the Administration, the Government, recognized as distressed areas. New England was one of those areas. So long as we in the United States, as a matter of Government policy, consider the development of undeveloped areas in the world, whether it be tropical Africa or the Antarctic regions—because there is no limitations in this bill that confines it to civilized countries—so long as we consider the development of undeveloped areas in the world paramount to the safeguarding of our own economy upon which world peace must be built, then we are going to be in very serious trouble.

We have never thought of guaranteeing such a thing as this in America. In the United States we do not guarantee anybody against industrial or commercial losses. True, we guarantee certain loans against loss on homes, to encourage the production of homes. We guarantee against loss of depositor's money in banks, for the reason that we do not want a run to start on those banks and a depression to result. But nowhere in the United States do we guarantee industry and business against losses right here in the United States. Yet, if capital thinks that because perhaps their capital is not guaranteed in America, they may see in that fact an inducement, an encouragement to take their capital and send it abroad and to build factories abroad.

At the present time there are billions of American capital invested abroad, in addition to the billions which we have made possible by direct lending and guarantees abroad.

In this bill we must recognize that we give preference to those who invest from now on. The American money which has already been invested in these areas is not guaranteed under the terms of this bill. To be sure, American investments can be liquidated abroad, turned into American capital and reinvested inside of 24 hours perhaps and get the benefit of this, but are we discriminating against those who have invested their money abroad by the billions, discriminating in this bill to encourage those who have not invested to invest? If so, of course, that discrimination has got to be removed in legislation within a reasonable time.

In the first bill we had before us which I think correctly interpreted administrative thinking there was no limitation on the kind of guaranty excepting the amount which the Export-Import Bank could raise which, if my memory serves me correctly, was $3,500,000. That was unsatisfactory; there was not any chance of getting that bill passed; so this bill carries a limitation of $250,000,000. We know, of course, because it has been said here before, that this is merely the development of a policy. They are not interested in the $250,000,000; they are interested only in getting a legislative declaration of policy that American capital to the prejudice of American labor can migrate abroad and have the Treasury of the United States, if you please, insure them against loss.

I think it is about time that somebody in the interest of American labor stood up here and protested against these things which make it possible for distressed areas not only to exist in New England but distressed areas might exist, as they have in the last year, in Port Huron, Mich., or throughout the Midwest; if there is anything which will aid in the creation of distressed areas it is the migration of American capital out of this climate in which we have created the highest standard of living ever known to man, the migration of American capital to underdeveloped areas or low-standard areas where American industry and American finance can with virtual slave labor under slave labor terms compete with the standard of living here.

I am speaking as I have always spoken for the protection of the American laboring man against the loss of his job; because if his job is lost, if the farmer's income is lost to the farmer, then American income diminishes to the point where we cannot carry this load we are carrying, and our whole standard of living collapses. I think that by enacting this bill we announce a policy to the world which makes possible the destruction of our American standard of living, and we should all be against it.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOLLINGER].

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Chairman, there is not one of us here, I am sure, who does not feel himself walking a tightrope when considering the grave responsibility our country faces in its position as leader of the free world. If we ourselves are to remain free, we must strengthen the free nations beyond our shores. During the last few years we have been called upon to appropriate vast amounts of our wealth and to devote a substantial proportion of our productive labor to foreign aid. We can shirk this responsibility only at our peril. On the other hand, we cannot go on indefinitely with free aid to the point of weakening our own economic strength, as the slave world would have us do.

It seems to me that in H. R. 8083 may lie one of the answers to this dilemma. For, if I understand it correctly, the guaranty program is a sound banking proposition. It is neither imperialistic nor charitable. It is a self-supporting program and not a disguised subsidy.

I wish to direct your attention for a moment to one of the most important aspects of the bill before us, which leads me to think we are dealing here, not with another grant or free-aid program, but with a straightforward, sound business proposition of advantage to both the United States and the underdeveloped areas.

The administration of this program is placed in the hands of the Export-Import Bank of Washington. It is placed in those competent hands for a variety of very good reasons.

The bank was established in 1934 and, during the following 16 years, extended foreign credits amounting to considerably over $4,000,000,000. Bad-debt losses from the date of its founding to the present time do not exceed $300,000, and even a part of this sum may still be recovered. During that period the bank has made net earnings of about $200,000,000, after deduction of all operating costs, losses, and interest on borrowed money. Even after allowing for interest at going rates on the sums invested in its capital stock by the United States Treasury, the bank has made a net profit for the Government of over $100,000,000, to say nothing of the fact that it has made possible, through its direct operations, billions of dollars of export sales for private business in this country.

The guaranty program is placed in the hands of the bank because we expect these guaranties to be extended on a businesslike basis. The original statute provides for a full-time Board of Directors drawn from both political parties—thus assuring administration by a nonpolitical, financially trained group of experts. Furthermore, it requires that the bank extend guaranty and credit assistance which, in the judgment of its Board of Directors, offer reasonable assurance of repayment. The record proves that the bank has lived up to this requirement. We may expect it to continue to do so.

The plan itself is so devised that the bank can expect to recover at later dates direct from the foreign countries involved any dollars the bank was required to pay to American investors under guaranty contracts, and beyond this the bank is directed to charge fees for its guaranties for the purpose of building reserves against any final residual losses.

The bank's reputation of financial soundness is well established, not only in the United States but throughout the world. Foreign countries know that guaranties would be extended only for sound projects. The bank can usefully draw from its credit experience in dealing with foreign countries, when it comes to the question of negotiating agreements with the governments of foreign countries concerning the eventual payment in dollars for any foreign currencies which the bank might take over from the American investors under the guaranty.

The study of foreign investment and the participation with private capital in such investment has been the bank's function from its inception. United States businessmen have become used to working with this institution, are familiar with its procedures, and have confidence in its judgment concerning foreign investment problems. The record is there for all to see—demonstrating the bank's ability to appraise the risks of specific foreign projects. It maintains a trained corps of engineers, lawyers, economists, examiners, and financial experts to do just this. Many loan applications are turned down every week which cannot pass its exacting business requirements. We can expect the same trained discretion in extending guaranties as has been exercised in making loans.

One of the secrets of the bank's success has been its firm policy to extend credits only when the specific projects involved can be expected to increase the borrowing country's ability to repay its debts. Acceptable projects must add to the borrowing country's power to produce and to better its dollar exchange position. Similar standards can be expected for guaranty projects.

Another policy of the Export-Import Bank, gentlemen, has been encouragement of participation by private capital. Sometimes this has been through sharing the risk directly with American exporters; sometimes by risk participation of private commercial banks; and sometimes by extending credit on the condition of adequate equity investment by private capital. The guaranty program is nothing more than a logical extension of these activities. In fact it now administers, as agent of ECA, the ECA industrial guaranties.

As a result of its 16 years of experience, the bank is in an excellent position to determine the extent to which private investment should be undertaken in any underdeveloped area, in terms of their ability to service it. It has the best possible experience for determining appropriate fees for the guaranties. Investments and loans already made in such countries must be considered. Proper guaranties and encouragement of new investment will aid existing investment, and no institution could be more aware of this than the Export-Import Bank.

In short, gentlemen, this is a sound, realistic business program in the hands of a sound and realistic bank.

The program is frankly experimental. The Export-Import Bank is much too wise to represent it in any other manner. Nevertheless, justification must be found in the philosophy of a sound business approach and a self-supporting plan such as this. The United States cannot go on indefinitely with gift aid. If we are going to remain free, then we must find a businesslike way of building up the underdeveloped areas of the world that they may be strong partners in a free world.

Let us earnestly hope that, though undertaking this experimental business program, we will find the way to that type of foreign economic and financial policy that will lead toward the goal of peace and ever-growing development which we and the rest of the free world seek.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, it is always very difficult to follow the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] for we all have great respect for his views. Of course, when he poses this question of the interests of an undeveloped area in conflict with the welfare of American industry there is an easy answer. Our first responsibility is to American industry.

But we will not arrive at the right answer to a question of this kind if we regard these interests as in conflict. It seems to me there are two things to justify and require this legislation. One is that our interests are bound up with the interests of the rest of the world. And second that the improvement of economic conditions abroad should be primarily a matter of private enterprise. We cannot survive as a nation strong and free in a world that is broken down with economic disease. It is only because we do see that our interests are bound up with the interests of these undeveloped areas that we have tried to project some solution. Something like the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia will be acceptable and can be worked out, because we favor every safeguard against the waste of American funds or the improvident use of American capital abroad.

Mr. WOLCOTT speaks of depressed areas in America. I, too, have seen distress. Some counties in Arkansas have a lower population than in 1910. I could not face my people if I had done anything here that would mean an accentuation of adverse economic forces at home. That is not the issue. I see our interests as favored by the strengthening of the economic basis for a good society for other peoples. The areas that are definitely in mind, of course, are the Far East, the Near East, Latin America, and Africa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. There is nothing in this bill to specify any area. This money can be lent in any place in the world.

Mr. COX. But it is shown in the testimony.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. That is true. There is nothing in the bill, but there is in the testimony, and, obviously, that is where the money will be expended.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I think we ought to straighten that out at this point. There is nothing in this bill that guarantees against any business loss.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I am glad to have that highlighted. It certainly is not authorized by this bill.

If the authority of the Export-Import Bank is extended as proposed under this bill, the Bank will have authority to do just two things. Incidentally, an appropriate fee for these guarantees will be charged, and there is a limitation of $250,000,000 for this purpose out of uncommitted loan authority of $800,000,000.

There are two things to be done. One is to guarantee American investors, first, against inconvertibility of their foreign currencies and, second, to guarantee them against loss resulting from confiscation, expropriation, or losses that might result from political revolution.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TALLE. I should like to have the gentleman from Arkansas clarify the term "business loss" as used in the discussion so far. I think we should be more specific about that.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. If I am capable of it and have the time. Others on the committee to follow me I hope will fill any gaps I leave. I agree, of course, that we will have to define carefully just what we mean by the statement that the Bank would not be guaranteeing against business losses. Incidentally, I am glad that the gentleman from Michigan helped as he did with the legislative history. I suggest, however, that many of the things he said should be addressed to the officials of the Export-Import Bank, not to the House. Their discretion must necessarily be broad if they carry out the general objectives of this legislation. The gentleman would not disagree with the proposition I made that we are limiting their authority to two types of losses: One from inconvertibility, which is not a loss, but the inability to convert their profits or capital into American dollars; second, the loss that would result—and to some extent they are overlapping—from confiscation, or expropriation.

Mr. TALLE. Will the gentleman yield further, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I am glad to.

Mr. TALLE. The term "business loss" is entirely too indefinite for my purpose. I want to know if the gentleman has in mind operating losses; losses in the operation of a specific business. I would like to have that matter clarified.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I think I can be very clear and specific on this, that it does not authorize the extension of a guarantee against an operational loss. It does not authorize the extension of the guarantee against the ordinary hazards of business, and that leaves it, of course, in exactly the same category as a domestic operation. There is no activity of the Federal Government that guarantees American capitalists against losses at home that result from the ordinary hazards of business. We certainly do not propose to give to American capital abroad any greater advantage. I hope I have spoken to the point that was raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. It only guarantees against inconvertibility, expropriation, confiscation, and seizure by act of public authority. That is definite and clear, and it seems to me nobody can mistake that.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. TALLE. Considering the present condition of the world in which we live, I contend that that is still a gigantic program.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Might I remind the House in closing that the purpose of this legislation is to help erect an economic base for a safe, peaceful society as well as encouraging private capital, not governmental funds, the protection of investments that are strictly private, in a fruitful and profitable operation abroad that will serve both other nations and ourselves.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman used the word "revolution." I do not see that in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. In these days, Mr. Chairman, when it looks like every nickel that the United would have available would be required to defend ourselves and our Allies against the rising tide of communism, I cannot see the idea of embarking upon a program such as this.

We have been asked to provide large sums of money. Last year we appropriated for national defense $14,664,000,000 for expenditures in the fiscal year 1950. There was expended, however, $13,335,000,000. We appropriated and provided contract authorization for $1,300,000,000 for mutual defense assistance and out of that amount, according to the Treasury statement of June 30, only $44,342,000 has been spent. There were larger carry-overs, by $1,300,000,000, at the end of 1950 than there were at the end of 1949.

In other words, we provided this money for the administration to protect the United States of America, and it has not been used, and here we are considering a bill to embarrass the Treasury further to the tune, they say, of $250,000,000. It does not say in the bill.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. If the gentleman will yield, I believe the bill does limit it. It is in the last sentence of the bill, in line 11 on page 2.

Mr. TABER. Somebody told me I had the wrong bill. Is H. R. 8083 the one we are considering?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I was told by the committee that it was H. R. 5594.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. That was the earlier bill.

Mr. TABER. This is a little clearer. This bill provides in a little clearer language "to guarantee for an appropriate fee United States private capital invested in productive enterprises abroad which contribute to economic development in foreign countries by assuring either or both the conversion into United States dollars of foreign currency derived from an investment." That can be construed to mean almost anything in connection with a loss on the investment or a loss on anything else. I do not think that language is good and clear at all.

On top of that you have "compensation in United States dollars for loss resulting for expropriation, confiscation, or seizure by action of public authority." This indicates that you are expecting that these people will do these things and that that is the way they will appreciate investment by our people in their countries. We are saying in advance that we expect these countries to seize the plants, mines, or industries that our people will start in their countries.

I do not see how people can be for such a bill as this.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of H. R. 8083 is to stimulate and encourage the investment of American private capital in areas outside of the United States. The argument has been made here today that we should put on blinders and protect American labor here in this country and not expand our American economy. Something has been said about the amount of money which has been appropriated for defense purposes. We are not going to win this war of ideologies in the world in which we are living today or in the future by looking downward or looking backward. We must think in terms of what the next 50 years holds forth for the kind of American free enterprise that we believe in.

To this end it is recommended that an agency of this Government be authorized to give certain guaranties to private American businessmen desiring to undertake ventures abroad. It is confidently hoped, and expected, that as a result some of the most significant deterrents now inhibiting the expansion of these activities will be given less weight in the minds of prospective investors, so that American enterprise will be more willing to expand into new fields throughout the world. Surely the Members of this House do not need to be lectured on the benefits of American private enterprise and the contributions it can make to economic growth and progress.

We in this country today have an expanding economy. Just a few years ago the total number of men employed in productive levels; the attainment of a high standard of living; the distribution of income to people in all income brackets; the acquisition of property in the form of home ownership and the acquisition of other tangibles was almost inconceivable. We are today engaged in a conflict of ideas in which the American economy is demonstrating to the world whether or not the form of our economic system is one which will prevail and spread its productive benefits to all levels of our people, not only in America but in other parts of the world. We are demonstrating whether we can step out into other continents and show much better than we can by force of arms or by the magnitude of our defense ability that our system is one in which we encourage the growth of the kind of world that we want to live in in the future.

We have been told a great deal in recent months about the need in many areas of the world for the benefits of our scientific advances and industrial progress. Some two-thirds of the world's population live in economically underdeveloped areas, and their advance is being hindered by deficiencies in technical skills and in capital for essential productive purposes. As a result their average income is far below what it is in the more highly developed areas. Moreover, because of deficient food and the lack of basic health services their life expectancy is about half what it is in more advanced areas. But regardless of the statistics one can collect, we all know from what we have heard and read, and from what many of us have seen, that there are vast areas of this world in which the people seldom, if ever partake of the good things of this life—including many of those things which we have come to regard as essential to decent living. So long as such conditions exist and we make no effort, or only a half-hearted effort, to assist in improving them, these people will be attracted by false ideologies.

We must get behind the iron curtain of false doctrines and ideas wherein it is said that the American economy is crumbling and that it is on the road to ruin and bankruptcy. We must think in terms of exactly what we have. I might say certainly the record of some 56 corporations that are billion-dollar corporations and which in the past 10 years have expanded and joined this new exclusive club known as the billion-dollar corporation club is testimonial of just what we have in America.

There are other considerations, however, factors bearing more directly upon our own daily lives, which should impel the Members of this House to support the objectives of the bill now before us. In the first place, the relationship between the development of an area and its volume of trade is very close. The best markets are those in which there is the most purchasing power. The United States has always exported at its highest rate to developed countries. In the 5 years before we entered the war, for example, the people of the well-developed areas bought from the United States nearly $6 worth of goods per person per year, on the average. At the same time people of lesser developed areas were buying about $1.25 worth, and those of the underdeveloped areas only 70 cents worth. Surely it is self-evident that if the productivity and the purchasing power of the people of these areas can be expanded, our own industry and agriculture will benefit very directly. The development of additional productive facilities in these regions will contribute to a general expansion of trade in which we and other nations can participate to our mutual advantage. In a limited market nations are forced to struggle with each other for a share; with expanding trade the exporting countries will be able to participate in a constantly increasing flow of trade. Thus, to increase the output and the national income of the less developed regions is to increase our own economic stability.

Economic development abroad also means an expanded market for the sale of capital equipment and other manufactured products. As knowledge and skill in the installation and operation of machinery and equipment grows, the need and demand for it will increase. By facilitating the investment of capital in sound projects in the underdeveloped areas we shall be increasing their purchases of capital equipment which they cannot themselves produce but which the United States can manufacture in substantial quantities. This business of economic development is like a chain reaction, for as local production is increased new demands are created, wider markets are sought and levels of world trade are raised. The net result is that new opportunities for still more investment arise and the process is repeated all along an ever widening front.

On the other side of the coin is the increased dependence of many of the more developed countries on imports of basic minerals and raw materials. Certain sources of these commodities are becoming exhausted, while at the same time high levels of production are causing increasing demands. In a number of the underdeveloped countries the production of these important commodities can be increased. This will be of mutual benefit by expanding the purchasing power of such countries as well as by augmenting the world supply of the commodities in question. There is no doubt that much of the capital for developing these resources must come from within the countries themselves, but that may not be sufficient. Just as foreign investment played an important part in developing the United States, so foreign capital can play a decisive part in accelerating the development of other areas.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. One day we hear that these billion-dollar corporations that the gentleman is talking about are a great menace to this country, and the next day we hear that they are one of our great virtues. I wonder just what the situation is.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Of course, I am not an expert here on everything that is said and who may have said it. But most certainly I believe the gentleman will subscribe to the statement that I have never said that any billion-dollar corporation is a menace because of its bigness but that the very magnitude of the industry may make for its efficient operation. Certainly I personally do not subscribe to the idea that large corporations are a menace. I do not believe the gentleman is attempting to put that particular tag on me.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman tell me whether there is any business firm in the country that has asked for this legislation and what they manufacture and where they want to go, that is, into what foreign country, to use any of these funds?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Most certainly a very careful reading of the hearings will point out the fact that our American industry does want to expand.

Mr. COX. Not one businessman appeared opposing it.

Mr. RICH. Have any of them appeared for it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. They have. In the hearings held before the committee testimony has been introduced in the hearings, and there was ample opportunity given for any representative of American industry to appear and oppose this legislation. The fact that they did not appear in opposition to the legislation shows they do not disapprove it.

Mr. RICH. Oh, no. If they did not appear, then how do you know that any of them wanted to go over there?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I take that as being conclusive evidence and proof that they do want this legislation.

Mr. RICH. Because you announced that any industry could appear, and none of them did appear, does not say that any industry wanted to go over there or that they wanted to use these funds.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Most certainly it will be to the benefit of American enterprise to develop not only the market for their products here, but in the countries which will be closer to their point of manufacture.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman heard of a single businessman, big or small, who is against this bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not at all. But there may be some.

Mr. SPENCE. The United States Chamber of Commerce has come out in favor of the bill. Is that not right?

Mr. BUCHANAN. They have.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. RICH. If they establish these plants in foreign countries, are they going to bring their manufactured goods back here and sell them in America?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I believe there is ample market abroad for whatever they are able to produce in their own country.

Now, let me close with this statement. It is clear that private American enterprise can make a tremendous contribution in these fields. Not only is it a source of funds, but it can contribute the initiative and resourcefulness, the managerial experience, and technical knowledge which is of the utmost importance to successful operations anywhere. It possesses the patents and processes, the techniques and know-how, and the management skills and diversified organizational patterns without which capital cannot be put to work effectively. Clearly American investors must so conduct themselves abroad that the local economies as well as the investor will receive the full benefit of his activities. As the President has said:

> What we envisage is a program of development based on the concepts of democratic fair-dealing. Exploitation for foreign profit has no place in our plans.

The members of this House have the opportunity of stimulating this process by approving the bill which is now before us. The program upon which the Export-Import Bank will be authorized to embark will be experimental in nature, but there is every reason to believe that it may be the spark which starts things moving. We would be grossly lacking in foresight and courage not to set off that spark. I am convinced that the Export-Import Bank will exercise its new authority within the framework of its existing operations, and the members of this House well know that that institution has an enviable record of sound operation on a self-sustaining basis, that is to say, without loss to the American taxpayers. We in this country know that democratic private enterprise is not dead, and we must not miss this opportunity of encouraging renewed demonstrations throughout the world of what it can accomplish. In short, I strongly support this bill—and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, take up the statement of July 6 of the Treasury of the United States, and you will find that we are in the red $257,357,000,000. the greatest sum that this country has ever been in debt. More than all the debt of all the Marshall plan countries combined.

I see some of the men on the Democratic side smiling at that. This is nothing to smile at. This is something that is mighty serious, as far as this country is concerned. I take it as a serious matter.

H. R. 8083, according to the statement here, is to amend the Export-Import Bank Act and to vest in the Export-Import Bank the power to guarantee United States investments abroad.

I cannot understand how when you went into the red over $3,000,000,000 last year you can take $250,000,000 of the taxpayers' hard-earned money and send it abroad to guarantee business to anyone, I do not care who he is, any business concern, against any loss if he goes into some foreign country to manufacture merchandise. If American capital wants to go abroad and employ labor at 15 or 20 or 25 or 30 cents an hour—and he can get all the labor he wants at that price, or less—and then bring his merchandise back to America and sell that merchandise in this country where we have to pay a dollar an hour or more to our own people in order to give them jobs, you are simply going to put your own people out of work. If that is a good thing for America today, then I am blind, and I cannot see, because it is my duty as an American citizen to look after American labor and American industry and not to try to branch out in foreign countries to the point where I am going to wreck America in order to do something for some foreign country. Of course it sounds nice but it is too serious to trifle with, too serious to put in effect, the results will be more serious to our economy than good. I sat here yesterday and listened to the majority leader say he was in favor of progress. So am I in favor of progress, but I am in favor of progress for the United States of America and the American citizens. I want to take care of my own people first. At a time like this when we have such prosperity as we say we have, going $3,000,000,000 in the red at a time when the country is said to be enjoying the highest prosperity it ever enjoyed, God help us if we ever get in a position where we enjoy a lesser prosperity, for then we shall surely plunge into the depths of despair and despondency, and we will probably wreck the Government. I am not one for that, and I am not one to be in favor of such a thing as that. America first. We are laying up debt for our children, when we cannot take care of it ourselves.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Just for a question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hold in my hand a copy of the hearings showing the witnesses who appeared for this bill. I wish the gentleman would refer to it. This is an international trading presentation, pure and simple; and I will challenge anyone to refute that by reference to the hearings.

Mr. RICH. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] whether he does not think it is about time that we in America began to look after American industry, American people, American labor which is out of work, and give them jobs instead of trying to guarantee a lot of our capitalists who want to go to foreign countries and manufacture stuff over there, and then bring it back to compete with American-made goods and put our workmen out of business?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I agree with the gentleman. That is the reason I called his attention to the witnesses who appeared before the committee. This is a free trade presentation, pure and simple; and they cannot show where American industry stood up here and advocated this bill.

Mr. RICH. It is about time, if we are in favor of progress for America, that we look after the American people. That is what I am trying to bring out here whenever you ask if we are in favor of progress. I often think back to the time when we started this administration; we call it the Fair Deal now, but then it was the New Deal. When we started the New Deal the first thing we did was to kill the pigs, to plow under the cotton; then we burned the wheat, and before long you tried to uproot the Supreme Court; then we tried to change Thanksgiving. They would have changed Christmas had it not been that the Lord was born on a certain day and they could not alter that fact. They would have changed the Fourth of July, but they could not do that. Then they went into regulation until at the present time almost everything and everybody in America is regulated. It is about time that the American people woke up. If they do not it will soon be too late.

You not only regulate, you buy by subsidies, you control by edict of the President; you are at war not without the statement of the President of the contrary. Oh, where, oh, where are we going.

God save America from the New Deal. It will wreck us as sure as the sun shines tomorrow if we, the people, do not get rid of them.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE].

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be pardoned for referring to one of the principal witnesses appearing before our committee, Under Secretary of State James E. Webb. He comes from my State, North Carolina. He came to the Government service first as Director of the Budget, leaving behind a record of outstanding accomplishments. He then went to the Department of State, and within recent months he was brought into this particular program. Knowing something about his sound business qualifications and his record in general, it seems to me that we are on safe ground; at least, I can follow his leadership.

Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the remarkable showing of the Export-Import Bank since its creation. The bank has had a remarkable record. It is this organization that will screen applications for the guaranties. Let me refer you to the Ninth Annual Report of the Export-Import Bank. You will find there shown the tremendous amount of money they have lent to foreign countries, corporations, and individuals since 1934. The Export-Import Bank has a statutory limitation of $3,500,000,000. At the present time outstanding loans and undistributed authorizations of the bank total $2,786,000,000. They have at the present time an uncommitted authority of $714,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what interests me about the Export-Import Bank, and this should appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], during the period of operations the profits to the Export-Import Bank after losses and operation costs total $100,000,000.

I would like to point out also, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank appeared before the committee and on page 80 of the hearings he pointed out that private capital has been invested in foreign countries to the extent of $13,000,000,000 and during the last 4 years private capital has gone into these foreign countries to the extent of $4,000,000,000. The argument may be made, Why not let private capital continue to do the job? Taking into consideration the individuals speaking for and advocating this particular legislation it would seem to me that we are on sound ground. If we have faith in foreign countries and in individuals to lend them over $2,000,000,000, then we should have faith in Americans who desire to have a part in this great program of free enterprise.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If we have had that bank established for that number of years, and it has operated since 1934, and there has been borrowed only $100,000,000 from this bank, why is it that they have not borrowed more money?

Mr. DEANE. The gentleman did not understand me correctly. I said that since the Export-Import Bank has been authorized by Congress in 1934 it has shown profits after losses and operations of $100,000,000.

Mr. RICH. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, on page 80 Mr. Herbert E. Gaston, as I mentioned a moment ago, stated that there is invested by private capital throughout the world $13,000,000,000.

I think we can get a very clear understanding of the legislation before the committee by comparing it with the FDIC. The Committee on Banking and Currency, I hope within a very short time, will bring before the Congress an authorization which would increase the insurance of deposits from $5,000 to $10,000. This particular legislation will operate on the same basis. Over the course of a few years the fees that will be paid for these loans which will be made should build up sufficient collateral and accumulated reserve from fees to take care of any particular losses should they occur.

Mr. RICH. What connection has the gains of this Export-Import Bank to the extent of $100,000,000 with the fact that if manufacturers or any business people go over there and invest in foreign countries, in factories, and ship merchandise back into this country, taking the American workingman's job away from him?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, on page 49 of the hearings I find where Mr. Webb, of the State Department, points out that in 1929 the total direct private investment in United States dollars abroad amounted to $7,700,000,000; in 1940, $7,300,000,000; in 1948, $11,300,000,000. Then he says:

> Now you have private interest-bearing investments like bonds and other long- and short-term investments which will bring the total to around $18,000,000,000 or a little above.

That is without any kind of guaranty as set forth here in this bill, which is conclusive evidence that the American businessman, when he is given half a show, will use his own judgment, his own skill, his own knowledge, his own know-how, and go into the foreign markets of the world and invest the savings of the stockholders which he represents. I think that is the best proof that can be found that we do not need this legislation.

Secondly, this bill, H. R. 8083, on page 2, carries a figure of $250,000,000. Two hundred and fifty million dollars would build a purification water plant in a foreign country, and certainly pure water is something the world needs today. Practically every city in the United States is now becoming short of pure water. So we come in here with a $250,000,000 proposal, entirely inadequate for the job in hand.

The facts are that the machinery back of this movement proposes to export from the United States savings of the American people of a maximum of $5,000,000,000 per annum. The philosophy is to the effect that we have reached maturity so far as the expansion of our own industries are concerned, and that there is no longer any need or any great opportunity in the United States for the investment of the liquid savings of our people. To me, such a philosophy is pure poppycock, and I say that because of the fact that we are bringing through the turnstiles of our high schools and universities and colleges every summer a great number of graduates, and at this very moment thousands of them are without a job and have no promise of a job because American industry has not sufficiently expanded here in the United States to provide those jobs for those new graduates. Wars do, of course, make jobs, and we may find these young men will all soon be employed. We should invest equity capital here in the United States at a minimum of $30,000,000,000 per annum. I say "equity capital." I do not say expanded total footings of balance sheets by going out and borrowing the money, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] figured a while ago. He spoke about the great totals of the balance sheets of the corporations of this country. Let me tell you how to raise the totals of your own personal balance sheets. Go down to the bank this afternoon and arrange a loan for $100,000,000, and you immediately write up your own balance sheet $100,000,000, but that does not necessarily increase your net worth. It does not prove anything except that you can get a line of credit. The same gentleman also pointed out the great accumulation of property which our people have brought under their own name in the last few years. How did they accumulate it? It was through the extension of credit. I can increase my property holdings, as I inferred a moment ago, by $100,000,000 if I can find a line of credit to that extent simply by extending my credit and putting in a dollar equity and letting some other fellow furnish the money. What does that prove? That proves great expansion of credit; it proves an inflationary force in the form of credit that is operating. You have some $18,000,000,000 or more in extended installment credit. What does that prove? It proves that if hundreds of thousands of people are called into the war that you will have great difficulty meeting your credit obligations, and legislation will be proposed that we defer installment payments on those obligations.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. What about these veterans, these GI's, that are buying $7,000 homes, paying $48 a month for 25 years?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Sure. Every month I sit in a meeting where these matters are passed upon, and I know what is going on with respect to the extension of credit. Now, where are we to get $5,000,000,000 more to export to other countries and to invest in these countries? We have to take it from the savings of our people.

We take that money for export from the savings of our people. It draws against the limited amount that is being put into the expansion of our own industry. Why is the limited amount so small today? It is because of the double taxation methods we are following, it is because of the uncertainty, the instability with respect to the taxing policies of our own Congress as related to the man who might wish to invest $1,000 or $5,000 or $10,000 in equity capital or risk capital or investment capital, as you might term it.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] has a proposed amendment. I have been studying that amendment. Certainly if this bill is to pass that amendment ought to be adopted, but I am not recommending that the bill pass even if that amendment is adopted. However, if the bill is to be adopted, by all means put in the so-called Cox amendment. Why? Simply because the amendment is designed to have the recipient country guarantee our country against losses under this operation, instead of having the American Government, the taxpayers of the United States, guarantee the investor against losses that might be caused by bad policy on the part of the country which receives the dollar investments put in by our people.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS], if I understood him correctly, and if I did not I wish he would correct this, repeatedly used the words that the guaranty protected the investor against revolution. I see nothing in this bill whatsoever which directly or indirectly guarantees the investor against revolution. It guarantees him with respect to expropriation, confiscation, or seizure by action of public authority. Certainly public authority does not authorize the revolution. Public authority is against the revolution. So I do not understand why the gentleman from Arkansas pointed out repeatedly that the guaranty is against revolution.

Ideology was referred to by one of the speakers. It seems to me the basic constitutional ideology which we have always followed in this country is to the effect that the private investor should carry his own risk, suffer his own losses, if they occur, and benefit by the profits if he has the managerial ability to build profits. I see no reason why we should now get out on the limb where the taxpayers guarantee any private investor against loss in any country, especially in any country where today chaos runs wild and there is much instability on the part of the government.

In peacetime, with the world at peace, this bill might have a little bit of common sense in it, but with the instability which prevails today, with the United States forces, assets and men, scattered all over the world, I certainly see no reason why we should support this bill.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER].

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are considering today is the second part of what has commonly been called the President's point 4 program. It was so labeled because it was the fourth point in his message on the state of the Union.

I should like to call it the point 4 program because this program attempts to accomplish four very important points: First, it will strengthen the United Nations. Second, it will build political democracy. Third, it will expand international trade. And fourth, it will raise the standards of living of the world as well as of this country.

During the war we had what was known as war damage insurance. Point 4 is peacetime insurance. Damage that may be incurred in peacetime is now to be insured providing those who want the insurance will pay for it. This is no give-away program. There is going to be no taxpayers' money used to pay these claims.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I notice this language is used, "to guarantee for an appropriate fee." I wonder if the committee discussed anything at all with reference to what would be an appropriate fee to carry out the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MULTER. There was discussion in the committee on the subject. It was decided that, this being a new program, the committee would have to more or less guess at what the premium or the fee should be. Instead of guessing at that we decided that we should leave it to this trusted agency and its board of directors, who would examine it closely. Therefore, the bill authorizes the bank to impose a fee in the first instance which would be sufficient to carry the insurance and from time to time raise or decrease it in accordance with their experience.

We thought it best in the committee not to try to tie the hands of the bank by saying, "You must charge so much as a fee"; we left it to them in the first instance to fix an appropriate fee large enough to insure the bank against loss.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Did you determine what would be a proper formula for a fee?

Mr. MULTER. No, we did not do that.

Mr. COX. The record of the Export-Import Bank justifies the trust you repose in the bank.

Mr. MULTER. I am glad the gentleman makes that point, because we are in agreement, I think, on both sides of the aisle and certainly we were in agreement in our committee, unanimous agreement, that the Export-Import Bank has done a fine job and is not subject to criticism on any score whatsoever.

Mr. Chairman, who wants this bill? Someone said, I think it was the gentleman from Michigan, that labor does not want this bill, and he tried to paint a picture of labor losing out and being subjected to all sorts of unemployment if we go ahead with this program. If you will refer to the RECORD of May 25 in the Appendix, you will find the expression of all of American labor set forth. They are unanimously in favor of this program.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Are they in favor of the point 4 program, or in favor of this specific proposition?

Mr. MULTER. They are in favor of the entire point 4 program.

Mr. GROSS. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. MULTER. They are in favor of the point 4 program and every part of it which has been already enacted as part of the ECA and they are in favor of this precise bill as we have it now before us.

Mr. GROSS. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. MULTER. It is not an entirely different proposition. I say to you the record shows that labor in this country is in favor of the point 4 program and every facet of it, that which we have already passed and that which we now seek to pass by this bill.

In discussing the world-wide effect of the newly organized International Confederation of Free Trade Unions—ICFTU—David Dubinsky, president, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union A. F. of L., made the following significant statement:

The defense of democracy against the Communist effort of world domination must include military measures. But military security alone is not enough. The ICFTU insists that political liberty, social justice and economic security together form the lifestream of every free nation. Economic help for the underdeveloped countries, and full national freedom for the dependent peoples at the earliest possible moment, are both essential for the defeat of totalitarianism. The paramount prerequisite in the defense of world democracy against communism or any other species of totalitarianism is not piecemeal or temporary recovery, but the integration of the economic life of the free countries into a balanced and sound world economy. The new international considers that the European recovery program and President Truman's point 4 are sound, effective policies, leading to economic integration on a continental and world-wide scale.

Plainly, American trade-unionism occupying a major place in the strongest sector of world economy, has a major part to play in this world-wide campaign.

The United States council of the International Chamber of Commerce has this to say:

The United States council of the ICC, as representatives of businessmen, realizes acutely the relationship between rising living standards throughout the world and the achievement of a stable peace. It welcomes the prospect that private enterprise and private investment can participate on a broad scale in raising standards of living in both underdeveloped and developed areas as a barrier to future wars. It believes that private foreign investments can serve as the means of combining labor, capital, and technology into the cooperative effort essential to accelerated economic development.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. TAURIELLO. If this legislation is adopted, how will it help American labor? In what way will it help American labor?

Mr. MULTER. It will help American labor to the extent of expanding world markets. When you expand world markets, American labor profits thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the good gentleman that he obtain unanimous consent to extend his remarks and that he write into the RECORD some of the sound observations that he made when the bill was under consideration. I have examined the record very carefully, and the gentleman contributed much to the development of the case.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Georgia for his observation. I will follow the gentleman's suggestion because I will not be able to complete all that I would like to say in the 3 minutes remaining to me.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the July 1950 issue of Nation's Business. Certainly nobody can say that does not represent the voice of business, big and little, in this country.

On page 32, I quote to you this sentence from an article which deals entirely with this point 4 program. After quoting from the President's message, setting forth his language on point 4, the author says this:

Here was an idea capable, for at least two reasons, of capturing American imagination and it has, as a matter of fact, received enthusiastic attention from labor, farm, university, church, missionary, and world peace groups.

Now, this is not just a big-business measure. It is not just something to increase international trade. This is intended to implement the program that we have written into legislation in this Congress, setting forth the policy of this Nation as one which seeks a stable peace and indicating that that peace can be brought about only by improving the economic condition of the world.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. It has just been stated that labor has endorsed this bill. One of the Members just said the United States Chamber of Commerce endorsed this bill. May I add to that that Mr. Aldrich, Chairman of the President's National Economic Council Advisory Committee on Financial Problems, said this in the hearings:

There are two great reasons why foreign investments have not been made by private capital. One is the fear of the transfer problem, with which we are all familiar, and the other is the fear of expropriation without immediate and adequate compensation. We have all seen that happen. Obviously the investor should not be guaranteed in any manner against credit risk or against the validity or invalidity of his investment from an economic point of view. The only thing that could possibly be considered would be the political risk.

Mr. MULTER. I thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Georgia, for that very fine observation.

Now, let us understand this once and for all about this bill: This is no giveaway program. We are not going to give away any taxpayer's money. We are building up an insurance fund which will take care of these losses, if and when they occur.

I cannot too strongly emphasize that this bill does not and will not call for the appropriation of any new funds. The Export-Import Bank is now authorized to lend up to $3,500,000,000. This bill will permit $250,000,000 of that sum, to be used for the purpose of guaranteeing investments in underdeveloped areas against losses caused by lack of convertibility of exchange or because of expropriation or confiscation. The premiums paid by the investors for this insurance will be used to pay all losses and to build up a reserve fund which eventually will make it unnecessary to use any part of the money of the bank for this purpose. That is the same procedure that was followed when we set up the insurance fund for savings and deposits in banks and savings associations. The arguments that are being urged in opposition to this bill are the same arguments that we heard in opposition to insuring savings and deposits. The opponents of the bill persist in talking about using taxpayers' money and giving away the taxpayers' money. There is none of that in this bill. This bill is the first step in the direction of cutting down on Government loans to free enterprise. It requires free enterprise to invest its own money and to take all the risks, except the two risks guaranteed against by the bill, and that on the condition that the private investor pay for the insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] has again expired.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 minutes.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I think it is proper that we should come to some conclusion about the hearing on this bill. If you will look at the table of contents, you will find that the witnesses numbered six, altogether—no more. The witnesses representing the Federal Government were the Chairman of the Export-Import Bank, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Webb. These three witnesses then were all persons holding positions in the executive department of our Government. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] appeared before the committee to explain the difference between the committee bill then pending and the bill which he had introduced and which was at that time before the Foreign Affairs Committee. Two other persons appeared, a Mr. Frost from Detroit, of the board of commerce there, and a Mr. Littell, from the American Bar Association, representing some committee of that organization. That was all. If anybody can show me that anyone representing either the CIO or the A. F. of L. or any other labor organization appeared, I want him to speak up now. It was said here a moment ago that testimony was given before the committee by labor organizations. I was present at every minute of the hearings and I know that no representative of any labor organization appeared to testify. Look at the dates when the hearings were held—August 17, 19, 22, 23, and 24—5 days altogether about 11 months ago. I felt the situation was very hush-hush the day we closed the hearings, August 24, 1949. Accordingly, if you will look at page 155 of the hearings you will discover that I asked a question with reference to the scant testimony. This is what I said:

May I make an inquiry? Is not the American Bankers' Association interested in this? And are not the investment bankers interested? Are there no other organizations that have evidenced any interest in this very important matter?

Mr. BROWN, then chairman, inquired:

Have any other witnesses asked to be heard?

The Clerk replied:

Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the other requests. I can check on that, however.

That ended the hearings on August 24, 1949, and there have been no hearings this year. When I opposed the bill before the Committee on Rules last year and again this year, I made the point that this was a matter of very grave importance. It is extremely important, because the bill declares "That it is the policy of the United States," and so on. It is the policy to do what? To go out as economic missionaries to develop economically underdeveloped areas in the world? Nowhere in the bill is there a definition of what is an underdeveloped area. I would like to have some kind of definition as to what an underdeveloped area is.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. Very briefly, but with genuine pleasure.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman not believe that is something he could leave to the discretion of the administrative agency, the Export-Import Bank? Let me say to the gentleman that I have profound respect for him and for his understanding of this whole problem.

Mr. TALLE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COX. He did much in the examination of the whole question; in other words, in testing the validity of the arguments brought to his committee, and I was greatly impressed. The gentleman contributed much to the reasons for the amendment which I drafted and which I brought to the attention of the committee and which I propose to offer.

Mr. TALLE. I am very grateful to the gentleman from Georgia for his comments. I have great admiration for the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Could the gentleman tell me the business connections of one Aldrich, Winthrop Aldrich, I believe, who was profusely quoted a while ago? Can he tell me the business connections of that gentleman?

Mr. TALLE. I am sure my colleague knows the business connections fully as well as I.

But, proceeding, I remember some years ago a very devout Presbyterian, 96 years old at the time, who had a remarkable son who worked out a device whereby he could pour concrete through a sort of movable trough and save a lot of labor. He was so eager to use this device that he wanted to try it on Sunday, but his father said to him: "Son, remember, the world has waited more than two thousand years for this; it can surely wait until tomorrow."

This thing is so important, so very important, and the possibilities of making mistakes are so very great that I believe the bill should be referred back to the committee. We of the Banking and Currency Committee have had no opportunity to examine the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, whom I hold in great esteem. I do not have a closed mind on this bill; perhaps it is a good one, but I want to look at it some more. Specifically I should like to hear testimony from people who are regarded as experts in the field. We certainly have many of them in the United States. Let us take another look at this thing; let us agree on what is meant by such language as an underdeveloped country; let us agree on what is meant by such a term as "an appropriate fee." Is it not clear that we could get into very grave difficulty if we charged one fee to somebody operating in country A, another in country B, and still another fee in another country? In other words, we would set ourselves up as a sort of credit agency and we would be making appraisals as to the business safety of all the countries that might come into the picture.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Would this not be kind of an inopportune time to bring this matter up, considering the condition that the country is in today?

Mr. TALLE. That is exactly what I was coming to next. The world is in such a sad state of affairs that I venture to say no one in the Congress can fully understand its gravity. I am sure I do not for the reason I do not know how matters stand in Korea right now. This is a very poor time to do this. I think we can afford to wait.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I agree that most things are keyed to Korea and because of that fact is it not all the more important that we act upon this now than it would be if the world were at peace, because it indicates a trust and a confidence for people in the underdeveloped areas of the world whose friendship we need very badly?

Mr. TALLE. That may be true. I may be wrong in what I say, but I confess to you that I have given a lot of time to this subject. I still want to know something more before I vote for it. I do not want to make a mistake in an important matter of this kind if I can possibly avoid it. The committee should take a look at the bill again. I certainly would be very happy to examine carefully the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three additional minutes.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Following the observation of our good friend from Georgia [Mr. Cox] in reference to desiring the friendship of the peoples of the world, we lavished about $12,000,000,000 on Russia because we thought we needed her friendship, only to be served as we have since World War II.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. In connection with the uncertainties found in this bill, I wonder if the gentleman has thought about the phraseology contained in line 7, page 2, where it is stated that the insurance will guarantee the conversion of foreign currency derived from an investment. Does the gentleman know what that means? Does it mean profits? If so, does it mean net profits? If so, who shall determine the net profits and how shall the profits be determined?

Mr. TALLE. That language has troubled me, too. In other words, there are so many questions raised in my mind with reference to this proposal that I must recommend recommittal of the bill.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TALLE. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HORAN. Did I hear the gentleman correctly when he said on this important matter the Committee on Banking and Currency had no hearings for almost a solid year?

Mr. TALLE. We have had no public hearings since the 24th of August 1949, the day they closed. Prior to that time we had hearings for 4 days. There have been no hearings since.

Mr. HORAN. For almost 11 months?

Mr. TALLE. Since August 24, 1949.

Mr. HORAN. Does not the gentleman feel that the economy and the politics of the world have changed since then?

Mr. TALLE. I am very sure many changes have occurred. These investments cannot, in my opinion, succeed unless there is a favorable climate for them and there will not be a favorable climate for them unless there is a burning desire for them on the part of the people in any particular country, a burning desire shown through their eagerness for actually wanting the investments made.

Furthermore such investments cannot succeed unless they are made in countries that have stable governments. Our world is in a bad way. The residual creditor, the man who must pay if the investments prove to be bad, is the American taxpayer.

Mr. Chairman, I urge that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency for further study.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Chairman, I should like to address myself for a few moments to one aspect of H. R. 8083 which seems to me is not as clearly understood as it should be. I hear it said by many people who have not studied the bill carefully that the guaranty program is just another grant-in-aid and that the United States Government is going to take all the risk out of foreign investment. This is a most mistaken notion.

Let us examine more carefully just what the guaranties are and how they can be managed as a sound business and banking operation. Let us be perfectly clear at the outset. They do not guarantee the American investor against loss. The American investor must bear all the risks he always takes in making an investment, including all the vagaries of a business operation, the risk of fluctuation in the rate of foreign exchange and various other risks stemming from the locality of the investment project. In other words, the American investor can purchase the guaranty provided in this bill and by the exercise of poor business judgment, inefficiency, or just poor luck completely lose his capital.

Essentially, all that this bill provides is just two things. First the American investor is guaranteed that he can convert foreign currency into dollars. This assures him that he can convert a reasonable profit into dollars and that he can sell or liquidate his business and get dollars in return. Second, if his property is expropriated without due recompense, or if his property is seized by action of public authority, he can be guaranteed the fair value of his capital in dollars. All other risks the investor must take himself.

For this guaranty the investor must pay an appropriate fee. The fee is intended to be sufficient to cover all administrative expenses of the program and such losses as the bank may incur in those cases in which the bank is unable, at a later date, to recover from the government of the country concerned any dollars the bank advanced to an investor in accordance with the guaranty. The Export-Import Bank has already demonstrated its ability to manage a self-liquidating program on a much larger scale. We may count upon it to develop management policies concerning guaranties which would be equally effective.

Fear of loss from inconvertibility or from delay in conversion is, perhaps, the greatest single deterrent to foreign investment under present conditions, although actual losses in the past from such occurrences have been small. If this program is managed with good judgment, losses in the future should be small. The bank may be required to pay out dollars against its guaranties to an appreciable extent, but the bank should recover all but a fraction of such payments from the foreign country itself at later dates. Fees charged on the guaranties are intended to cover such residual losses. Let us examine in more detail how this would work.

In the first place, the bank would only guarantee productive investments, that is, investments in such projects as may be expected to add materially to the productive capacity of the foreign country, with special emphasis on that country's ability to earn dollars or other currency exchangeable into dollars. The investment projects themselves, therefore, should help make it possible for the foreign country to provide the dollars for recovery of the investment and reasonable profits thereon.

In the second place, before extending any specific guaranty, the bank will certainly take into consideration the foreign country's present dollar exchange position and its future prospects in regard thereto. The bank may be expected to refuse guaranty proposals beyond the judged capacity of the foreign country to service such investments.

In the third place, however, let us suppose the investor has received a guaranty, that he earns a profit, but then he has been refused dollars in the foreign country for conversion of his foreign currency and that the bank is called upon to pay him in dollars and take over foreign exchange for its own account. What are the bank's chances now? The bank has stated it will not seek priority in payment for the dollar-exchange obligation so owed to it, in order that there may be no discrimination against existing investment. However, the bank could be expected to make appropriate arrangements with the foreign government by which the bank's dollar obligation would be recognized. Therefore, there may be delay in payment, but the bank in most instances would be repaid eventually. It may be that in some cases the bank could make arrangements of this kind with the borrowing country, as a prerequisite to the entrance of American capital. Finally, the reserve provided by the fees from investors is intended to be adequate to cover the residual losses as well as administrative expenses to make the program self-liquidating.

The bank now collects annually from $150,000,000 to $250,000,000 as serial loan repayments and some $50,000,000 of interest Out of $2,250,000,000 outstanding, less than $300,000 is in default, and less than one to two million is late in remittance in any one year. There is no reason to expect that experience on the guaranty program would be substantially different.

Let me put the services rendered by the guaranty bill to you in a little different, but in a more simple and summary fashion. By means of self-supporting, self-liquidating, sound business and banking plan, American private capital can enter the underdeveloped areas as though such areas were hard-currency areas. Private capital would measure its risks more or less in the same terms as it would measure its risks in entering a hard-currency area. In effect, this bill would come close to eliminating the soft-currency risk. If we can surmount the soft-currency difficulty, we may be well on our way in finding in this experimental program part of the answer to our foreign financial problem.

There is not much time. I ask of you all that this bill be passed without further delay. Let there be no partisanship. This is a measure for the welfare of all Americans, regardless of party and for the victory of the free world.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINNON].

Mr. MCKINNON. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me in this discussion of the last hour or two that we have lost the objective of the bill in a confusion of the details. We can all agree that there are a lot of little things you can find wrong with the bill. But the thing we want to look after is the over-all objective of where we are trying to go with this legislation. If a little genie from the Arabian Nights came before you this afternoon and asked you, "What do you want? I will give you anything your heart desires," I think practically every Member of Congress would ask for a free and peaceful world. I think all of us would rather have a free and peaceful world than almost anything else in this world of ours. Well, point 4 is legislation tending along that line. We talk of an arms race today in terms of tanks, airplanes, submarines, and things like that, but that is not the real arms race that we have in the world today. We have millions of people in this world of ours who are looking for a little more to eat, for some clothing to wear, for some security, for some relief from their sickness. It is a race to determine whether free enterprise or communism is going to supply this world with a better living standard. It is surprising to me that so many people to the left of this aisle are selling free enterprise short, because free enterprise is certainly something that created a better living standard for us. It can offset the argument of communism and can produce for millions of people who are now doing without food, doing without medicine and the other things which are necessary to create a good living standard. Now, if we are going to develop a better world and develop peace, the only way we can do that is to implement our program of free enterprise so that the rest of the world can know how free enterprise and political democracy create better living standards.

On the matter of costs and our ability to afford a point 4 program, I was very much interested in an article that appeared in the Sunday Star this week. The article points out the inroads that we are making in Europe in offsetting communism by creating more stable systems of government and a better living standard for the people. To quote some of the article:

> Communists in the Ruhr polled only 5.5 percent of the votes in an election this month, compared with 14 percent in 1947.
>
> Belgium: In elections there early in June only 10 Communists won seats in the national legislature. Before the election they had held 17 seats. In the 1946 election they won 23 seats.
>
> In Italy, where there was a great upsurge of communism after the war, the party has been losing ground since the election in April 1948, when they were badly defeated.
>
> In Norway last October the Communists lost all of their 11 seats in parliament.
>
> In Sweden the Communists lost 7 of their 18 seats in the 1948 election.
>
> In Denmark, in municipal elections last February, Communists got only 4 percent of the total vote.
> In Great Britain's recent election the two Communist members of the House of Commons lost their seats.

Every country that has benefited from the Marshall plan has pushed communism out, and democracy and free enterprise have come in. It has cost us some money to do that, but nowhere near the money it would cost our country to create a big army and a big air force. We have received value for our ECA expenditures in Europe, and if we use point 4 in the Orient we will get value there, too.

Our need for a better living standard throughout the world is comparable right now with the need we had right after the war for more homes. We expanded the FHA and created a favorable climate so that private enterprise, and not the Government, could go in and build new homes for thousands and thousands of families who needed them. What we did through free enterprise, through FHA, is very comparable to what we are doing in point 4, in guaranteeing private investors abroad. We are not giving anything away. What we are doing primarily is to open up an FHA type of insurance for foreign investors abroad. To be sure, there is some difference between the two programs, but the basic point is almost the same: that we are creating a favorable climate, guaranteeing against expropriations or confiscations abroad so that private enterprise can move out with strength and security to show what private enterprise can mean in creating a better living standard throughout the world. That is what point 4 legislation is intended to do. It does not give away anything and does not rob anybody. It creates only freedom and peace in this world, and that is what the whole world is hungry for.

We might win the armament race, we might win in Korea, which we intend to do, but until we can prove with action and not words that the American system produces higher living standards we are still going to be fighting a foreign ism. Improving the living standards of backward countries is the real war in this world of ours. It is the real arms race. It is one that we can win, and which will win for us our goal of world peace.

We have seen what a value ECA has been in pushing back communism in Europe; point 4 can do a similar job in backward areas.

This is the best bargain we can buy, for the program should be self-sustaining, just as FHA has been self-sustaining. It is a reaffirmation of free enterprise and political democracy. It is a positive step toward a free and peaceful world.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, this bill certainly ought to be recommitted.

I was for guaranties in the ECA law, the Marshall-plan program, where the alternative was either give away money or guaranteed private investments which had been determined to add to the recovery program in Europe. That is quite different from guaranteeing private investments all over the world, as provided in this bill. Where the choice is between grants and guaranties, I am for guaranties. Where the choice is between Government guaranties and private investment, I am against guaranties.

This bill will never get through the other end of the Capitol this year. We incorporated a broader guaranty provision in the ECA extension bill this year, but in the course of doing it we found in conference that the other body takes an exceedingly dim view of guaranties of any kind. Passing this bill, if it is passed today, is purely shadow boxing, simply conducting a debating society, because it is perfectly clear that the other body would not touch this thing with a 10-foot pole during the present session. This is why we are just talking and fiddling around here. That is another reason why this bill should go back to the committee.

There is an amendment of tremendous scope, perhaps, to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] which could well be studied in committee, but certainly cannot be intelligently considered here on the floor.

Here is another reason why I oppose the bill at this time: On July 5, 1949, the House passed the International Claims Settlement Act, which was a bill setting up a permanent commission to take care of expropriation cases. I opposed this bill and almost defeated it. It was primarily to take care of the case of Yugoslavia; we held about $45,000,000 in Yugoslav gold and there were $40,000,000 of American claims arising out of Yugoslav expropriation, and we let all the gold go except $17,000,000. This Claims Settlement Act set up a Commission to pay off those people. If these American investments in Yugoslavia had been guaranteed under today's bill, we would have the United States Treasury paying out the full amount of the losses by expropriation, and then collecting back about 40 cents on the dollar under the Claims Settlement Act.

This present proposition is half-baked. No provision is made for what we will do in the case of expropriation in the iron-curtain countries. As to those countries we have set up a policy, which I opposed, of making en bloc settlements with these governments, as with Yugoslavia. And the fact that we have that policy will be an invitation to the nations all over the world to expropriate American property and then make wholesale cheap settlements. At the same time we are starting out on a new pattern here of guaranties against expropriation. Unless and until we can have this thing jell, and arrive at a consistent policy, this bill might well have further consideration—I would say consideration running into 1951—by this able committee.

The language which is proposed by the present bill includes losses from seizure by action of public authority, any old seizure. We are going to have to cover three things; the first two, expropriation or confiscation, would be at least actions with some color of authority. But you are by this bill going to get a third thing, and that is simple seizure. All over the world, when any public authority, and that might be a township official or the mayor or a police officer, whenever all over the world such a public official seizes something, although it might be without any color of authority, if he physically takes possession of it, then a claim would arise under this guaranty.

I am one of those who believes in the future there is prospect for vast investment possibilities by Americans all over the world which will benefit our country and benefit other nations. That prospect is not right now. That prospect does not depend upon Government guaranties.

I have been asked on the floor this afternoon, "Didn't your committee bring out point 4 legislation?" The answer is, "Yes; we did." "Well, didn't the President ask for this in his speech on point 4?" "Yes; he did." But our committee has not considered guaranties in connection with point 4. What we brought out, and what was adopted was technical assistance, which is not a new thing but something we have been doing for years, particularly under a bill passed by the Eightieth Congress. For this authorized $35,000,000, of which $25,000,000 will be new authorization for the purpose of technical assistance under point 4. We also incorporated in the point 4 bill the language agreed to by the State Department and a score of business organizations in conferences arranged by Mr. HERTER, to provide the climate needed to encourage private investment. Thus this House has already authorized technical assistance and encouraged private investment, under point 4. Guaranties are not needed, and not asked for by prospective investors.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. HORAN. Much has been said about raising the standards of living in other countries. I am very much in favor of that because that would really be progress. But is there anything in this bill which guarantees that the living standards of the working classes in other countries will be raised?

Mr. VORYS. No, there is not. The provisions in the House version of the point 4 bill which were headed in that direction were cut out in conference. I think that is one of the things we should consider. But when it came to a test, that language was cut out. It seems to me this is just no time at all to be going into something like this. Our Committee on Foreign Affairs this afternoon voted out unanimously a military-aid bill which will come to the floor early next week and which I hope you will support, which will place a burden of over a billion dollars on the taxpayers of the United States.

We should concentrate on some of the military problems which we face. We can well afford to let this half-baked guaranty idea get cooked a little more thoroughly by this committee before we attempt to enact it.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish we did have the time to laze around as scholars on a summer's cruise, as has been suggested by the learned and distinguished gentlemen from the other side of the aisle.

But unfortunately we do not have the time. At this very hour our fellow Americans in uniform are facing hostile fire. The war between communism and the free enterprise of the democracies has reached the shooting stage. There is not time to put on the slippers and read the books and philosophically ponder over what we should do next year or what we should do in the next century.

I respectfully suggest to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that the mothers and fathers of America want something more than a put-on-the-slippers-and-get-out-the-pipe approach to the problem of preventing the war already started from developing into a conflagration that might consume their sons.

I was heartened by the statement of the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that the measure now before us is one of the most constructive legislative proposals that has come to this floor during the long period of his service here. I am in complete accord with the thought of the gentleman in that regard. The point 4 program is the most promising program of international mutual helpfulness that has ever been proposed for the universal betterment of mankind by a nation with the power and the responsibility of world leadership. It is the bright light in an otherwise dark night.

It would seem to me self-evident that with the international situation we are now facing requiring the best of our thought and the maximum of our patriotic devotion, our deliberation on the bill before us should be conducted in a strictly bipartisan spirit. There is a direct connection between the war in Korea and the bill to authorize Export-Import Bank guaranties of the United States private capital invested abroad.

We owe it to the country and to posterity, and certainly to our fellow Americans in uniform who heroically are holding the lines against hostile fire in a foreign land, to examine closely into this phase. But our approach must be that of Americans and not of Democrats and Republicans. Party lines end when the fate of democracy and the security of our country depend upon the solidarity of the front of unity.

We are now at war, and none has the wisdom to know how long or how short will be the conflict, or how extended or expanded will be the theater of action. We have exercised patience under great provocation. We have made sacrifice of many of our own comforts to give abundantly of our means to rebuild a world shattered by a war not of our desire or of our making. We have sought nothing for ourselves except the contentment of living at peace and in good will in a world of contentment. Come what will, the American conscience is clean.

It is vitally important that the point 4 program should be understood by our own people and by the peoples of other lands. The disadvantage we are now meeting in the Orient stems from a confusion in the minds of people there that our program for world betterment is along the lines of the imperialism of the British Empire and other European countries in the period antedating World War II.

What we are trying, under our point 4 program, is merely the application on a world scale of what was done most successfully in the development of our own United States. The capital and the know-how of the older communities on the seaboard went into the development of the Midwest and then to the far West. As the productivity and purchasing power of these new areas were expanded, the industries in the older communities from which the original capital and know-how came benefited from greatly broadened markets.

Under the point 4 program, we are going into foreign areas with our capital and our know-how, and there are no benefits that can come to us until first we have bestowed benefits upon the countries to which we have contributed our capital and our know-how. It is a program for assuring permanent peace, not by fighting other men into submission, but by helping them destroy in their own respective countries the blight of poverty which is the germ bed of discontent and of war.

There is nothing of exploitation in the point 4 program. There is where the emphasis must be placed. Imperialism and exploitation of weaker nations ended with American ascension to world leadership. When the men and women of the Orient, as well as other distressed areas, learn that under the point 4 program we really are partners with them in a joint undertaking to erase poverty everywhere, benefiting ourselves only as we give benefit to them, we may be sure that we will have their friendship and their cooperation in the fullest measure.

The point 4 program is our answer to the charge of the Soviet that we are the successors to the British imperialism of old. British imperialism had as its base exploitation and our troubles today and our lack of understanding in the Orient stem from the practices that the people in the Orient suffered under that imperialism.

To win the conflict which we are now waging to maintain under democratic and representative governments the dignity and the freedom of man we must receive as well as earn the whole-hearted confidence of people everywhere. The point 4 program is the road to such universal confidence. Give us 10 years of peace for its development and the happy day of man's liberation from the chains of wars will have arrived.

To defeat this bill today will be equivalent to saying to the people of Korea, of China, of India, of all other countries now distressed for lack of sufficient food, "See, what the Soviet Union has told us is true; even this blueprint of a world without poverty, a world in which there will be food even for us, the Congress of the United States has scrapped."

When you throw the point 4 program out of the window, you leave the United States with the responsibility and the burden of world leadership and no plan.

Considering the welfare of our own people, as well as that of others, the scrapping or the crippling of the point 4 program would be inexcusable. We all know that in the United States our industries, because of the great development of machinery can produce very, very much more than we can consume, and we must build new markets; we must have people all over the world who have the money to buy the products of our factories. So, under point 4, we are going into those lands, helping them develop, helping through money loaned on good security—not giving away billions of dollars, as carelessly has been suggested, but merely making loans that conservative bankers determine are soundly secured and will inure to the economic benefit of the areas where used.

The Export-Import Bank in a recent loan in South America made possible the opening up of 500 miles of rich territory that at the present time is not even surveyed. And as those rich lands are made accessible, factories and mills will spring up, and the peoples in that section who are now poverty stricken, will have the money with which to buy the products of our factories.

The bill before us authorizes the Export-Import Bank to give to private American investors, for an adequate fee, a guaranty against loss of their money and property from inability to convert foreign exchanges into American money, and from confiscation and the like. These are unusual risks, and they are not such risks as capital should be required to take unless it has available some way of assuring itself against such risks. All that we are doing by this bill is to furnish an insurance against these unusual risks, and which can be obtained by those desiring such insurance by paying therefor a fee, exactly as money invested in improved real estate is secured against fire loss by the payment of premiums on fire insurance. It is just that simple.

I would not suggest or imply lack of sincerity on the part of any of my colleagues. I know that every Member of this House is motivated solely by the desire to advance the best interests of this Nation and the welfare of its people according to his own sincere convictions. But I am left in bewilderment when those on the other side of the aisle who always are crying out that someone is stepping on the toes of private industry have so suddenly changed front. They are perfectly willing to let the Export-Import Bank continue to operate with Government money, but when this administration, as usual the best friend of capital as well as the tried and true friend of labor, wishes to encourage private industry to take over, they turn the other way and leave poor private industry waiting at the church.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I do not know that I can cover it adequately in 2 minutes, but there is another phase in which I am vitally interested.

In my boyhood background was an experience in Central America when ill will against our people was being fomented because back of the investment of our dollars and British pounds was the military and naval force of our Government and of the British Government. It goes back a long way and is too lengthy a story to tell in 2 minutes. Then came Franklin Delano Roosevelt with his policy of the good neighbor and developed in the Americas a feeling of solidarity, a feeling of real friendship and real understanding. We abandoned the big stick as the symbol of our relations and substituted therefor the cordial handclasp of sincere and mutally respecting friends. We must never return to the big stick. On that the mind of the American people is fixed and determined.

As it was my privilege to develop at the public hearings before our comittee, the guaranties authorized by this bill can be interpreted, if not as guaranties of the stability of existing foreign governments, certainly as guaranties against losses incident to the instability of existing foreign governments. This raises the suggestion that the authorization of such guaranties might operate to bring about an interference by the United States in the domestic affairs of foreign nations. This certainly the American people would not want, and most assuredly if any such tendency should develop even in the slightest degree, the very purpose of the point 4 program would be destroyed and we would lose both the respect and the good will of other people.

I am happy to say that your committee, at its public hearings on this bill, explored most thoroughly this phase, and as a result of the examination by the members of the committee of Secretary Snyder and Mr. Webb, the Under Secretary of State, as well as Chairman Gaston, there was submitted by Mr. Webb and inserted in the record of the public hearings on page 56, the clarifying statement which I am sure will be satisfactory to those who otherwise might have been fearful that the giving of guaranties on foreign loans might eventually develop an interference in the domestic affairs of other nations. The testimony on this point of Secretary Snyder will be found on pages 24 and 25 of the record, of Under Secretary Webb on pages 55 to 57, and of Chairman Gaston on pages 71 to 74, inclusive.

I would say that too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the statement from the State Department submitted by Mr. Webb. The substance is that by the authorization of the proposed guaranties we are reducing to the minimum the danger of foreign loans and investments provoking an ultimate interference in the domestic affairs of other peoples in an effort to protect the loans and investments. When we insure against risks peculiar to foreign loans we look for reimbursement for our losses to the instrumentality to which we pay our insurance premiums, exactly as in the case of fire insurance, and the recourse is not to demand, as too often in the past was the case, upon the Government to step in.

Mr. Chairman, America, unafraid, and with the strength of a clean conscience and purity of purpose, goes forward in the brave and noble war it has declared, not upon the nations and upon peoples, but upon that poverty everywhere which is the real cause of wars. The quick passing of this bill, I trust by a large and convincing majority, will be a victory for permanent peace and the establishment of the brotherhood of man on an ever greater height.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was being debated under the rule my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. COX], whom I do not see on the floor at this moment, alluded to the testimony which I gave before the committee about a year ago when this bill was under consideration. He then made the statement that I was in favor of this bill, in the testimony that I had given. I have had an opportunity to review every word of what I said before the committee at that time and can find nothing which would substantiate that statement. I find on page 127 of the hearings this statement. I am now reading from the testimony I gave on August 23, 1949:

If point 4 is to become a reality with the aid of private capital, I am convinced that our Government has got to make it absolutely clear to these nations that there is no Christmas tree waiting to be shaken; that from here on out the relationships of our country to those countries will be those of friends who are operating on a business-like basis. I am convinced that that can be done provided it is made clear enough that that is the intent of the United States Government. But if we begin by passing an act such as the one which is now before you, I am very fearful that these conditions that would create a climate favorable to the investment of private capital will never be brought about; that we will be, in fact, saying to the nations of the world "It is more important for us to invest in your country than it is for your country to be developed through private capital that might be invested in your country. We are going to take all of the risks through guaranties; we are going to control what goes into your country and what does not go into your country through this form of governmental intervention," because that is what this form of guaranty actually amounts to; in the long run it being a Government obligation in the event of default on private capital, and by doing that we are at once lifting a great load of responsibilities from those countries themselves. But to begin with as complete a guaranty as this, I think is starting at the wrong end.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. VORYS. The so-called "climate language" which would really encourage private investment, the sort of climate desired by American investing concerns, was drafted by the gentleman and put in the so-called point 4 bill; is not that correct?

Mr. HERTER. That is part of the law today under the point 4 bill, the so-called technical assistance bill, which to my mind is infinitely more important than the one now before us.

Mr. VORYS. This Congress, therefore, has already acted to put into law what is really needed by those with money to invest.

Mr. HERTER. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, the question that presents itself to me is, why in the consideration of a bill like this that is in the rarefied stratosphere of international relations that is just as much for the purposes of international peace and the preservation of our institutions as is the Marshall plan should it be made a partisan matter? I do not believe there is any difference in the patriotism of the Members of Congress, but it does seem strange to me that at times thought of political advancement may cloud some of our minds. I see nothing in this bill of a partisan nature and I do not see how it can be made a partisan measure. I do not think any of the political parties have ever had a platform plank that was against the purposes of this bill. Why is it that on the left side of the aisle it has not received a single word of praise? That is inconceivable to me.

Is it because the President wants it? God knows, he has enough responsibility on him. God knows, he must want peace in the world. The responsibility he carries is enough to break a strong man. He wants this because he thinks it may inure to the peace of the world. I am convinced this is the better way to produce peace than giving or lending money.

I believe that if we establish American industries in lands that do not know the American people or the honor of American businessmen it will create more good feeling, more friendship, than any other method.

Then there is talk about the great drain it will be on the Treasury of the United States. There will be no drain on the Treasury. Every guaranty we make is for an appropriate fee. The Government of the United States when it has embarked on this character of activity has been singularly successful. We heard before in connection with the other bill that it would take billions of dollars. This cannot take more than $250,000,000 and that will be as the result of an adequate fee. It is insurance.

The Government is not going out to look for people to take it. The businessmen are coming to the Export-Import Bank and saying:

"We want to invest in this country. Will you insure us against a limited liability of inconvertibility, expropriation, confiscation and seizure?"

That is the limitation and it is plainly written in the bill. It is not against business losses. It is not against revolution unless revolution would take over the country and by act of public authority seize or expropriate the property. It is a limited liability, a liability that I think the Government can well afford to take in order to accomplish the results that we want to accomplish in this respect.

It may do more than that. It may bring back to our country wealth. It will tap unknown sources of wealth. It may make up something of the wastage of war and it will do that for American industry. Where is there any danger to this country in embarking upon this limited adventure in a new field?

I cannot understand the zeal and the heat that have been shown against this bill. I cannot understand why it is all coming from one source. I know that you are patriotic. Our boys fight together. Politics makes no difference to them. But sometimes it seems when a bill comes to Congress the political equation is pretty strong. I think it must be strong in this case.

Mr. Chairman, this has been one of the points the President has fought for because the President knows his responsibility and the President today, I know, feels a deep apprehension over the conditions in the world. He feels a deep responsibility which he has shouldered and which must be something to him. He says he wants this bill. I ask those on this side of the aisle if we are going to make a political issue out of it to vote for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the policy of the United States, in the interest of its people as well as that of other peoples, to promote the development of economically underdeveloped areas of the world. It is the objective of this act to further this policy by encouraging productive investment in such areas. To this end section 2 (a) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended (59 Stat. 526, 666; 61 Stat. 130), is hereby amended by inserting after the words "to borrow and to lend money;" the words "to guarantee for an appropriate fee United States private capital invested in productive enterprises abroad which contribute to economic development in foreign countries by assuring either or both (i) the conversion into United States dollars of foreign currency derived from an investment and (ii) compensation in United States dollars for loss resulting from expropriation, confiscation or seizure by action of public authority: Provided, however, That the aggregate amount of such guaranties at any one time outstanding shall not exceed $250,000,000."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "guarantee", insert "for an appropriate fee."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Cox: Page 2, after line 11, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. The Export-Import Bank of Washington (hereinafter referred to as the "Bank") shall not, pursuant to the amendments made by the first section of this act, make any guaranty with respect to the investment of private capital in an enterprise in a foreign country, unless there is in effect between such foreign country and the United States a treaty or treaties, agreement or agreements, containing the following provisions:

"(1) A provision which, in the opinion of the board of directors of the bank, adequately protects nationals of the United States against discriminatory and unduly burdensome measures and measures which unduly restrict the right of nationals of the United States to own, manage, and operate business enterprises within such foreign country.

"(2) A provision which in the opinion of the board of directors of the bank, assures nationals of the United States that just compensation will be promptly paid to them if the government of such foreign country, or other public authority thereon; (a) expropriates, confiscates, or seizes their business enterprise or any of their property, (b) deprives them of normal control over their business enterprise or any of their property, (c) imposes restrictions or charges on their business enterprise or any of their property (even though on a nondiscriminatory basis) to such extent as to deprive them of any substantial beneficial interest therein, or (d) destroys or substantially impairs the value of their business enterprise or any of their property by engaging in competition with such nationals either directly or through a corporate instrumentality.

"(3) A provision which, in the opinion of the board of directors of the bank, assures nationals of the United States that, subject only to the essential needs of such foreign country, such nationals will have the right (a) to convert into United States dollars an appropriate share of any currency of such foreign country received in connection with investments in such country, (b) to convert into United States dollars any currency of such foreign country constituting the just compensation described in paragraph (2), and (c) to transfer out of such foreign country all such United States dollars."

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, we have examined the amendment and we accept it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I do not know what the gentleman from Kentucky means when he says "we accept it." The committee has not accepted it. I think there should be at least some debate on what it means and what it will do before we accept it. I presume the gentleman from Kentucky was using the editorial "we" when he said that.

Mr. SPENCE. I was. I personally accepted it, and most of the members on this side with whom I have had the opportunity to discuss it accept it. I did not mean that the committee had accepted it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I want to be heard on this, but I have no objection to taking my seat and letting the gentleman from Georgia be recognized to explain the amendment, and I shall rise in opposition to it later on, if that is proper under the parliamentary procedure.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia be permitted to explain his amendment, the gentleman from Michigan then to be allowed to rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to recognition in support of his amendment in his own right if he seeks it. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield the floor?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition on the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks for itself. It simply undertakes to write into the legislation the safeguards about which the gentlemen opposed to the bill have been speaking, the so-called safeguards which the Secretary of the Treasury, the Under Secretary of State, and other witnesses appearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency on this bill discussed.

There was a thought on the part of the committee originally, as I understand, that these questions might be left to the discretion of the Export-Import Bank. Still, there were those who felt that since witnesses advocating the adoption of the measure favored the observance of these safeguards they ought to be written into the bill. So the amendment I have offered and which is now before the committee is one that was drafted having in mind the objections raised by members of the committee and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER], who appeared before the committee, as they were developed in the discussion in the committee while the bill was under consideration.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. As I have observed the gentleman's amendment, I think probably it would make the bill more palatable than it is now, but may I make this inquiry of the gentleman. In subsection 2 the gentleman has a provision to the effect that a treaty shall first be made which assures nationals of the United States that just compensation will be promptly paid on the happening of certain things. What assurance can the gentleman give us that any given government in power at any particular time, or it might be a different government, would live up to that provision?

Mr. COX. I cannot give the gentleman the assurance that the governments of the countries where our investors might go will be able to make good on their guaranty. What is proposed here is that this Government expresses the faith that they will make good, that to the fullest extent of their ability they will undertake to make good. All you are doing is adding an inducement to our people who have idle money to put to work in foreign fields.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUCAS. Stating it simply, is it not asking the other countries also to go on the note with us?

Mr. COX. The other country does guarantee it. It in effect means that they do identically the same thing we are doing by the guaranty.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. As I remember the language of the amendment, does it not preclude the country with whom a treaty would be entered into from going into a comparable business?

Mr. COX. It is all in the interest of protecting our investor, our national, who goes into the foreign field.

Mr. YATES. Suppose you have an American power company, for instance, going into a foreign country. Would not the gentleman's amendment preclude that country from having something in the nature of a TVA?

Mr. COX. The amendment would preclude the other country from setting up competition with the view and aim of destroying the investment of our own nation, and that is all.

Mr. YATES. Then the gentleman feels it may set up such an authority; however, it will be supplemental to it, and not in direct competition?

Mr. COX. Yes. In other words, we are not trying to shape the economy of any people on the face of the globe. We are simply saying to our people who have money they want to invest in a foreign field, "You may make it under the guaranty of the government where the investment is to be made that you be treated fairly." That is all.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand the committee amendment which was read in connection with the gentleman's amendment, the insurance premium would be sufficiently high to meet any loss?

Mr. COX. Of course. We must have faith in the Export-Import Bank, and I think the record made by that bank justifies the faith which is reposed in it. The Bank in its discretion would have to fix the rate which would be charged the investor.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It would have to fix the rate or charge which would be made for insuring the loan?

Mr. COX. That is right.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot believe there is the slightest chance of the Government incurring the loss of a penny in embarking upon this sort of an enterprise.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in respect to the colloquy which has just taken place between the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Ohio, the committee amendment provided that they would insure these investments for an appropriate fee. Of course, it would have been a very simple matter for the committee to have framed language interpreting what an appropriate fee is: Is it to be a fee which will build up a reserve? Is there any authority for the building up of a reserve out of those fees against these losses? The bill is absolutely silent in that respect. The committee report merely suggests that they take into consideration the guaranty to the investor as well as the liability assumed by the bank. That does not have the effect of law, however. That was an afterthought as well as all the language from line 5 through 11, which was also an afterthought in this bill.

In order to get the intent of this program, we must refer to H. R. 5594 which was introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of our committee, and which bill was referred to the committee on July 12, 1949. That bill provides as follows:

It is the objective of this act to further this policy—

After stating the policy—

by encouraging productive investment in such areas. To this end section 2 (a) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended (59 Stat. 526, 666; 61 Stat. 130), is hereby amended by inserting after the words "to borrow and to lend money;" the words "to guarantee United States private capital invested in productive enterprises abroad which contribute to economic development in foreign countries against risks peculiar to such investments."

That was the original purpose of the sponsors of this legislation. This is an administration bill and came to us as an administration bill. That is the purpose, therefore, behind this program—broadly, to insure American investments abroad. Then the committee in its wisdom added these so-called safeguards, that they be in respect only to losses incident to expropriation, confiscation, seizure, and convertibility.

Now the gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment which will further limit the operation of the program and says that there must, before it can guarantee these investments, be certain assurances and conditions precedent to the granting of the insurance. The first among which is that there shall be no interference in the operation, management, and ownership of the enterprise abroad. Of course, that means that in all investments of American capital in utilities in Great Britain and in South American utilities and South American mines and in many European and perhaps Asiatic industries, this cannot apply, because under their operation many of them are leased with certain agreements, so that the fee remains in the country, or a company of nationals of that country, or the property is owned, the natural resource, which is being exploited with American capital, is owned by the country, as in the case of some of the South American republics. So, of course, if we put that provision in there, then American capital cannot aid in these distressed countries in any enterprise where the enterprise is primarily or partly owned by the Government or by nationals of that Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may continue for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. COX. There is nothing in the bill that precludes the possibility of a joint operation or a mixing. It might be better that there be no mixing, but there is nothing in the bill that precludes mixing.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say I have great confidence in the gentleman from Georgia, in his judgment, and I have always, and I hope I always shall respect his opinions, legislatively and otherwise. I might say that since my service in Congress the gentleman from Georgia has, in many instances, served as my legislative and sometimes my moral mentor.

Mr. COX. And I return the compliment. I quite frequently rely upon the gentleman's opinion for my legislative behavior on the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And I thank the gentleman for that. I am simply bringing out some possibilities in respect to his amendment.

Section 2 provides for the ready convertibility into dollars of the foreign currencies which are received in the operation of the industries, and guarantees against that by treaty or agreement. One of the outstanding examples of the attempts to protect American nationals and the American Government from losses through failure of the convertibility machinery, either on the policy level or below that, was the British-loan agreement. And I want at this time to apologize to this House for the part which I took in getting that British-loan agreement through. I think it is one of the biggest sell-outs that the American people have ever experienced. We agreed, and it was because of that agreement in the British-loan agreement, that dollars would be readily convertible into pounds and pounds into dollars, and the consideration of that was nearly $3,000,000,000 of American money, I felt it was well invested if they broke up the sterling bloc and if we did make dollars readily convertible into pounds and pounds into dollars. There is a provision in the treaty which says they shall do it. But they did not do it; they are not doing it, and they do not intend to do it although there are specific provisions in the treaty that say they shall convert pounds into dollars and dollars into pounds. We have another agreement here to protect American nationals and the American Government. You cannot get dollars for pounds, and the investments which we have made in Great Britain relying upon the provisions of the British-loan agreement is money lost. Perhaps there were conditions which made failure necessary, but anyway there was failure to live up to the terms of that agreement.

I think we should go into this situation here with our eyes wide open, that we have a precedent for this which has not worked, which will not work, and until we can iron out our differences and actuate and effectuate the purposes of the British-loan agreement I think, in respect to these countries, minor countries undoubtedly, these distress areas as compared to Great Britain, we can expect no more consideration from them than we have gotten from the second largest and most important power in the world. For that reason we should, when we vote to accept this policy, understand that we are voting to accept a policy that cannot be enforced short of war and which gives absolutely no protection to the American laboring man who might lose his job because of the migration of American capital into these areas.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we have indeed seen a strange exhibition on the floor here today on the part of those who have opposed this bill and who will oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, an amendment which is acceptable to the majority members of the commitee. We can all remember how practically every one of the Members of the House who today oppose this bill at some time or other have shouted that they were for the free enterprise system, that we should encourage it, that we should do all we could to spread the free enterprise system. Not one of them would vote to repeal the Export-Import Bank law. Every one of them knows that under that law the Bank has the right to lend up to $3,500,000,000 for the very purposes set forth in this bill. In other words, they say it is quite all right to lend the money and take all the risks of a lender but do not issue guaranties to the extent of $250,000,000 on which we have a limited secondary liabiilty.

If this bank should continue to be authorized—and everybody apparently is in agreeent that it should be—to lend up to $3,500,000,000 for these purposes why should we not encourage free enterprise by saying that if they use their own money to the extent of $250,000,000, instead of our lending them the money at interest we will guarantee the investment against two types of risk?

When a bank lends money it takes all the risk whether it be loss by fire, riot, civil commotion, war damage, or what have you. But under this bill if private enterprise invests its own money we say we will guarantee them, insure their investment against two kinds of loss, and two kinds only—one convertibility of exchange, and the other expropriation.

As pointed out by our distinguished chairman, there is no real merit to the opposition to the bill or to the opposition to the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. It is pure and simple politics. The President wants this point 4 program, the world wants it, America wants it; so they say "Let's oppose it on political grounds." There is no reason to oppose either the amendment or the bill on their merits.

If you stop talking about all the imaginary things that are not in this bill, if you consider only what is in it and in the proposed amendment, you must vote for both.

Do not be frightened by the argument that if you pass this bill all the other American investors will demand similar guaranties. I hope they do. They can have them if they are willing to pay for them. The more the premium, the bigger the reserve fund; the more the guaranties, the more diversified the risks and the smaller the loss. That is good business. It is excellent insurance underwriting.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the bipartisan foreign policy to which I am devoted—and I think every Member of the House, whether he agrees with what I have done in this Congress or not, understands that I have been one of its staunchest advocates—requires the uncritical acceptance of everything the Administration brings in or requires us to be woolly in our thinking.

Let us get a little realistic about what we are up against here, because there is a precedent. This bill for the guaranty of overseas investments is not brand new. The Committee on Foreign Affairs wrote a provision for just such guaranties into the Economic Cooperation Act of 1950—the economic recovery program—which has now been available since April 1948, allowing $200,000,000 for such guaranties—section 103. I do not believe that anyone has mentioned in this debate that experience. The experience is this: Out of the $200,000,000 which has been available since April 1948, only about $22,500,000 has been the subject of 23 guaranties. American business for one reason or another has not taken advantage of this particular provision. There are now pending 40 applications for about $43,000,000 of guaranties and one, what the ECA calls a tentative application, for $50,000,000. The fact remains that only 10 percent of this available $200,000,000 has been utilized.

There is a difference between the ECA guaranty program and the program in this bill. In ECA it was applicable only to the ECA countries, which are essentially in western Europe, their territories and possessions. We now propose by this bill to make the guaranties of investments applicable to the whole free world, notably the Far East and the Near East, and that brings me to the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, for whom I have a deep affection as have so many Members of this House. I know he is an outstanding legislator and will not take this personally.

But, Mr. Chairman, his amendment invalidates in its very terms almost everything this bill is designed to serve under the point 4 program, in these countries we are trying to benefit by this $250,000,000, and which are not the great powers, poor even as they are, like France, Great Britain, and the other countries of Europe, but are the very poorest countries. Few of these countries can feasibly agree to give this immediate interchangeability of dollars called for by this amendment. In few of the countries in these underdeveloped areas could they agree with us that they would not compete with any American business that went in there. In short, they will find it extremely hard to make any sort of agreement as called for by this amendment and to give any such guaranty.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman understand that the investor would not go in any country except upon the invitation of that country?

Mr. JAVITS. I understand that perfectly, but what we are talking about here is that we want these countries to be able to receive this point 4 aid. That is the point. We want to get exactly this kind of investment for economic development into the poor, distressed, underdeveloped countries. Why should we write something into this bill that is a millstone around the neck of the very proposition we are trying to assert?

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MULTER. The officials of the Export-Import Bank, the Under Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury have all indicated to our committee in open hearings that these very limitations, the subject matter of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, would be incorporated into their rules and regulations and into their guaranties.

Mr. JAVITS. I may say to the gentleman from New York that just because they did that for the purpose of getting this bill through the committee or the House does not necessarily make it right. We are here to consider the subject based on the needs we are trying to meet and to make up our own minds.

Mr. MULTER. Will the gentleman indicate to us what is wrong about any one of these restrictions contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. JAVITS. The very thing we are trying to attain by this bill would defeat itself because we are not dealing in this bill with countries which are generally capable of making such agreements. We want to benefit the poor countries. We are not dealing with countries which are capable of giving us or offering guaranties, which this amendment will make them give; hence we will be in the same position, and even in a worse position than we have been under the ECA guaranties, which have been only 10 percent availed of.

It seems to me that if we want a point-4 program that is going to save the world from communism, this program, and certainly this amendment, does not help—it is too little and it may be too late. The extent to which the ECA guaranty program has been availed of shows the inadequacy of reliance on any expectation that guaranties of new United States investments abroad under this bill will come anywhere near to having the impact on or magnitude in relation to the standards of living for free peoples that we so urgently need to improve.

We have spent $5,000,000,000 a year on the European recovery program for western Europe alone, and it is very doubtful that in 1952 western Europe will be able to stand on its own feet. Now we are talking about committing the towering sum of maybe $25,000,000 on point 4 for technical aid, and guaranties of $250,000,000 with all kinds of strings and restrictions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. My colleagues, if we do not get accustomed to the realities of this world and to what this job of beating communism is going to take, America may not win. There is nothing in the heavens that says that America must win against the Communists; we could lose; it could happen to us. Let us not forget that the most ardent morale in Korea is not being displayed by the apostles of freedom from South Korea, but the most ardent morale is being displayed by the North Koreans, and despite the American declaration that we have entered into South Korea to defeat the North Korean aggression, North Korea has not laid down and died, but on the contrary they are fighting our forces every foot of the way. We will win; I know our determination and our spirit, and we fight for justice and humanity; but let us learn something. It is time we learned something.

We are not going to accomplish with $250,000,000 in guaranties and with a lot of strings tied to it, and we are not going to accomplish with $25,000,000 in technical aid the part point 4 is designed to play in the defeat of communism. If we want to decisively win this struggle against communism, we must do it with the power of civilian goods, with the power of civilian production; we have to go all out and produce and act in terms of billions instead of millions. That is what the people of the world will understand and that is what the people will respect, and then they will give us morale, because we will give them delivery in terms of a better life instead of words.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If you want to talk in figures of billions of dollars the world will understand it, but when you give that talk to the people of the United States, in the House of Representatives and the Senate, I doubt very much if they know what it is all about, and then they go back and ask the taxpayers to pay the bill, and that is the trouble with this cockeyed idea.

Mr. JAVITS. Someone on the floor here a while ago said that the thing America should do is to gird itself for war; arm itself. Again, look at the figures. General Marshall testified before us in the Foreign Affairs Committee not over 3 weeks ago that if we wanted to gird ourselves for war, if we wanted to isolate ourselves in the United States and arm to the teeth, it would cost not $15,000,000,000 per year for the armed services but $30,000,000,000 per year; in other words, an addition of three times more than we are spending now on ERP; and if we are talking about two, three, or four billion a year for a real point 4 investment program, does that compare with the figure for defense or in terms of the billions and billions which will be spent in another war or the millions whose lives will be lost? No; these are grim realities, and a Member who is deeply concerned about the interests of this country, and has them in his heart, would be remiss in his duties to his colleagues if he did not voice them whether popular or unpopular, and that is what I am doing today.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I always find that when people in this country or any country in the whole world attend to their own business and stay in their homes and look after their own families that they hardly ever get into trouble, but whenever you start to go into this fellow's backyard and the other fellow's backyard and you want race trouble, you generally get it, and that is what we are doing now. They say we are the greatest peace-loving people in the world. We are doing more war talk than any people on the face of the globe, and we are doing the fighting now and letting the other fellows out. It is about time we sat down and started accounting our books.

Mr. JAVITS. The South Koreans stayed home. That did not prevent the North Koreans from going out to get them. We stayed home, and that did not prevent Hirohito from going out to get us at Pearl Harbor, and if we stay home now it will not prevent Mr. Stalin from getting us. No, my colleague, staying home is certainly not the answer.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Was the gentleman originally for this bill that carried no contingent-liability provision?

Mr. JAVITS. That is a very hard question to answer, but I will answer it. I was for the President's point 4 program, of which this is a part, but I consider it a most inadequate part, considering the job we have to do in the world to defeat communism. I think the gentleman knows one thing about me from seeing me here, whether he agrees with me or not, and that is that I am sincere. This amendment worsens the bill, it does not better it. I am addressing myself to it not with any idea just of defeating the gentleman's amendment, but I am addressing myself to the major questions which we face here and which I think we are completely overlooking in the debate about this particular detail of this bill.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman like the bill better if the limitation were fixed at $25,000,000,000 rather than $250,000,000?

Mr. JAVITS. That is not the point.

Mr. COX. If we struck out the limitation altogether it would be better?

Mr. JAVITS. I said I was for the President's point 4 program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to this request, but in the future I am going to object to any extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. All I say to the gentleman from Georgia is this, that the implementation of the plan of point 4, the very things which the administration has brought in here—and after all, they have to do the planning, they have to lay out these projects to make point 4 fit together as a structure—is completely inadequate to the purpose and conception of point 4. I point out, with the greatest respect, that this amendment makes it even more inadequate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and rise in support of the Cox amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understood the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], or perhaps it was one of the other gentlemen who said it, it was to the effect that the administrators of this act have committed themselves to the proposition of including in their rules and regulations something along the lines of the Cox amendment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has just called to our attention the instability of governments throughout the world today. As I understood him, he made the argument to the effect that these governments with whom we expect to do business are not in a position to make the guaranties which the Cox amendment calls for. On the one hand, the administrators are going to put in their rules and regulations the provisions substantially called for by the amendment, and, on the other hand, the argument is made that the governments are in no position to make such guaranties. So it seems to me that the weight of the argument of the gentleman from New York falls and does not sustain itself.

Mr. Chairman, only a few months ago this Congress approved a bill which provides that the national banks of this country may carry in their portfolios debentures issued by the International Credit Bank, such International Credit Bank being part of the machinery of the Bretton Woods Agreement, the Bretton Woods Agreement being for the purpose of financing and facilitating the United Nations organization so that the countries of the world will stand up economically. This means to say that your demand deposits in the national banks of this country may be used without your knowledge, unless you are rather sagacious and alert, for the purpose of buying those debentures of the International Credit Bank, to be used to finance where this kind of money might now go.

It is impossible for me to conceive that the Congress of the United States as now constituted would approve this bill without restrictions going at least as far as the Cox amendment calls for. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I am going to support the Cox amendment when the vote comes on that proposition.

Here we have the statement from the Under Secretary of State on page 49 of the hearings that our people have invested in other countries $18,000,000,000 of private funds. If this bill is passed in its present form, how long do you think it will be before those investors step in here and demand that we give guaranties on those $18,000,000,000 of private funds invested in these other countries? Why make goose flesh of one and buzzard flesh of another? If you are going to guarantee one group of investors, why not guarantee the other group, and play fair with the American people, if you are going to practically force them into this kind of proposition where the Export-Import Bank, a Government agency, makes its contribution and shoulders it off onto the people of this country to back up?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has asked that we talk in billions and work in billions.

What did we do under Bretton Woods, except to work in billions of dollars? What did we do under the British loan, except to work in billions? What have we done under the Marshall plan except to work in billions and billions and yet more billions? It is a recorded fact, and I am sure you will agree, that in the other body recently one of the outstanding spokesmen for the administration submitted a proposition that we should put into this point-4 program no less than $50,000,000,000. This $250,000,000 figure in this bill is a trap to lead you into the initiatorial stages of this proposal. You cannot do anything in the world today more than just make a start, on the basis of $250,000,000 in a plan of this kind. That is a joke. It is a farce. I think it borders on intellectual dishonesty to bring a bill here with $250,000,000 in it and no more. These hearings were held in 1949. Why does this committee not bring to us up-to-date hearings based on what is now going on in the world instead of hearings now so out of date?

That is what I want to have. I think this bill ought to be sent back to the committee for them to hold some hearings on it and to get the business interests of this country before the committee. We only have four or five witnesses here as testified to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TALLE]. Let us have some facts on this that are up-to-date.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, the last 5 minutes to be reserved for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICH) there were—ayes 55, noes 44.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fourteen Members are present, a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is recognized.

Mr. RICH. Thanks for the 3½ minutes.

First, I want to say I thought I was going to have the privilege today, and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN] as well, of voting "no" on this legislation. But I understand the majority leadership has prevailed upon the powers that be to put this vote over until tomorrow, in order to allow the South Carolina delegation to vote. There are four of them, so when we two go away there will be a difference of two, but we will not have the privilege of being recorded against this legislation, and I am afraid somebody might think I am for it.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes, I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. Just so I am properly recorded, I want it understood that I would vote "no" also.

Mr. RICH. I tried to explain that, but I am glad you did.

Now, I would like to know who got up this legislation. I would like to know who is back of all this New Deal legislation we have had, trying to take into account all the people all over the world. I have been unable to understand how this administration, how the people on the Democratic side, can swallow all the things they are asked to. It seems to me that you on this side have got enough to do to attend to your own business. When you start in to try to take care of all the business of all the people all over the world, and allow 150 million or 160 million of our own people to be taxed to finance 2,400,000,000, I think there is something wrong and that we ought to bring in a psychiatrist and have an examination.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes, I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. The gentleman just asked where this thing started. It was only a short time ago that Henry Wallace was advocating all these things.

Mr. RICH. That is right.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. But the ridiculous part of the whole program is that we are pumping American taxpayers' dollars into the economy of those countries, and we do not have the national defense built up to protect the investments that we are going to make. What we should do is to build up our own national defense, and then if we want to pump money into the economy of that country, we would be in a position to see that it is protected.

Mr. RICH. You are absolutely right. We have got more sense in a minute in some of these fellows on the minority side than we have in a month in all those fellows on the majority side. This thing is all cock-eyed, and if the people of America do not realize what is being done, they will be without a country. It is about time that we woke up. In the first place, we set up this Bretton Woods Agreement. How many of you fellows on this side of the aisle wanted that Bretton Woods Agreement a few years ago? Oh, it was going to take care of all the people all over the world, and all their finances. Time after time since that you have been bringing in a lot more new cock-eyed ideas just like this bill, and the first thing you know we will be so overburdened——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] may be allowed to finish his sentence in his extension of remarks.

I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINNON] made a speech a few minutes ago which, to my mind, was an outstanding exposition of the purpose of this legislation. He said that our goal is a peaceful world, and that a peaceful world can only be built on an improved international economic level. There is one charge that has been used over the years against the United States, and is being used today by the communistic forces in the world, and that is the charge of dollar imperialism. I think at one time that charge was true. I refer to the time when American capital was invested in Nicaragua, and we sent our marines into that country to protect it. I refer to the time when American investments were threatened in Vera Cruz, Mexico, and we sent our armed forces in to protect that investment. Those, indeed, were the days of dollar diplomacy and of Yankee imperialism. But we changed our policy later on, and just a few years ago when the Mexican Government expropriated a lot of oil wells and oil properties down in Mexico we did not declare war or send our troops to Mexico. We entered into negotiations with the new Mexican Government and finally reached a peaceful settlement whereby most of the American capital investment was returned to this country through peaceful negotiation with the Mexican Government.

What are we doing here? It seems to me that we are setting up an insurance program in this bill, for it says we will protect investments against a limited type of loss, the type represented by expropriation and seizure by public authorities in those countries. So for an appropriate fee we are saying to American enterprise that they may go into these countries, invest their money and we will set up what amounts to an insurance reserve fund of $250,000,000 until that appropriate fee shall build up a reserve fund of its own, and out of that $250,000,000 we will recompense American free enterprise for the loss which they may sustain under a limited type of guaranty in these foreign countries.

It seems to me that in doing this we are really backing American enterprise and we are doing it on a sound insurance type of base, not on a national gift base or on the base of a loan to a foreign government, but we are encouraging our private enterprisers to go into these countries and bring to these countries the enterprises which they need to give employment to their people and bring up the level of the standard of living in those countries. We are also protecting American businessmen from undue loss which would occur in these cases of expropriation and confiscation. I say we are giving to them the same kind of protection in foreign countries that we now give to them in this country, because American capital investment is not allowed to be confiscated here without due process of law. We are extending a similar type of protection for their capital investment abroad. It seems to me that it is good business. I am surprised that my friends on the Republican side of the aisle who are always against appropriations, are now objecting to a sound, proved, and tried principle of business investment insurance.

It is universally accepted that the development of stable economies and democratic institution in a free world, and particularly in the so-called underdeveloped areas, is a key element in our foreign policy.

The peoples of these areas have had a glimpse of what American technology, organization, managerial skills, and democratic freedom are accomplishing and can accomplish.

Their desire for self-improvement dominates their thoughts and actions.

Their hopes and expectations are aroused as never before.

We know what must be done if their dreams are to be realized, and we want to see these aspirations realized.

We know, and many of them know, that balanced economies must be established in these areas if a sound base is to be provided for the achievement by these peoples of their aspirations for self-improvement and the democratic way of life.

We know that, in the long run, the sound economic development of these areas will also contribute to the maintenance of high and stable economic activity and employment in the United States, to the increase of United States and world trade, and to maintenance of world peace.

The implementation of President Truman's point 4 program can make a signal and lasting contribution to the accomplishment of all of these objectives.

The Act for International Development—Public Law 535, Eighty-first Congress, second session—which will enable us to extend technical assistance to the peoples of the underdeveloped areas, has already been passed.

The President has pointed out that a second category of outside aid needed by the underdeveloped areas is the provision of capital for development projects and the establishment of productive enterprises in these areas.

No new legislation is required to empower the United States Government, acting through the Export-Import Bank of Washington, to make loans of public funds for economic development and for the establishment of productive enterprises, both of which are so essentially needed in these underdeveloped areas. However, we all appreciate the desirability of encouraging private sources to provide as much as possible of the necessary capital, as well as the necessary technical knowledge and organizational and managerial skills.

H. R. 8083, which is before us for consideration now, should be enacted so as to enable the Export-Import Bank to issue limited guaranties in order to stimulate the flow of private capital, technical knowledge, and managerial skills into productive investment in these underdeveloped areas.

H. R. 8083 will encourage private interests to provide this capital, technical knowledge, and these skills from private sources at private risks, rather than from governmental sources.

In my opinion, the enactment of H. R. 8083 will present United States and foreign private capital with unprecedented opportunities and a very real challenge.

I believe that the constructive planning and extension of technical assistance under the act for international development will uncover hitherto unsuspected opportunities for the productive employment of private capital in the underdeveloped areas of the world.

I hope and believe that private capital will accept the challenge presented by these opportunities.

The issuance of limited guaranties by the Export-Import Bank under the authority conferred by H. R. 8083 should, and I hope will, stimulate investments of private United States capital in productive enterprises in these areas.

H. R. 8083 will permit the Export-Import Bank to issue guaranties under which it will agree to convert into United States dollars the foreign currency derived from such investments in the event the foreign country concerned is unable to do so.

H. R. 8083 will also permit the Export-Import Bank to pay compensation in United States dollars for losses resulting from the expropriation, confiscation, or seizure by action of public authority of the enterprises in which such investments are made.

It should be emphasized that H. R. 8083 does not permit the Export-Import Bank to assume all the risks that it may assume in the exercise of its lending authority, including ordinary business risks, but only the two classes of risks which I have just referred to.

It should also be emphasized that the enactment of H. R. 8083 does not empower the Export-Import Bank to embark on a large-scale program. H. R. 8083 provides that the aggregate amount of limited guaranties that may be outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $250,000,000. H. R. 8083 does not provide additional funds to the Export-Import Bank for this purpose; the $250,000,000 is chargeable against the Export-Import Bank's total lending and guaranty authority of $3,500,000,000.

For my part, I hope the Export-Import Bank will issue guaranties to the full amount of $250,000,000 and come back to the Congress for authority to issue guaranties without restriction up to the full amount of whatever over-all limitation may then be imposed upon it. I say this because I believe in private enterprise and the direct and immediate contribution it can make to the economic development of the free underdeveloped areas of the world.

The risks against which the Export-Import Bank may issue guaranties under H. R. 8083, as I pointed out above, are less than those that it assumes when it makes loans.

If we admit the premise that the Export-Import Bank should continue its foreign lending activities, and I do not see how this premise can be questioned, it is axiomatic that the Export-Import Bank should be empowered to undertake the guaranty program which should involve less risk taking while making an equal, if not greater, contribution to the economic development of the free underdeveloped areas of the world in which we have so great an interest.

I should like to cite the following examples to illustrate the fact that the authority conferred by H. R. 8083 is closely allied to and is a logical, but limited, expansion of the functions which the Export-Import Bank has been exercising since its creation in 1934:

Example 1: An American company desiring to engage in a productive enterprise in a foreign county, in addition to the technical and managerial skills which it will contribute to the enterprise, needs additional capital which it does not have and which it cannot otherwise raise from private sources. It applies to the Export-Import Bank for a loan which the bank has authority to make, and which in both theory and practice is considered most appropriate for the bank to make. In making this loan the Export-Import Bank may assume all the risks which may result in nonpayment of the loan. These risks include not only all those that confront a domestic enterprise, but also a number of others which are peculiar to doing business abroad. The risks taken by the Export-Import Bank in granting the loan may include the following: First, failure of the company to earn money because of normal business hazards; second, inability of the company to obtain United States dollars in exchange for foreign currency derived from the investment; third, inability of the company to operate profitably because of excessive burdens imposed upon it under the laws of the country in which it is operating; and fourth, inability of the company to repay the loan as a result of expropriation, confiscation, or seizure without compensation, or with inadequate or ineffectual compensation.

Example 2: The American company has, or can raise, sufficient capital to enable it to make the investment and is willing to make the investment, but is deterred from doing so for two reasons: First, it fears that it will be unable to repatriate its profits and capital even though the enterprise is successful. Second, it fears that its physical properties will be expropriated, confiscated, or seized without prompt and adequate compensation. If H. R. 8083 is enacted, the company under these circumstances may apply to the Export-Import Bank for a guaranty—for which it will pay an appropriate fee—under which the Export-Import Bank would agree to convert into United States dollars the local currency derived from the investment if the foreign country is unable or unwilling to do so, and under which the bank may also agree to pay the company up to the fair value of its physical properties in the event they are expropriated, confiscated, or seized without prompt and adequate compensation. In this case the Export-Import Bank would be assuming much more limited risks by issuing the guaranty than if it had granted a loan.

It is apparent from these illustrations that H. R. 8083 will enable the Export-Import Bank to encourage private capital to undertake productive investments in the underdeveloped areas with less risk to the bank than in the case of loans, which it is universally agreed, are proper and fitting.

It is also apparent that many worthwhile productive enterprises may be established in the underdeveloped areas as a result of the encouragement offered by the guaranty program, which would not be possible were their establishment dependent upon receiving loans from the Export-Import Bank. For example, the speculative nature of an enterprise may render the enterprise unsuitable for a loan. In some cases the business risks are such that equity investments rather than loans should be made.

It should also be borne in mind that there are many instances in which it is difficult, if not impossible, for a foreign country or a foreign private investor to acquire the necessary technical knowledge and organization by purchase even if the United States dollars are available for that purpose. In other instances the initiative and organizing ability required for the conception and launching of an enterprise may be available only in the United States.

In these cases private interests might make the investment of capital and technical knowledge and undertake the risks if the protection of a limited guaranty is available. Because of their very nature, some of these ventures might not come into being under a loan program.

By none of the foregoing statements have I meant to suggest that a program for the issuance of limited guaranties of private investments by the Export-Import Bank should, or can, be regarded as a substitute for unguaranteed private investments or Government lending. A guaranty program may, however, serve to bring about certain essential development that would not otherwise be possible.

It has been stated by some that the authority to issue limited guaranties might be exercised by the Bank in a manner inimical to the legitimate interests of those who have already made substantial foreign investments, or of those who might in the future make foreign investments without seeking or obtaining such guaranties.

These fears are groundless.

The bank, as an institution, over the last 15 years has evidenced a very keen awareness of the interests of those who have made private capital investments abroad.

In numerous instances throughout the years, loans made by the Export-Import Bank have been of material and direct assistance to those who have made private investments in foreign countries in which the bank has engaged in lending activities. This is in addition to the direct effects these lending activities have had in stimulating our foreign trade. Instances in which loans by the Export-Import Bank have indirectly served the interests of private United States investors are legion.

It must be obvious to anyone who has studied the record that there have been many instances in which the Export-Import Bank has refrained from taking action which would have untoward consequences for those who had preexisting investments in the area or country concerned.

I also wish to point out that the limitations imposed by the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended, are such that the bank is not at liberty to ignore the legitimate interests of those who have made private capital investments.

The bank could not ignore these interests under the act as it now stands, nor could it ignore them in operations under the allied but limited extension of its authority contemplated by H. R. 8083.

I refer to section 2 (b) of that act which provides:

> It is the policy of the Congress that the bank in the exercise of its functions should supplement and encourage and not compete with private capital.

Any course of action by the bank which disregarded the legitimate interests of those who have made private capital investments abroad would clearly contravene section 2 (b) of the act.

Operations under the authority conferred by H. R. 8083 will not, as some have feared, result in shifting the responsibility of encouraging and protecting United States private investments abroad from the countries in which the investments are made to the Export-Import Bank.

The record makes it perfectly clear that the Export-Import Bank will encourage productive investments only in foreign countries which have demonstrated their interest in creating a favorable climate for United States investment. The foreign country concerned can demonstrate this interest by negotiating an investment treaty or agreement with the United States or by making other arrangements to protect investors from unwarranted or discriminatory treatment under its laws.

Also the Export-Import Bank has made it clear that it proposes to enter into agreements with the foreign countries covering the disposition to be made of the foreign currency which may be acquired by the bank as a result of guaranty operations. In this connection the bank has emphasized the fact that in entering into such agreements with foreign countries it will not attempt to secure a preferred position for the investors to whom it issues guaranties or for itself.

On the contrary, it has been unequivocally stated that the purpose of the bank in entering into these agreements will be to assure that the guaranteed investments and the claims of the bank resulting from guaranty operations shall take their places in line with unguaranteed claims of a similar character.

The Chairman of the Board has stated on behalf of the Directors of the Export-Import Bank that there will be no agreement, request, or pressure that any of these claims be given priority over existing claims and existing unguaranteed investments.

This approach, which I believe to be both sound and equitable, will result in the bank's having an even more direct interest in encouraging prompt and full service in dollars as well as protection against confiscation without prompt and adequate compensation for all existing or future investments made by United States interests irrespective of whether the investments are guaranteed by the bank.

It is appropriate, also, to add that the very fact that a guaranty has been issued should serve to make the position of the investor less precarious and should encourage him to leave his investment intact in the foreign country and perhaps increase it, rather than to withdraw it.

It should also be emphasized, as was pointed out in the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency on H. R. 8083, that in authorizing the Export-Import Bank to issue guaranties only with respect to investments in productive enterprises the bill would prevent the bank issuing guaranties which would result in uneconomic duplication and expansion of production and productive facilities already existing in the United States and other countries.

Lastly, I desire to refer again to the salutary effect that investments of private capital will have upon the economies of the underdevloped areas of the world.

Such investments will bring with them much in the way of technical knowledge and organizational and managerial skill that is available through no other source.

Properly and fairly operated enterprises in which United States capital is invested can do more to demonstrate the benefits to be derived from the American way of life than any other type of undertaking.

Private United States investments in productive enterprises in these free underdeveloped areas will not only make a great direct contribution to their economic stability, and as a result, their political stability, but will also have many indirect and beneficial effects on the peoples of the underdeveloped areas and of the United States of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said here this afternoon about how this measure would promote free enterprise. Much of that was uttered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER], and the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINNON]. I should like for one of these gentlemen to tell me what provision there is in this bill that prohibits the lending of money to totalitarian governments.

Mr. MULTER. There is not any doubt in anybody's mind that the Export-Import Bank would for one minute consider making a bad loan or would give guaranties to anyone for investment anywhere in this world without the prior approval of the State Department, and I can assure the gentleman that the State Department——

Mr. GROSS. All right; I cannot yield any further.

Mr. MULTER. I thought the gentleman wanted an answer to his question.

Mr. GROSS. That does not answer my question.

Mr. MULTER. I am trying to answer the question.

Mr. GROSS. Yes, the gentleman says the State Department will protect against such loans being made. I am interested in the provisions of this bill, not what the State Department may do. I say that in this bill there is nothing to prohibit such loans being made. As an example of the little reliance to be placed on the State Department, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that only recently $125,000,000 was lent to the dictatorial Perón government in Argentina. How are you promoting free enterprise when you lend the taxpayers' money to dictator governments?

Mr. MULTER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia should allay the gentleman's fears in that respect.

Mr. GROSS. I fail to find anything in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia that would preclude the lending of money to totalitarian governments anywhere in the world.

Mr. MULTER. Does the gentleman believe for one moment that we would enter into a treaty or trade agreement under this bill with Russia or its satellites?

Mr. GROSS. I am talking about all totalitarian governments, satellites, and dictators.

Mr. MULTER. The precedent is to be found in these current treaties and obligations with friendly countries.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman talks about free enterprise, when he well knows it cannot function under a Perón.

Mr. MULTER. How else do you get free enterprise except by the investment of private capital? We are not talking about the guaranty of any business losses.

Mr. GROSS. But you do not foster free enterprise by lending money to dictators.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It seems to me that we are permitting many commodities to come in here from countries back of the iron curtain, such as Polish hams and shoes from Czechoslovakia. I suppose under this act people from this country could go over there, build factories to manufacture commodities, and ship them into the United States.

Mr. GROSS. Precisely so. We are using the capital of this country, the taxpayers' money today to produce in Japan a great deal of the corduroy cloth that is destroying the corduroy industry on the eastern seaboard. We are importing chinaware from Japan with the taxpayers' money, and so on. The point I make here is you are not promoting free enterprise by lending money to Dictator Perón in South America, or any other dictator.

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McKINNON. Does the gentleman deem most important a corduroy industry or any other kind of industry or the lives of American soldiers who are dying overseas today?

Mr. GROSS. Ask the American boys in Korea where our expensive friends are now, those friends we bought at the expense of American industry, labor, and farmers.

Mr. McKINNON. There is a lot of correlation between having a living standard that gives people a lot of hope in this world and our attempt to help them attain that.

Mr. GROSS. Aid to dictators has never raised living standards or given hope to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, it seems there was criticism of the bill recently because it did not have enough restrictions. Now the Cox amendment places many restrictions around the bill. Yet it is just as unpalatable to the other side as before the amendment was proposed.

There have been a good many propositions that are entirely ridiculous as to what investments might be guaranteed. I think we can rely on the good judgment of the Export-Import Bank. It has been administered in an exceptionally fine manner; it has been a great success; it has served the purposes for which it was organized; its reputation is sound. Gentlemen of the House ask if the Export-Import Bank is going to guarantee investments in totalitarian governments. Why, of course, it is not. We all know it is not. In the administration of laws the human equation always enters. We have to rely on people in the administration of laws. We have to rely on men of honor—on men of patriotism. We rely on that character of man when we give this power to the Export-Import Bank. Do you think they are going to be guilty of treason? Are they going to betray their Government? Are they going to guarantee investments in countries that would like to overthrow our own? Of course, they are not. They are going to serve the very purposes for which this law is enacted. They are going to carry it out in the spirit in which the law is enacted. They are going to attempt to develop the undeveloped areas of the world, which will mean a great deal, not only to those countries but to the economy of the world and to the economy of the United States.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. Does not the gentleman think it would be advisable before we pass any more legislation creating programs for the spending of the American taxpayers' money for us to wait and see what develops out of this Korean situation?

Mr. SPENCE. No.

Mr. GAVIN. And how far we can protect our investments abroad?

Mr. SPENCE. No. America has got to move forward, notwithstanding the Korean situation. I think we all know that the Korean situation could not have been handled in any other way than it has been handled. If we want to preserve our liberties, we have to show that we have the strength and the courage and the intent to preserve it. I do not think that you can make any party issue out of it any more than you can make a party issue out of this, and I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JAVITS) there were—ayes 89, noes 10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SPENCE: Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "productive investment in such areas" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in such areas productive investment which would not result in uneconomic and unsound duplication and expansion of production and productive facilities already existing in the United States and other countries."

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, this is to prevent the uneconomic and unsound duplication of production and productive facilities in the United States; in other words, it is to prevent the guaranteed investments of American capital from producing products that will compete with industries in the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I shall offer a motion to recommit, and I never was more sincere in offering a motion to recommit than I am on this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky has just offered another amendment to this bill. After the committee had voted the bill out with an amendment, the committee met again, gave some further consideration to the bill, and offered a committee amendment. Now the Committee of the Whole has just adopted the so-called Cox amendment. Now we have another amendment here which I do not know the meaning of even after listening to my very worthy Chairman explain it. I think there is very little understanding of the effect now which this bill will have on the point 4 program or on our foreign policy. When the Export-Import Bank was originally set up it was to aid in the movement of goods from America to our foreign markets and it was set up primarily for that purpose, although it was given authority to do a banking business domestically as well as in the foreign fields. Originally it was wholly divorced from the State Department, and William McChesney Martin, as Chairman of the Board, always saw to it that the intent of Congress was respected in that it would not aid or stand in the way of dollar diplomacy. When the Export-Import Bank was reorganized and we created a new board—and the membership perhaps will remember the controversy at that time which raged around whether the Secretary of State would become a member of the board and against the advice of a good many Members of Congress whom I believe were thinking soundly—the independence of the Export-Import Bank was destroyed and it becomes now a part of our foreign policy dominated by the State Department. So that the $3,500,000,000 which is at their disposal, there still is about $828,000,000 of it which is uncommitted, can now be used in the development of a dollar diplomacy throughout the world.

This bill is in keeping, perhaps, with the State Department policy in respect to the maintenance of a dollar diplomacy, but is directly contrary to the original intent of Congress in setting up the Export-Import Bank.

I believe very sincerely that this bill should be considered now in the light of our changed foreign policy, in the light of whatever changes might have taken place in our thinking in respect to the independence of the Export-Import Bank. Surely now that the Cox amendment has been adopted some consideration should be given in the committee to the effect of that amendment on our foreign policy and on the maintenance of the Export-Import Bank as an agency for the movement of American goods abroad. I am very sincere about it. At the proper time I shall make that motion to recommit.

I do not know enough about the amendment which has just been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to say anything about it. I am sure, of course, that it will be adopted because the gentleman from Kentucky offers it, but, frankly, I do not know what it means, and I do not think anybody else on the floor knows what it means.

Mr. Chairman, this whole bill should go back to the Committee on Banking and Currency for further study.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GORE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8083) to amend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended (59 Stat. 526, 666; 61 Stat. 130), to vest in the Export-Import Bank of Washington the power to guarantee United States investments abroad, pursuant to House Resolution 650, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further consideration of the bill be postponed until tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR REMAINDER OF WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of my friend, the majority leader, as to the program for the rest of the week?

Mr. McCORMACK. On the completion tomorrow of the bill we have just had under consideration, and which of course is now in its final stages, we will take up the security bill, on which a rule was adopted the week before last.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How much general debate is left on that?

Mr. McCORMACK. One hour, the chairmen of the committee informs me.

After that there will be the bill (H. R. 7940) to provide for national assistance for local educational agencies in areas affected by Federal activities, and a resolution authorizing the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to investigate the South Amboy disaster. I am unable to state now in what order they will be brought up.

On Thursday, District of Columbia business is in order. I am informed that three bills will be brought up that day. I am not aware of the order in which they will be brought up, but I can announce for the information of the House the bills that I have been advised will be called up on next Thursday by the chairman of the District Committee.

One bill is H. R. 8710, to provide for the improvement of stadium facilities at the Eastern Senior High School in the District of Columbia. Another one is H. R. 7670, a bill to regulate the height, exterior design, and the construction of private and semipublic buildings in the Georgetown area of the National Capital. The other one is H. R. 8909, a bill to authorize the District of Columbia government to establish an Office of Civil Defense.

I know of no other legislation. I cannot definitely state that nothing else will be taken up this week, but I am hopeful and confident of course that we will dispose of our business by Thursday and then go over until Monday. I shall announce the program for next week then, but I can state now with reference to the military assistance bill which was reported out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs today and on which I am hopeful a rule will be obtained before the end of the week, that in that event that bill will come up during the early part of next week, and on what day I will announce later.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell us about the conference report on the social-security bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. I wish I could, but I am unable to do so. I shall make inquiry and try to advise the House further on that tomorrow.

FREE POSTAGE TO MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES IN SPECIFIED AREAS

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3876) to provide free postage for members of the Armed Forces of the United States in specified areas.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I might state this bill has been reported out unanimously by the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee, as I understand, has obtained clearance on both sides.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This relates to free postage for the soldiers?

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any first-class letter mail matter admissible to the mails as ordinary mail matter which is sent by a member of the Armed Forces of the United States, while on active duty or in the active service of the Armed Forces of the United States in Korea and such other areas as the President of the United States may hereafter designate as combat zones or theaters of military operations, to any person in the United States, including the Territories and possessions thereof, shall be transmitted in the mails free of postage, subject to such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe: Provided, That when specified by the sender, letters weighing not to exceed 1 ounce, shall be transmitted to destination by air mail, dependent upon air space availability therefor.

SEC. 2. The free mailing privileges above granted shall become effective upon the date of enactment of this act and shall continue until June 30, 1951, unless terminated at an earlier date by concurrent resolution of the Congress, or by direction of the President.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this legislation, S. 3876, which will provide free postage for members of the Armed Forces in Korea and other combat zones.

The sending and receipt of mail is one of the highest morale factors in the Armed Forces in the field and, under combat conditions, men in the military forces are unable to obtain postage stamps. It is my understanding that already this has become a problem in Korea. General MacArthur has requested that this free postage privilege be granted.

This privilege is similar to that granted members of the Armed Forces in previous wars.

It is the view of the committee that this privilege should be extended as well to those members of the Armed Forces who are en route to combat areas.

Under the terms of the bill first-class letter mail sent to any person in the United States, its Territories, or possessions by a member of the Armed Forces of the United States on active duty in Korea or any other area designated by the President as a combat zone or theater of operation may be sent free through the mail. When specified by the sender, letters weighing not more than 1 ounce will be transmitted by air mail when air space is available. This free mailing privilege will continue in effect until June 30, 1951, but may be terminated at an earlier date by concurrent resolution of Congress or by direction of the President.

Because of the urgency of this legislation, I hope that it will receive the unanimous approval of the House.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.] is recognized for 30 minutes.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE PARTY OF THE OPPOSITION IN TIME OF WAR

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, the question of the responsibility of the opposition party in time of war or strife is always a difficult one because, of course, the first obligation is to support one's Government wholeheartedly in every effort, military or political, which will render victory sure and, if possible, swift.

Personally, although I have heard opinions to the contrary, I agree with the President in the action which he took without waiting to come to Congress to secure congressional sanction. I do not believe that time would have permitted congressional procedure to be used. I have in mind the fact that the President proceeded in accordance with the provisions under which the United Nations was established, and engaged in an action to repel an aggressor as one nation acting in concert with other nations, as agents and representatives of the United Nations. I wish, of course, that many things had been done before, and many errors had not been made.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. Having in mind the gentleman's last statement, I wonder if he perchance has read the illuminating article that appeared in yesterday morning's New York Times, by their military expert, Mr. Baldwin, captioned "Tragedy of errors; the story of Korea."

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Yes. I have read it. I am glad to note that the gentleman has inserted it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today. I intend to make some reference to it, because what I have to talk about might well be headed, "Where are we going?"

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT JR. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman realizes, of course, that at the time of unification the Navy was not allowed to talk until the last 2 or 3 days and to give its side of the story. That was also true of the Marine Corps, when both services were very much weakened and almost eliminated. Then, later on, when Admiral Denfeld was promised immunity if he told the Armed Services Committee and the country what was needed in order to have an adequate naval defense, he was ousted as Chief of Naval Operations. It was his resignation and retirement, and the resignation of other officers in protest, that served to arouse the country as to what was being done with our naval defense. We would be in a much stronger position, if we had the carriers out of moth balls, and had built other carriers. Am I not correct in that statement?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. The gentlewoman is quite correct. Admiral Denfeld's courageous exposition of the danger to national security embodied in the attempt to hog-tie the Navy and Marine Corps was of the greatest value to our Nation. Some of the damage was done, anyway, by the Pentagon blind men who did not understand the functions of a trident Navy—land, sea, and air—but had it not been for Admiral Denfeld's exposé, the damage would have been irreparable. He is a great patriot. It is his critics who look small now. I would like to develop that a little further, because I, myself, am a veteran of World War II, and of the Navy's Third Amphibious Force, and would like to say something about the Marine amphibious forces. I was shocked at the time General Bradley came up here to Capitol Hill and said there would never be another amphibious war, and we would not need amphibious forces. How any general officer could hold the opinion that no nation's coast line anywhere in the world would ever require a defense from attack by the sea, I cannot understand. It may explain, however, why a trained Marine division, which, as I think the gentlewoman knows, has been cut down to a regiment in this false economy program, was left at Camp Pendleton, far from its scene of potential use, and is now proceeding by ship on a 16-day trip to Japan. Above all else, the Marines ought to be used for this police work, and for close support of ground operations.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They will use many more marines before this war is over. Of course they do not call it a war.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Of course it is a war, and undoubtedly they will be glad to use all the marines they can get. I think we have about 70,000 now. I wish we had many more. I said so during the unification debate.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not also true that the program that was promulgated by the Navy after the resignation and retirement of Admiral Denfeld raised such a protest in the country that they have practically followed his entire program and suggestions, except at once they did not begin on the carriers, but since then they have suggested that they would build carriers?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Yes. I think there has been some effort to correct that, but perhaps too little. I hope not too late; it results from an entire misconception of the joint roles of the Army, Navy, and Air Force by our Defense Department brain trust—an effort has been made, but belatedly. I think that as Mr. Baldwin points out as among the errors in the Korean affair are overconcentration of one kind of air power, for example, at the expense of others. For instance, the big-bomber school of opinion believed that the B–36 would do everything for everybody. This other school of thought has been in the ascendency in the Pentagon, a building which looks five ways at once, but where they cannot see the sea.

What we needed from the first was tactical air power based on land and sea bases, aircraft-carrier support, and marine aviation which has specialized in the close support of ground troops and was severely cut this year from 24 to 16 squadrons. Air Force tactical planes were the first kind of air power needed.

We were led to believe that the B–36's could go anywhere in the world and do anything from turning off the faucet in the kitchen sink to putting out all the fires in all the world almost overnight.

That is an overestimation; that is why it is not what is most needed for the Korean war. Worse than that, our present plane production is far below the level we reached 6 months before that other Pearl Harbor.

Mr. JAVITS. And it has been proved that carriers are an absolute necessity.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. It has not only been proved that they are an absolute necessity but it has been proved that only planes from carriers and fast carrier task forces can stay over an area in combat long enough to do any good. That's why the first step authorized for the Navy after we got in this thing was the demothballing of the carrier Bataan.

The F–80 jet plane is too good for the job; it is too fast. It is a high-speed rifle and cannot do the shotgun's job. The slower-moving F–51, the other so-called outmoded and outdated planes are just what we need now, and we do need the carrier task force. The planes are rusting now or given away or destroyed. Most of our carriers are laid up. We could use some of that money tossed away on potatoes and such right now.

Mr. JAVITS. It is a fact, is it not, however, that war is a tailored proposition, and it would be unwise to condemn the whole armaments program whether B–36 or jet fighters, based specifically upon the Korean war. I hope the gentleman, if I may be permitted, will not leave the wrong impression.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I hasten to say that I am just pointing out certain things we have learned: the B–29 and our jet programs are vital. But our military geniuses did not realize that other weapons could be even more vital, in fulfilling our Pacific obligations.

Mr. JAVITS. Of course; and I hope the gentleman will leave with us very strongly from his deep knowledge of the case his thought that with our world-wide responsibilities we have to have a flexible air force to meet the type of action the situation takes.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Yes; we do; and I hope I can make some little contribution, having in mind the fact that with certain other colleagues I was in Korea a little over 2 years ago and talked to the intelligence officers there and talked to our commanding officer, General Hodge, a very able man, at the time. I was immensely impressed when he then pinpointed just exactly what has happened since, that if we removed our force—and I gathered the very strong implication that he hoped that we would not, and I remember speaking in a number of places on my return to the same effect, that I hoped they would not withdraw our troops from South Korea—but he said that if they did the South Koreans could not possibly last alone, unaided, more than 7 days. He told us how difficult is the defense of this Bataan-shaped peninsula, even under the most favorable conditions. He said that the South Korean forces were infested and infiltrated with Communist agents from the north, that they were even then fomenting revolt in South Korea. He told us of the forming of the puppet North Korean People's Army; he told us, too, that there had been Communists in the American Army in Korea. General Hodge is still in the Army, and I think perhaps it would be better not to question him publicly, and I will not go into it any further than to say in justice to our occupation forces then in Korea that when we were there we were assured that every known Communist in the American Army in Korea in the occupation forces had been kicked out of Korea. We gathered the impression that they were still in the Army, but that they were not in that vital danger spot, that sore, infected finger which the Korean Peninsula reminds us of, but they had been there, and somebody was very short-sighted in permitting Communist soldiers within our own Army in an area where we were engaged in the containment of communism, and in keeping them somewhere else in the Army after they had been tossed out of Korea. You recall the Army's order permitting Communists to serve in our forces.

It is not my purpose, however, to take this opportunity simply to be critical, as Mr. Baldwin and many others have spoken of errors in military policy, with the same thought I have, to forestall even worse mistakes in the future.

We are probably in for a long and bloody war. It is sad enough to envision casualties from the ordinary risks of conflict. Far worse to realize that they may be multiplied by costly errors. It is probably too early for us to attempt to expert and to substitute for the military expert. It is proper to regret the economy which cut down the Marines, the Navy, the amphibious forces, the Air Force, and the Army. The necessity for ground troops has again been proven, as it has always been proven in all wars from time immemorial. The Army was right about the ground forces. The contention of the Navy and Marine Corps at the time of the unification arguments has to my mind been amply sustained. The necessity for an amphibious lift becomes apparent, the use of the Marines as a police force becomes obvious, the overconcentration upon certain types of planes in this kind of war becomes apparent.

These are very revealing facts and it is my purpose only to suggest that they ought to be studied and considered before more serious errors are made. We read today, for instance, how a battalion claimed it was left without artillery support. That does happen in time of war, but when the full story of that battalion is told the people of this country will be appalled to know what a great percentage of that battalion were either killed, wounded, or missing. It will be a very large proportion of the total battalion.

A complete readjustment then would seem clearly to be in order. It is for that reason I suggest as a possibility the opportunity to inquire into what goes on and that it might be desirable to have come to Capitol Hill General Bradley and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to address an executive session of Members of the two Houses of Congress. Perhaps they could tell us what it may not be possible to say to the public and why we were caught short in our tank program, why so many of our so-called experts thought that Korea was not good tank country. I am not an expert, but I could certainly see with my own eyes in Korea that, given suitable weather conditions, good or indifferent at least as against bad, it certainly appeared to be a rough country, but a country in which tanks could operate. But worse than that we find that the Russians have 60-ton tanks using 88-millimeter guns. We have not yet heard what kind of tanks we are using. They say we are using the old standard 45-ton tank. Why is it, I ask, that the Army apparently does not have 60-ton tanks either out there or available?

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. I want to commend the gentleman for his modesty; however, the RECORD should show that he has a unique distinction. During the summer congressional recess of 1944, shortly after D-day, he served actively as a seaman in the United States merchant marine on the North Atlantic run. In the following years he was a commander in the United States Navy and participated in the Philippines and the original landings in Japan.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution. The gentleman is in a very good position to know since he and I were together and served during a part of the war as ordinary seamen in the merchant marine. Some of the members of the crew rather suspected that we were FBI men. However, the gentleman is a very gallant veteran of World War I, and I am sure that the octane-gas run across the Atlantic would not be the sort of thing you would choose if you were not anxious to do a job in World War II also. We have since had the opportunity of enlightening some of our colleagues that we were doing this to assist in the recruitment program of the merchant marine. The gentleman's service to the merchant marine and to the Armed Forces was important and greatly appreciated by those in command at the time.

Mr. CANFIELD. And we took that trip with the blessings of Speaker RAYBURN?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. We were permitted to go. I am not sure that the Speaker would always approve everything that Members of Congress do once they start, but I am very glad we had the experience and the Speaker's blessing.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I did not know about this, but as one who was at that time engaged in the Army, I am very glad to hear about it. I think both gentlemen, without violating their modesty, should be congratulated for such a fine part in a very dangerous service. I know how dangerous it was.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I thank the gentleman. What is coming up in my mind at this time is the fact that I have had some opportunity to observe how disastrous mistakes can be in war. I have been shot at several times in the past war, but strangely enough almost always by our allies or by our own people; either shot at or a ship hit, one or the other. My own war record is not in any sense illustrious, but I have been shot at over Iceland in an American plane by British antiaircraft fire; I have been rammed by one of our own vessels in the Pacific, and I had to duck to cover in other instances because some individual in the vast confusion of war, what the military people call the fog of war, had done something which had imperiled his own troops or his allied troops. So that is why I am concerned that we should avoid the terrible bitter and tragic effect of mismanagement, false information, failure to evaluate intelligence, or just plain costly blundering.

What I had intended to do was to summarize what led up to the Korean imbroglio, and at this time I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to include the June 28, 1950, issue of Pathfinder giving a synopsis of some of the events leading to our involvement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Single events which plunge nations into war—or near-wars—have long and twisted roots. Thus the fires of war ranging in Korea are the result of scores of events, decisions and guesses by many minds—some big, some small, some sinister, some even blank. Seemingly unrelated events, years and thousands of miles apart, also play their part. Here, in capsule review is the history which brought about the police action in Korea:

December 1943: At the Cairo Conference Roosevelt, Churchill, and China's Chiang Kai-shek agree that Korea, 40 years under Japanese rule, would become a free and independent nation at the war's end.

July 17–August 2, 1945: This was reaffirmed at the Potsdam Conference, with Soviet Russia agreeing. The thirty-eighth parallel in Korea established—to make it easier for Japanese commanders to surrender to United States officers in the south, to Russians in the north.

August 8, 1945: Russia enters war; moves troops to North Korea.

August 14, 1945: Japan surrenders. Russia digs in at Korea above the thirty-eighth parallel. For 2 years United States tries to restore unity in Korea, but is blocked by Soviet evasions.

Spring 1946: Soviet Army starts pressure on Iran. United Nations action forces Soviets to back down.

March 12, 1947: Truman doctrine put forth to check communism in Greece. (In the face of today's events, White House spokesmen are beginning to publicize this event to show that Harry Truman was on the right track. Later facts make this highly debatable.)

May 1, 1948: North Korea announces the founding of a People's Republic, begins intensive activity on the 38-degree parallel.

September 1948: General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, worried, pin-points the Philippines, Japan, and South Korea, says these form a sturdy triangular buttress for democracy in the Far East.

June 29, 1949: United States occupation troops withdrawn from South Korea.

August 1949: State Department's white paper on China slaps hard at Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist Government; comes under heavy congressional fire.

September 23, 1949: Truman announces atomic explosion in Soviet Russia.

October 1, 1949: Red China formally proclaimed. Nationalists plan to remove their government to Formosa.

December 1, 1949: Senator H. ALEXANDER SMITH, Republican, New Jersey, returns from trip to Tokyo, alerts Senate. Gist: MacArthur deeply disturbed. State Department calls Formosa unimportant; jolts Defense Department. The fall of Formosa to the Communists called unthinkable by Defense heads.

Christmas, 1949: State Department belief that Formosa is strategically unimportant endorsed by Truman. Defense Secretary Johnson and Joint Chiefs of Staff are disgusted.

January 5, 1950: Acheson says: "We are not going to get involved militarily in any way on the island of Formosa."

January 12, 1950: Acheson defends hands off Far East policy at National Press Club, lashes out at those who want to stop communism as putting the cart before the horse.

January 13, 1950: Republicans in Congress, particularly Senators TAFT, of Ohio; KNOWLAND, of California; FERGUSON, of Michigan; SMITH of New Jersey; together with ex-President Hoover, begin voicing strong warnings against Acheson policy.

June 1950: Defense Secretary Johnson, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Omar

N. Bradley, and Republican foreign affairs expert John Foster Dulles off to see MacArthur. MacArthur repeats his warnings.

June 25, 1950: North Korean Reds strike south.

July 1, 1950: United States ground troops return to Korea to stem Red attacks.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. It will be noted that many Members of Congress for a long time have been concerned over our failure to defend our island chain in the Pacific, the chain of defense which begins with Korea and goes down to Formosa and Indochina and the Philippines rather than that outer chain which includes Japan and Okinawa.

On May 16, 1950, this is how Korea looked to a foreign service officer returning from Seoul. Louis K. Benjamin, Director of Joint Services for the United States at Seoul, said:

Korea is a perfectly normal place and there is no cause for any alarm. Nothing has occurred to justify the fear that we're going to war in Korea or that Korea itself will be plunged into civil war.

So I think it eminently proper at this time to call attention to the fact that on July 26, 1949, the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON] for several Members of the minority, including Messrs. CHIPERFIELD, SMITH of Wisconsin, LODGE, and VORYS submitted a minority report in which they called the turn on precisely what subsequently happened. I wish that the radio commentators, the columnists, and the pundits, and the people who have all the ready answers would take the time to find out exactly what some Members of Congress were saying while we were debating aid to Korea. Anyone can get a copy of the report if they write to the House of Representatives Document Room or to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Some new copies are being reprinted in view of the increased demand. The report accompanies H. R. 5330, aid to Korea bill. In that report these gentlemen said, among other things: First of all, that Soviet officers were still in July 1949, 7 months after their alleged withdrawal from Korea, furnishing military advice and assistance to the North Koreans. What does not appear in the document and what may be of further interest is that there were two Korean divisions trained by the Russians at Stalingrad and that the orders were being issued by the Russians to the Koreans, received in Russian, and relayed by the Koreans in the Korean language to their subordinates behind the thirty-eighth parallel. This was 7 months after the Russians said that they had moved their troops. The report, however, points out further:

This development may well presage the launching of a full-scale military drive across the thirty-eighth parallel. Unless this Nation is prepared to meet force with comparable force, economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety or the integrity of South Korea. To the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the lending of economic assistance at this time will only enhance the prize to be taken by force of arms and internal intrigue.

Our forces, with the exception of an advisory mission, have been withdrawn from South Korea at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation. With our forces on the scene of action, there might have been advanced substantial arguments in favor of economic assistance, but without the presence of an adequate force to protect delivery of, and guarantee practical utilization of, the great volume of matériel and supplies, it appears folly of the highest order to embark upon the program.

The report, near the conclusion, says this:

We labor with the mountain of Asia and succeed only in bringing forth the molehill of economic aid for South Korea. Disregarding the raging tides which threaten to wash away the foundations of every constitutional government in Asia, we are asked to content ourselves with the construction of a dike of sand around the southern half of Korea.

What Korea requires, what China requires, what the United States requires is a statement of policy with respect to our future conduct in the Pacific and on the land mass of the continent of Asia.

It goes on to this final conclusion:

The proposed program is a double-bitted ax and one which may well be turned against us in the future. Already—

"Already." Now, this is 12 months ago—

along the thirty-eighth parallel aggression is speaking with the too familiar voices of howitzers and cannon. Our position is untenable and indefensible. The House should be aware of these facts.

I congratulate tne gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] on their perspicacity and on their sense of prophecy, as well as on their good judgment, in pointing out at that time that economic aid without military aid is useless, futile, and misleading, and can of course do no more than to enhance the prize in the eyes of the aggressor.

I see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] standing up. I hope he will tell us how much of that aid actually reached Korea.

Mr. VORYS. As the gentleman knows, that is not disclosed, except that it has been reported publicly that $200 worth of the military aid reached Korea before the attack on June 25.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I notice one columnist with a fine disregard for facts adds three zeros to that and calls it $200,000 worth of aid, but I believe that $200 is more nearly correct.

Mr. VORYS. I believe it will be found that no fighting implements from that program reached Korea. On the other hand, if the gentleman would indulge me a moment, this bill to which the minority report was filed in the summer of 1949 was finally brought to the floor for a vote on January 19. As the gentleman knows, it provided for the initiation of a program of over $300,000,000 of economic aid to Korea. At that time no military aid under the military bill passed last autumn had reached Korea. At that time I said that such economic aid in the absence of a far-eastern policy, in consideration of the desertion of Formosa, was strictly rat-hole money. I am interested to note that that phrase has been repeated publicly. I would be glad to have the gentleman give his view as to whether economic aid without military aid or without a far-eastern policy was or is rat-hole money in Korea up to the 26th day of June 1950, when we finally under fire achieved a far-eastern policy.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Obviously, if you put cheese in front of a rat hole without equipping the cheese with a trap the rats will get the cheese and we will not get the rats.

I would recall to the gentleman certain conversations which occurred on the floor and off the floor at that time in which he and I agreed in the summer of 1949 that we were both for military aid. I think the gentleman agreed with me then and I am sure he will be glad to confirm it that the withdrawal of our troops itself made possible this debacle.

The sending of purely economic aid consisting of fertilizer in which I believe the great nitrate trust of the country was naturally interested at that time and later, would hardly be military assistance to that beleaguered nation.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. I said in the House on January 19, 1950:

I think in the light of our total far eastern policy—or lack of policy—this permanent policy of assisting Korea with a program * * * of $385,000,000 * * * is, to use General Marshall's words, a piecemeal palliative. To use a more common expression, this is strictly rat-hole money which we cannot afford. * * * We should not vote money down the Korean rat hole that will not save them militarily, that will not add to our military security * * * that will not solve their economic problems.

It was proposed that we build certain types of factories in South Korea providing however no protection for them. The gentleman knows, I presume, in whose hands those factories would be today had they been built.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I am sure that had any of the material which fortunately due to the inadequacies of our own Government agencies here never got there it would be in North Korean hands now; as I say had any of that material reached there it would now be the property of Uncle Joe's little brothers, the North Korean puppet army. There is no question about that. It did not get there, so somebody's own stupidity at least saved us a little money. It usually works the other way around.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman have any idea of how much arms, equipment, and commodities of war were shipped to Russia? Of course Russia at the beginning was our ally, but later on she showed that she was not our ally, but still the supplies were sent.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I may not be accurate on this, but I have in mind that of arms, equipment, and essential economic supplies some $350,000,000 worth was sent, as I recall, in one connection. There may have been more. We sent over $2,000,000,000 in aid of one or another of the satellite countries which were then, or have since, been tucked beneath the iron curtain. So we have been very generous to our enemies in the program of containing them. Whether the idea is to contain an enemy by throwing him so much food that through overconsumption he cannot escape from his own corral, I do not know. But certainly mere criticism alone is not the answer for us here. Our objective, and my purpose here, is to make sure that these things and these mistakes are not repeated or compounded. That is all we are all shooting at.

But here is what has happened. I started to say a little while ago: Where are we going? Mr. Stalin, as I said, sent his scrub team in North Korea, and because we were not there and because we were not prepared and because we did not have the right equipment in tanks and amphibious forces, marines, planes, tactical aircraft, for example, we were caught with our plans down. As a result, with that scrub team Joe Stalin has been pushing our boys all over the lot, and Americans everywhere in this country of ours are disturbed and distressed to see that happening. They are distressed to see the mounting casualty lists. Now, if Joe Stalin can give us all that trouble with a scrub team in North Korea, he may send in his 150-pound junior varsity team in Yugoslavia some day or into Iran, and perhaps in Indonesia or Indochina, and you will then have the junior varsity team to contend with. He will keep on using these various teams of his fighting these wars all over the world by proxy. He can last for years before he will have to throw his first team into the combat.

During that time our security is drained off, our economy weakened, our energies dissipated. We become less secure, we become less well protected, every year that passes. Ever since this administration recognized Soviet Russia in 1933, each year has seen our security lessened in relation to the world at large. We became less and less secure year by year until in World War II we reestablished our security for a very tenuous and temporary period of time. But as Harold Ickes, former Secretary of the Interior says, wars are sometimes the result of stupid statesmanship; and sometimes peace treaties are treaties purporting to establish peace, or at least to pay off greedy allies, are the result of stupid statesmanship, too.

Whatever the cause may be, we have found our security drained away and weakened in 5 years of cold war. The cold war was succeeded by a series of little hot wars—Stalin "hotfoots," you might call them, if they were not so unfortunate in their tragic consequences.

Now, what are we going to do about it? Where are we going? Are we going to sit and watch this Nation be cut into small pieces beginning at its perimeter and outer defenses? Are we going to see our forces weakened? Are we going to see ourselves spent into comparative economic weakness? Are we capable only of the attitude of the ostrich or the sitting ducks? Strange pals these, for the American eagle.

It is bad enough to have a lot of silly spending proposals sent up to us for action. They are still being pushed at us. There is about $7,000,000,000 that some people would like to see us spend this year over the present budget. Personally, I am against spending an unnecessary penny which does not contribute to the main object of national security, the protection of the internal fabric of this country, or the essential conduct of the Nation's business.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I will try to finish before that time, because with all of this discussion I have not yet developed my principal concern. It is this. The great danger is that we shall be found without a long-range policy for peace. During all of these 5 years of the cold war, very little has been said about whether it is possible to secure the peace of the world, which every American, who talks to you when you go home is most interested in; not only Americans, but all the people of the world, even the Russian people are interested in peace. How will we proceed to do something about it? I think it ought to be a matter of national policy for us to have, and boldly push, a plan to promote world peace, and I think this ought to be at least considered. The time has come for us to establish a course of positive, affirmative leadership in world affairs. We have been told by Government agencies in Washington that the Soviet leaders cannot be trusted; that their agreements are not worth the paper they are written on; that the Politburo are a bunch of people you cannot possibly trust. Are we to assume that those people are all going to change overnight from evil men to forthright, virtuous statesmen, with whom we can deal? I think not. If we have learned anything, we ought to have learned that despotic governments exploit their populations, and the existence of a totalitarian dictatorship in any large country is a potential threat of war to the rest of the world.

I picked up a thought from David Lawrence which I will leave with you. I think we should announce now that we do not intend to negotiate a treaty or an agreement on pending problems with the totalitarian government in the Kremlin. We should announce that we will gladly negotiate with the representatives of the Russian people when a free government is established by them. Why? Because I would like to see Mr. Stalin do some looking over his shoulder. I would like to see him worry a lot about what is going on in his own country while his agents continue to worry us. Mr. Stalin cannot possibly be sure of the percent or degree of loyalty of any living Russian. There are certain whole provinces which, according to intelligence reports which have been available to some of us in the past, are ready for revolt if a condition can be brought about which will give them any kind of chance for success. Nor are all Red Army officers or soldiers delighted with things as they are. Therefore, I think we ought to approach the Russian people with all the sincerity that stems from a great moral cause, and we ought to tell them that we want to extend economic and financial aid to them so that they can play their rightful part in the family of nations, if and when they discover a means by which to change their rulers, in order to rid the world of the threat of war. I am sure we cannot assume that mere armament and a drifting policy will keep any cold war from becoming a hot war. I think we must approach the Russian people directly and make plain to them that we believe in the dignity of the individual and in the Judeo-Christian spirit of human brotherhood. We must explain to them, not only our friendliness to the Russian people as distinguished from their bloodthirsty rulers, but our willingness to use our resources and make sacrifices in their behalf and offer a concrete plan which would improve their way of life, provided they establish for themselves a democratic, freely elected form of government and way of life by their own will and volition. The way of revolt may not seem likely to us in the immediate future. But how many revolutions did we know about before they burst suddenly into flame?

We can penetrate the iron curtain in many ways. Our own psychological crusades got inside Germany with Woodrow Wilson's 14 points, as I am sure you will remember, in World War I, which certainly hastened the end of that war, and our crusades got inside Japan and reached the people of that country in World War II.

I have had some experience as an intelligence officer in the last war monitoring radio Tokyo, and other jobs, which convinced me that the Japanese were ready for peace long before they ever got around to sending their official delegates. The people were ready for peace long before the atomic bomb was dropped; and their attitude toward the occupation force amply demonstrates it. I have seen quite a lot of this world; I have been in 67 countries and colonies, and everywhere I have noticed certain basic things: First, the people everywhere want to be taxed as little as possible for the support of their government. Second, they are interested in the maintenance of peace at home and in tolerance and understanding among themselves and their neighbors, in the welfare of their families and a better lot in life for their children than has been theirs. It is not confined to any country or to any race of people.

In short, the time has come to appeal to peoples instead of drifting along on the mistaken assumption that the leopards in the Kremlin will change their spots.

We can have a people's peace—and it can be a peace without appeasing any of the despotic governments lined up against us in the cold war. It can be a peace of liberation for the masses of human beings now under the yoke of tyranny. They can be liberated by the moral force of mankind, which alone can direct and mobilize the material resources of the world and bring enduring peace, as so ably argued by Mr. Lawrence.

In conclusion, many people will say it is idealistic, many people will say there is nothing to it; many people will say there is no chance of accomplishing it, but my answer is this: It has not been tried. The alternatives are too horrible to contemplate.

Rather than go on and on and on, down and down the dark and dreary and ever more bloody road to a succession of constant wars when the mothers and fathers of America will find again, and again, and again, that their sons have been brought home to them for burial in their homeland; over and over again these people will be asking and will have a right to ask: What have you in the Congress and what has the President done to press all possible means to attain peace in the world?

If we are true to our religious principles; if we are true to our political responsibilities, if we are true to the moral urge which resides in all of us, at least we ought to make some effort to get to the hearts, and minds, and souls of the Russian people behind the soulless, faithless brutal wall erected by a few of their leaders to keep from them the truth, which alone can make them free. The Voice of America is reaching them and is being heard. But it is still the tactful voice of diplomacy. It has not the appeal of the Marseillaise, it does not turn back upon the dictators their own words: "You have nothing to lose but your chains." I have talked to people in Germany and know that they listened during the war to our broadcasts over there. I am sure there are many people in Russia who listen to our broadcasts even though in many cases the penalty is death or exile.

It depends on the degree of our resolution to wage peace. If we devoted 10 percent of the energy toward waging peace that we devote toward waging eternal wars and so often toward preparing for them, albeit too little and too late at times, there is a chance that the will of man, the mind of man, and the heart of man may find the means by which mankind may live together in peace, in tolerance, and in understanding according to the immemorial precepts handed down to us by Him who may be presumed to know more about these things than do we, His confused children. It was not to the mighty in battle, however just their cause, but to the peacemakers, who were assured inheritance of the earth.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

WE MUST BE PREPARED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment or two, for it is very late.

I believe that every American today, no matter what he or she is doing is firm in the belief that we must be prepared to give our men every support possible, those who are fighting to take care of our country in Korea, and we must be prepared to take care of the men who are sent back wounded.

Mr. Speaker, you may remember that many of us protested the closing of the Army, Navy, and Veterans' Administration hospitals in this country. I am demanding, Mr. Speaker, that they be reopened. We protested the turning over of the naval hospital at Long Beach to the Veterans' Administration. I know that in a possible conflict that naval hospital would be very badly needed. These protests went unheeded. The Veterans' Administration took over the naval hospital and moved the patients who were hospitalized at the Birmingham VA in 1 day. This was especially hard on the paraplegics who were moved there, and who had been promised hospitalization near their homes. They built their homes near the hospital at the suggestion and request of the VA, but now they will have to go elsewhere, in some instances 150 miles away, even for treatment, and they require constant treatment.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking that the administration give back the naval hospital to the Navy and that the Army keep the Waltham General Hospital open. There are veterans who have died because they could not secure beds in Veterans' Administration hospitals. There are other hospitals, Army and Navy, that should be taken back. Many of them will have to be used.

Mr. Speaker, I remember as you do that Admiral Boone was punished and demoted because he testified as to the need for naval hospitals. I have a feeling, Mr. Speaker, that those hospitals must go back to the Army and the Navy to be ready for the casualties that will come in and in order to release beds in veterans' hospitals. I hear conflicting stories regarding the maintaining of our armed services hospitals by the Government. Some are to the effect they will be kept. They must be kept Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I have just talked to the White House regarding the Waltham Watch Co. It will be remembered that many of us protested vigorously the lack of a loan by the RFC to the Waltham Watch Co. in order that the workers might be employed in this great concern and that our own American watch industry might be kept going in the United States in competition with the Swiss watch manufacturers, and also that the watch company workers might be kept in training in order that their use as precision workers could be employed in an emergency. Certainly that emergency is here. The work done by the precision workers at Waltham will be invaluable now and in the future. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Government take over the Waltham Watch Co. and operate it for the benefit of precision work and for the benefit of the watch industry in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, those are some of the ways in which I think the Government today can help the Korean situation.
